2624. HONORS, Miserable. Aged Emperor Tacitus. The glory and life of Tacitus were of short duration. Transported, in the depth of winter, from the soft retirement of Campania to the foot of Mount Caucasus, he sunk under the unaccustomed hardships of a military life. The fatigues of the body were aggravated by the cares of the mind. . . . The angry and selfish passions of the soldiers . . . soon broke out with redoubled violence, and raged in the camp and even in the tent of the aged emperor. His mild and amiable character served only to inspire contempt, and he was incessantly tormented with factions which he could not assuage and by demands which it was impossible to satisfy. . . . His last hour was hastened by anguish and disappointment. It may be doubtful whether the soldiers imbrued their hands in the blood of this innocent prince. It is certain that their insolence was the cause of his death.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12, p. 373.

2625. HONORS, Premature. Bolivar. [The Washington of the States of Colombia.] Spain renewed the war, and Bolivar was called again to the supreme command. Three more bloody campaigns were necessary before the Spaniards were wholly and finally expelled from the soil of Colombia, by which name the confederated republics were called. In 1825 Bolivar once more abdicated the dictatorship. An equestrian statue having been decreed him by the corporation of his native city, he declined the honor, saying, "Wait till after my death, that you may judge me without prejudice, and accord to me then such honors as you may deem suitable; but never rear monuments to a man as long as he is alive. He can change, he can betray. You will never have this reproach to make to me; but wait a little longer."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 490.

2626. HONORS resigned. Diocletian. It was in the twenty-first year of his reign that Diocletian executed his memorable resolution of abdicating the empire, an action more naturally to have been expected from the elder or the younger Antoninus than from a prince who had never practised the lessons of philosophy either in the attainment or in the use of supreme power. Diocletian acquired the glory of giving to the world the first example of a resignation, which has not been very frequently imitated by succeeding monarchs. . . . [He was only fifty-nine.] It was time to put an end to the painful struggle which he had sustained during more than a year, between the care of his health and that of his dignity.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13, p. 441.

2627. ———. Charles V. The abdication of Charles appears to have been hastened by the vicissitude of fortune; and the disappointment of his favorite schemes urged him to relinquish a power which he found inadequate to his ambition. But the reign of Diocletian had flowed with a tide of uninterrupted success; nor was it till after he had vanquished all his enemies and accomplished all his designs that he seems to have entertained any serious thoughts of resigning the empire. . . . [He was fifty-five years old, and] required indulgence and relaxation; the latter compelled him to direct, from the bed of sickness, the administration of a great empire. He resolved to pass the remainder of his days in honorable repose, to place his glory beyond the reach of fortune, and to relinquish the theatre of the world to his younger and more active associates.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13, p. 441.

2628. HONORS, Unexpected. Miss Sallie Thompson. [A Massachusetts girl, daughter of "Count Rumford."] Rumford assumed the command of the Bavarian forces, and by his firmness and presence of mind prevented either French or Austrians from entering Munich. The consideration in which he was held is illustrated by the fact that the elector made Miss Thompson a countess of the empire, conferring on her a pension of £200 a year, with liberty to enjoy it in any country where she might wish to reside. The New England girl, brought up in the quietude of Concord, transplanted thence to London, and afterward to Munich, was subjected to a somewhat trying ordeal.—TYNDALL'S COUNT RUMFORD.

2629. HONORS, Unmerited. Emperor Carinus. With the senators Carinus affected a lofty and regal demeanor, frequently declaring that he designed to distribute their estates among the populace of Rome. From the dregs of that populace he selected his favorites, and even his ministers. The palace, and even the Imperial table, were filled with singers, dancers, prostitutes, and all the various retinue of vice and folly. One of his doorkeepers he intrusted with the government of the city. In the room of the Prætorian prefect, whom he put to death, Carinus substituted one of the ministers of his looser pleasures.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12, p. 393.

2630. HONORS won by Merit. "Win his Spurs." [Battle of Crécy, 1346.] The counts of Alençon and Flanders at length disengaged themselves, and wheeling round, made a desperate onset on the first division of the English, commanded by the young Prince of Wales. The prince fought heroically, but finding himself hardly pressed, sent to entreat his father to support him with the reserve. The king, who watched the battle from a windmill, first satisfied himself that his son was neither dead nor disabled, and then declined to move to his assistance. "Let the boy win his spurs," said he; "for, if God will, I desire that this day be his, and that all the honor of it shall remain with him and those to whom I have given him in charge." Thus encouraged and excited, the English stood as immovable as a rock.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 10, § 7.

2631. HOPE, Happiness in. Samuel Johnson. He this day enlarged upon Pope's melancholy remark, "Man never is, but always to be blest."

He asserted that the present was never a happy state to any human being; but that, as every part of life of which we are conscious was at some point of time a period yet to come, in which felicity was expected, there was some happiness produced by hope. Being pressed upon this subject, and asked if he really was of opinion that though, in general, happiness was very rare in human life, a man was not sometimes happy in the moment that was present, he answered, "Never, but when he is drunk."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 248.

2632. HOPE a Treasure. Perdiccas. [Alexander the Great was generous to his friends.] Though his provision was . . . small, he chose, at his embarkation, to inquire into the circumstances of his friends; and to one he gave a farm, to another a village; to this the revenue of a borough, and to that of a post. When in this manner he had disposed of almost all the estates of the crowd, Perdiccas asked him what he had reserved for himself. The king answered, "Hope." "Well," replied Perdiccas, "we who share in your labors will also take part in your hopes." In consequence of which he refused the estate allotted him, and some others of the king's friends did the same.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

2633. HORSE, An honored. By Washington. The charger which bore him when he received the sword of the vanquished [Cornwallis] . . . was a chestnut with a white face and legs, and was called Nelson. . . . After the war was over it was never mounted more, but . . . well cared for. . . . It died of old age at Mount Vernon many years after the Revolution.—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 2.

2634. HORSEMEN, Expert. Scythians. The Scythians of every age have been celebrated as bold and skilful riders; and constant practice had seated them so firmly on horseback, that they were supposed by strangers to perform the ordinary duties of civil life, to eat, to drink, and even to sleep, without dismounting from their steeds.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26, p. 9.

2635. HORSES, Care of. Washington's. The President's stables at Philadelphia were under the care of German John, and the grooming of the white chargers will rather surprise the moderns. The night before the horses were . . . to be ridden they were covered entirely over with white paste, of which whiting was the principal component part; then the animals were swathed in body-clothes and left to sleep on clean straw. In the morning the composition had become hard, was well rubbed in, and curried and brushed, which process gave to the coats a beautiful glossy and satin-like appearance.—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 20.

2636. HORSES in War. Troy. Troy was taken three times: the first time by Hercules, on account of Laomedon's horses; the second time by Agamemnon, through means of the wooden horse; the third by Charidemus, a horse happening to stand in the way, and hindering the Trojans from shutting the gates so quickly as they should have done.—PLUTARCH'S SERTORIUS.

2637. HORTICULTURE, Pleasures of. Theodoric. [The Gothic King of Italy.] After the example of the last emperors, Theodoric preferred the residence of Ravenna, where he cultivated an orchard with his own hands.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39, p. 25.

2638. — — —. Napoleon I. [When in exile at St. Helena his physician recommended digging in the ground.] Things around soon assumed a different aspect. Here was an excavation, there a basin or a road. We made alleys, grottoes, cascades. We planted willows, oaks, peach-trees, to give a little shade around the house. . . . We sowed beans and peas.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 33.

2639. HOSPITALITY appreciated. Roman. It was a general custom, in preparing for a luxurious meal, to take a vomit short time before sitting down to table. This was not regarded as a mark either of gluttony or epicurism, but was held to be done in compliment to the entertainer, that his guests might be enabled to carry off a greater quantity of his good fare. When Julius Cæsar paid a visit of reconciliation to Cicero by inviting himself to sup with him, he took care to let Cicero know that he had taken a vomit beforehand, and was resolved to make a most enormous meal; and Cicero tells us he kept his word, which, for his own part, he took very kindly, and as a mark of Cæsar's high politeness.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 4, p. 450.

2640. HOSPITALITY without Charity. English. [An Italian traveller of 1509 ridicules English ostentation in feasting.] They think that no greater honor can be conferred or received than to invite others to eat with them; and they would sooner give five or six ducats to provide an entertainment for a person than a groat to assist him in any distress.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15.

2641. HOSPITALITY, Courtly. Louis XIV. [To James II., the fugitive king of England.] Saint Germain's had now been selected to be the abode of the royal family of England. Sumptuous furniture had been hastily sent in. The nursery of the Prince of Wales had been carefully furnished with everything that an infant could require. One of the attendants presented to the queen the key of a superb casket which stood in her apartment. She opened the casket, and found in it six thousand pistoles. On the following day James arrived at Saint Germain's. Louis was already there to welcome him. The unfortunate exile bowed so low that it seemed as if he was about to embrace the knees of his protector. Louis raised him, and embraced him with brotherly tenderness. The two kings then entered the queen's room. "Here is a gentleman," said Louis to Mary, "whom you will be glad to see." Then, after entreating his guests to visit him next day at Versailles, and to let him have the pleasure of showing them his buildings, pictures, plantations [he gave him £45,000 sterling a year and £10,000 for his outfit].—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 555.

2642. HOSPITALITY, Duty of. Abraham. [The Arabs have a tradition that the] first time Abraham visited Mecca he stopped at the door of Ishmael and called him by his name. Amara, the wife of Ishmael, came to the door. "Where is Ishmael?" inquired the patriarch, without dismounting. "He is hunting," replied Amara. "Have you nothing to give me to eat? for I cannot come down." "I have nothing," said Amara; "this country is a desert." "Very well," rejoined Abraham; "say to your husband that you have seen a stranger, describe to him my figure, and tell him that I recommend him to change the threshold of his door." Amara, on the return of Ishmael, acquitted herself of the message. Her husband, offended that she had refused his father hospitality, repudiated her, and married a woman of another tribe, named Sayda. Abraham returned some time after to visit his son. He was absent. A young, slim, and graceful woman came to the threshold of the door to make reply to the stranger. "Have you some nourishment to give me?" asked Abraham of his daughter-in-law, without making himself known or dismounting from his horse. "Yes," said she in an instant. And going into the house, she returned soon after, presenting to the traveller some cooked venison, milk, and dates. Abraham tasted the edibles, then blessed them in saying, "May God multiply in this country these three species of nutriment."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 44.

2643. HOSPITALITY, False. Roman. Hospitality was formerly the virtue of the Romans; and every stranger who could plead either merit or misfortune was relieved or rewarded by their generosity. At present, if a foreigner, perhaps of no contemptible rank, is introduced to one of the proud and wealthy senators, he is welcomed indeed in the first audience with such warm professions and such kind inquiries that he retires, enchanted with the affability of his illustrious friend, and full of regret that he had so long delayed his journey to Rome, the native seat of manners, as well as of empire. Secure of a favorable reception, he repeats his visit the ensuing day, and is mortified by the discovery that his person, his name, and his country are already forgotten. If he still has resolution to persevere, he is gradually numbered in the train of dependents, and obtains the permission to pay his assiduous and unprofitable court to a haughty patron, incapable of gratitude or friendship, who scarcely deigns to remark his presence, his departure, or his return.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 256.

2644. HOSPITALITY forgotten. Benedict Arnold. [He led the British to burn New London, Conn.] Men who had known him in other days as an enterprising trader recognized him as he sat upon his horse, calmly surveying the progress of the flames. He had the effrontery to enter a house where often he had been honorably entertained as a guest, and there satisfy his hunger from the plunder of the pantry; and when he had finished his repast he ordered the house to be fired. He is said to have expressed his regret that he could not go as far as Norwich, and burn the very house in which he was born.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 231.

2645. HOSPITALITY painful. To Lombards. While Alboin served under his father's standard, he encountered in battle and transpierced with his lance the rival prince of the Gepidæ. The Lombards, who applauded such early prowess, requested his father, with unanimous acclamations, that the heroic youth, who had shared the dangers of the field, might be admitted to the feast of victory. "You are not unmindful," replied the inflexible Audoin, "of the wise customs of our ancestors. Whatever may be his merit, a prince is incapable of sitting at table with his father till he has received his arms from a foreign and royal hand." Alboin bowed with reverence to the institutions of his country, selected forty companions, and boldly visited the court of Turisund, king of the Gepidæ, who embraced and entertained, according to the laws of hospitality, the murderer of his son. At the banquet, while Alboin occupied the seat of the youth whom he had slain, a tender remembrance arose in the mind of Turisund. "How dear is that place! how hateful is that person!" were the words that escaped, with a sigh, from the indignant father.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 45, p. 389.

2646. HOSPITALITY, Reluctance in. Rev. Thomas Ware. [He was one of the early Methodist preachers. On one occasion he stopped at the house of a Captain Sears, whom he first reproved for his anger toward his barking dogs, and then applied for entertainment.] The captain paused a long time, looking steadily at him, and then said, "I hate to let you stay the worst of any man I ever saw; but, as I never refused a stranger a night's lodging in my life, you may alight." The captain soon became a Christian and a lifelong friend.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 2, p. 306.

2647. HOSPITALITY, Sacred. Arabs. The Arabs pushed to superstition their respect of hospitality. Their most inveterate enemy found refuge, security, and even protection, as soon as he succeeded in touching the cord of their tents or the gown skirts of their wives.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 47.

2648. ———. "Salt." In a nocturnal visit to the treasure of the prince of Sistan, Jacob, the son of Leith, stumbled over a lump of salt, which he unwarily tasted with his tongue. Salt, among the Orientals, is the symbol of hospitality, and the pious robber immediately retired without spoil or damage.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 52, p. 327.

2649. HOSPITALITY of Savages. Columbus. Their kindness and gratitude could not then be exceeded, and the march of the army was continually retarded by the hospitality of the numerous villages through which it passed. Such was the frank communion among these people that the Indians who accompanied the army entered without ceremony into the houses, helping themselves to anything of which they stood in need, without exciting surprise or anger in the inhabitants; the latter offered to do the same with respect to the Spaniards, and seemed astonished when they met a repulse. This, it is probable, was the case merely with respect to articles of food; for we are told that the Indians were not careless in their notions of property, and the crime of theft was one of the few which were punished among them with great severity. Food, however, is generally open to free participation in savage life, and is rarely made an object of barter, until habits of trade have been introduced by the white men. The untutored savage in almost every part of the world scorns to make a traffic of hospitality.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 6, ch. 9.

2650. HOSPITALITY, Spirit of. "Lodgings." Johnson said once to me: "Sir, I honor Derrick for his presence of mind. One night, when Floyd, another poor author, was wandering about the streets in the night, he found Derrick fast asleep upon a bulk; upon being suddenly waked, Derrick started up: 'My dear Floyd, I am sorry to see you in this destitute state; will you go home with me to my lodgings?'"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON.

2651. HOSPITALITY, Universal. American Indians. The hospitality of the Indian has rarely been questioned. The stranger enters his cabin, by day or by night, without asking leave. . . . He will take his own rest abroad, that he may give up his own skin or mat of sedge to his guest. Nor is the traveller questioned as to the purpose of his visit; he chooses his own time freely to deliver his message.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

2652. HOSPITALS, Mohammedan. Imarets. [Orkhan, the Mohammedan conqueror of Nice, founded there] the first hospitals charged to feed the poor by obligatory donations from the faithful. These hospitals, suggested by a prescription of Mahomet, which claimed a portion of the revenues of the rich for the indigent, were called

imarets. Orkhan himself, after the example of the prophet and the Khalifs, used to distribute soup there to the poor of Nice.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 216.

2653. HOSTAGE, Safety by. Cortez. [He invaded Mexico.] Millions of natives who swarmed around him were becoming familiar with his troops, and no longer believed them immortal. There were murmurings of an outbreak which threatened to overwhelm them in an hour. In this emergency the Spanish general adopted the bold and unscrupulous expedient of seizing Montezuma and holding him as a hostage. A plausible pretext for this outrage was found.—RIPPETH'S U. S., ch. 4, p. 59.

2654. HOSTILITY, Supreme. William of Orange. Yet even his affection for the land of his birth was subordinate to another feeling which early became supreme in his soul, which mixed itself with all his passions, which impelled him to marvellous enterprises, which supported him when sinking under mortification, pain, sickness, and sorrow, which, toward the close of his career, seemed during a short time to languish, but which soon broke forth again fiercer than ever, and continued to animate him even while the prayer for the departing was read at his bedside. That feeling was enmity to France, and to the magnificent king who, in more than one sense, represented France, and who, to virtues and accomplishments eminently French, joined in large measure that unquiet, unscrupulous, and vain-glorious ambition which has repeatedly drawn on France the resentment of Europe.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 169.

2655. HOTELS, First established. England. [In the thirteenth century] there were drinking houses for wine, and alewives sold beer; there was no establishment at this period which supplied, besides drink, food and beds. It was not until the middle of the fourteenth century that the hostel or tavern had its origin.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 26, p. 399.

2656. HUMANITY, A common. Sinful. Says the Duchess of Buckingham to Lady Huntingdon, who had asked her to come and hear Whitefield: "I thank your ladyship for the information concerning the Methodist preachers; their doctrines are most repulsive, and strongly tinged with disrespect toward their superiors, in perpetually endeavoring to level all ranks and do away with all distinctions. It is monstrous to be told you have a heart as sinful as the common wretches that crawl on the earth. This is highly offensive and insulting; and I cannot but wonder that your ladyship should relish any sentiments so much at variance with high rank and good breeding. I shall be most happy to come and hear your favorite preacher." Her Grace's sentiments toward the common wretches that crawl on the earth were shared, we may be sure, by her Grace's waiting-maid. Of humanity there was as little as there was of religion. It was the age of the criminal law which hanged men for petty thefts, of life-long imprisonment for debt, of the stocks and the pillory, of a Temple Bar garnished with the heads of traitors.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 1.

2657. HUMANITY deified. Julius Cæsar. His person was declared sacred, and to injure him by word or deed was to be counted sacrilege. The fortune of Cæsar was introduced into the constitutional oath, and the Senate took a solemn pledge to maintain his acts inviolate. Finally they arrived at a conclusion that he was not a man at all; no longer Caius Julius, but Divus Julius, a god or the son of a god. A temple was to be built to Cæsar as another Quirinus, and Antony was to be his priest. Cæsar knew the meaning of all this. He must accept their flattery and become ridiculous, or he must appear to treat with contumely the Senate which offered it.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 26.

2659. HUMANITY, Generous. Samuel Johnson. His generous humanity to the miserable was almost beyond example. The following instance is well attested: Coming home late one night he found a poor woman lying in the street, so much exhausted that she could not walk; he took her upon his back and carried her to his house, where he discovered that she was one of those wretched females who had fallen into the lowest state of vice, poverty, and disease. Instead of harshly upbraiding her, he had her taken care of with all tenderness for a long time, at a considerable expense, till she was restored to health, and endeavored to put her into a virtuous way of living.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 531.

2660. HUMILIATION, Abject. Lord Clarendon. The viceroy had scarcely returned to Dublin from his unpleasant tour when he received letters which informed him that he had incurred the king's serious displeasure. His Majesty—so these letters ran—expected his servants not only to do what he commanded, but to do it from the heart, and with a cheerful countenance. The lord-lieutenant had not, indeed, refused to co-operate in the reform of the army and of the civil administration, but his co-operation had been reluctant and perfunctory. His looks had betrayed his feelings, and everybody saw that he disapproved of the policy which he was employed to carry into effect. In great anguish of mind he wrote to defend himself; but he was sternly told that his defence was not satisfactory. He then, in the most abject terms, declared that he would not attempt to justify himself; that he acquiesced in the royal judgment, be it what it might; that he prostrated himself in the dust; that he implored pardon; that of all penitents he was the most sincere; that he should think it glorious to die in his sovereign's cause, but found it impossible to live under his sovereign's displeasure. Nor was this mere interested hypocrisy, but, at least in part, unaffected slavishness and poverty of spirit; for in confidential letters, not meant for the royal eye, he bemoaned himself to his family in the same strain. He was miserable; he was crushed; the wrath of the king was insupportable; if that wrath could not be mitigated, life would not be worth having. The poor man's terror increased when he learned that it had been determined at Whitehall to recall him, and to appoint, as his successor, his rival and calumniator, Tyrconnel.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 135.

2661. HUMILIATION, Barbarous. By Timour. Ahmed Arabshah likewise relates another outrage, which Bajazet [the captured Ottoman sultan] endured, of a more domestic and tender nature. His indiscreet mention of women and divorces was deeply resented by the jealous Tartar; in the feast of victory the wine was served by female cupbearers, and the sultan beheld his own concubines and wives confounded among the slaves, and exposed without a veil to the eyes of intemperance. To escape a similar indignity, it is said that his successors, except in a single instance, have abstained from legitimate nuptials.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65, p. 269.

2662. HUMILIATION by Defeat. Romans at Caudium. The Samnites, surprising them in a narrow defile near that town, had it in their power to cut them off to a man. Pontius, the general of the Samnites, made the whole Roman army, with the consuls at their head, naked and disarmed, pass under the yoke. . . . When the dreadful ceremony began, and when they saw the garments torn from the backs of the consuls, and those men whom they had been accustomed to regard with veneration thus ignominiously treated, every one forgot his own calamity, and, filled with horror, turned aside his eyes, that he might not behold the miserable humiliation of the rulers of his country. It was evening when the Roman army was suffered to pass out of the defile; and when night came on, naked and destitute of everything, they threw themselves down in despair in a field near the city of Capua. The magistrates, senators, and chief men of the place repaired to the spot where they lay, and endeavored to comfort and soothe their distress; but they spoke not a word, nor ever raised their heads from the ground. The next day they proceeded in the same melancholy dejection to Rome, where their disaster had occasioned the utmost consternation, and the whole city had gone into mourning.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 7, p. 353.

2663. HUMILIATION with Insult. Henry VI. Pope Celestinus, while Henry VI. was kneeling to kiss his feet, took that opportunity of kicking off his crown. He made amends to him, however, for this insolence, by making him a gift of Naples and Sicily, from which Henry had extirpated the last of the Norman princes.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 7, p. 130.

2664. HUMILIATION, Insupportable. Oliver Goldsmith. He forthwith gave a supper and dance at his chamber to a number of young persons of both sexes from the city, in direct violation of college rules. The unwonted sound of the fiddle reached the ears of the implacable Wilder. He rushed to the scene of unhallowed festivity, inflicted corporal punishment on the "father of the feast," and turned his astonished guests neck and heels out of doors. . . . This filled the measure of poor Goldsmith's humiliations; he felt degraded both within college and without. He dreaded the ridicule of his fellow-students for the ludicrous termination of his orgie, and he was ashamed to meet his city acquaintances after the degrading chastisement received in their presence, and after their own ignominious expulsion.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 2, p. 25.

2665. HUMILIATION, National. Accession of James II. It was not without many misgivings that James had determined to call the estates of his realm together. The moment was, indeed, most auspicious for a general election. Never since the accession of the house of Stuart had the constituent bodies been so favorably disposed toward the court. But the new sovereign's mind was haunted by an apprehension not to be mentioned, even at this distance of time, without shame and indignation. He was afraid that by summoning the Parliament of England he might incur the displeasure of the King of France.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 423.

2666. HUMILIATION, Painful. Attalus. [Formerly Emperor of Rome.] When the Goths, two years after the siege of Rome, established their quarters in Gaul, it was natural to suppose that their inclinations could be divided only between the Emperor Honorius, with whom they had formed a recent alliance, and the degraded Attalus, whom they reserved in their camp for the occasional purpose of acting the part of a musician or a monarch.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 306.

2668. HUMILIATION, Royal. Eleventh Century. [Frederic, surnamed Barbarossa,] was summoned to go to Rome to receive the imperial crown from [Pope] Adrian IV. The emperor promised that he would make no attempt against the life, the person, nor the honor of the pope, the cardinals, and the magistrates. A knight, completely armed, made this oath, in the name of Frederic Barbarossa; but the ceremonial required that when the pope came out to meet him the emperor should prostrate himself on the ground, kiss his feet, hold the stirrup of his horse while he mounted, and lead him by the bridle for nine paces. Frederic refused at first. . . . His indignation broke out immediately in the plainest terms when the deputies of the people of Rome informed him that they had chosen him, though a foreigner, to be their sovereign. "It is false," said he; "you have not chosen me to be your sovereign; my predecessors, Charlemagne and Otho, conquered you by the strength of their arms; and I am, by established possession, your lawful sovereign." . . . The troubles of Italy at last compelled him to measure his haughty spirit could very ill brook. He acknowledged the supremacy of Alexander III., he condescended to kiss his feet and to hold the stirrup, and to restore what he possessed which had at any time belonged to the holy see.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 7, p. 129.

2669. — — —. Henry II. [In 1174.] on the 10th of July, Henry rode from Southampton during the night, and as he saw the cathedral towers of Canterbury looming in the gray dawn, he alighted, and walked in penitential garb, barefoot into the city. He knelt at the tomb of Becket in deep humiliation. The Bishop of London preached, and maintained that Henry had thus appealed to Heaven in avowal of his innocence of the guilt of blood. Then the great king, before the assembled monks and chapter, poured forth his contrition for the passionate exclamation which had been so rashly interpreted ["Is there no one to deliver me from this turbulent priest?"] Four knights afterward assassinated Becket; and he was scourged with a knotted cord. He spent the night in a dark crypt, and the next day rode fasting to London.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 21, p. 301.

2670. HUMILITY, Christian. St. Bernard. In speech, in writing, in action, Bernard stood high above his rivals and contemporaries; his compositions are not devoid of wit and eloquence; and he seems to have preserved as much reason and humanity as may be reconciled with the character of a saint. In a secular life he would have shared the seventh part of a private inheritance; by a vow of poverty and penance, by closing his eyes against the visible world, by the refusal of all ecclesiastical dignities, the abbot of Clairvaux became the oracle of Europe and the founder of one hundred and sixty convents. Princes and pontiffs trembled at the freedom of his apostolical censures; France, England, and Milan consulted and obeyed his judgment in a schism of the church; the debt was repaid by the gratitude of Innocent II.; and his successor, Eugenius III., was the friend and disciple of the holy Bernard. It was in the proclamation of the second crusade that he shone as the missionary and prophet of God.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39, p. 13.

2671. — — —. Godfrey. [When the Crusaders had taken Jerusalem the] unanimous voice of the army proclaimed Godfrey of Bouillon the first and most worthy of the champions of Christendom. His magnanimity accepted a trust as full of danger as of glory; but in a city where his Saviour had been crowned with thorns, the devout pilgrim rejected the name and ensigns of royalty; and the founder of the kingdom of Jerusalem contented himself with the modest title of Defender and Baron of the Holy Sepulchre.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58, p. 595.

2672. HUMILITY, Mohammedan. Mahomet. His apparel was that of the poor—the coarsest cloth of sheep's wool, the cinctures woven from camel's hair; he rejected, as an article of luxury and vanity, the white turbans of Indian cotton worn by his warriors. He lived upon dates and the milk of his sheep, which he did not disdain to milk himself. He but rarely made use of the hand of his slave for the most disagreeable services of the house. He went to fetch water from the well, swept and washed the boards of his floor. Seated on the ground, upon his mat of straw, he mended himself his sandals and stitched his worn garments.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 152.

2673. — — —. Mahomet. The good sense of Mahomet despised the pomp of royalty; the apostle of God submitted to the menial offices of the family; he kindled the fire, swept the floor, milked the ewes, and mended with his own hands his shoes and his woolen garment. Disdaining the penance and merit of a hermit, he observed, without effort or vanity, the abstemious diet of an Arab and a soldier. On solemn occasions he feasted his companions with rustic and hospitable plenty; but in his domestic life many weeks would elapse without a fire being kindled on the hearth of the prophet. The interdiction of wine was confirmed by his example; his hunger was appeased with a sparing allowance of barley-bread; he delighted in the taste of milk and honey; but his ordinary food consisted of dates and water.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 148.

2675. HUMILITY, Victor's. Charles VIII. Charles set out [for the conquest of Italy]. . . . Incensed at his perfidy, he besieged the pope in the castle of St. Angelo. Alexander VI. was at length forced to sue for an accommodation; and then the French monarch, with great devotion, kissed his holiness' feet and served him with water to wash his hands.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 13, p. 215.

2676. HUMILITY, Wisdom by. Statesmanship. The formation of political institutions in the United States was not effected by giant minds or "nobles after the flesh." American history knows but one avenue to success in American legislation—freedom from ancient prejudice. The truly great lawgivers in our colonies first became as little children. In framing constitutions for Carolina, [John] Locke forgot the fundamental principles of practical philosophy.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 13.

2677. HUMOR admired. Abraham Lincoln. [To a party of friends he said:] There is a chap out in Ohio who has been writing a series of letters for the newspapers over the signature of Petroleum V. Nasby. Some one sent me a pamphlet collection of them the other day. I am going to write to "Petroleum" to come down here, and I intend to tell him, if he will communicate his talent to me, I will swap places with him!—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 744.

2678. HUMOR, Fondness for. Abraham Lincoln. [Frank B. Carpenter says:] I never knew him to sit down with a friend for a five minutes' chat without being "reminded" of one or more incidents about somebody alluded to in the course of conversation. In a corner of his desk he kept a copy of the latest humorous work; and it was frequently his habit when greatly fatigued, annoyed, or depressed to take this up, and read a chapter with great relief.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 744.

2679. HUNGER, Insatiable. Gold Seekers. A man came in one morning and reported that his comrades were some miles distant in the desert country, dying of starvation. [John A.]

Sutter instantly loaded a few of his best mules with provisions, and despatched them to the relief of the perishing band, under the guidance of two Indians. The starving party was so large that the supplies were insufficient. After consuming the provisions, they killed the mules and ate them; then they killed the two Indians and devoured them; and even after that, when some of their own number fell exhausted, they ate them.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 524.

2680. HURRICANE, Ominous. Bonaparte. At St. Helena, . . . on the 5th of May, 1821, died Napoleon Bonaparte. . . . A hurricane swept over the island as he was dying, shaking houses to their foundation and tearing up the largest trees. We cannot avoid thinking of the similar phenomenon that attended the death of Cromwell. . . . To Napoleon the war of the elements seemed as if "the noise of battle hurtled in the air," and he died uttering the words, Tête d'Armée.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 10.

2681. HUSBAND, Dignity of the. After the Revolution. [Under William's personal government Parliament discussed the question of the future rulers of the realm.] The prince, true to his promise that he would leave the settlement of the government to the Convention, had maintained an impenetrable reserve, and had not suffered any word, look, or gesture, indicative either of satisfaction or of displeasure, to escape him. One of his countrymen, who had a large share of his confidence, had been invited to the meeting, and was earnestly pressed by the peers to give them some information. He long excused himself. At last he so far yielded to their urgency as to say, "I can only guess at his Highness' mind. If you wish to know what I guess, I guess that he would not like to be his wife's gentleman usher; but I know nothing." "I know something now, however," said Danby. "I know enough, and too much."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 591.

2682. HUSBAND, A good. Cato the Censor. He used to say that they who beat their wives or children laid their sacrilegious hands on the most sacred things in the world; and that he preferred the character of a good husband to that of a great senator.—PLUTARCH'S CATO.

2683. HUSBAND governed by Wife. George II. In Queen Caroline George [II.] for ten years of his reign had such an adviser and friend as few sovereigns have ever been blessed with. She possessed the rare wisdom—difficult even in private life, but far more difficult in the relations of a king and his consort—of governing her husband without appearing to govern. She never offered an opinion when any matter of State was discussed between the king and his ministers in her presence; but her opinion was ever certain to prevail.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 4, p. 59.

2684. HUSBAND vs. Lover. Queen Elizabeth. Among those who chiefly distinguished themselves in these Spanish expeditions was the young Earl of Essex, a nobleman of great courage, fond of glory, and of a most enterprising disposition. He possessed no less the talents of a warrior than of a finished courtier; yet his impetuosity was apt to exceed the bounds of prudence. He was haughty and utterly impatient of advice or control. Elizabeth, then almost sixty years of age, was smitten with the personal charms of this accomplished youth; for it was peculiar to the queen, that though she had always rejected a husband, she was passionately fond of having a lover. The flattery of her courtiers had persuaded her that, though wrinkled and even deformed, she was yet young and beautiful; and she was not sensible of any disparity of choosing Essex for her partner in all the masks at court.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 28, p. 392.

2685. HUSBAND, Precedence of. *Reign of James II. [His daughter Mary was wife of William of Orange, who drove James from the throne.] On the present occasion, however, she judged that the claim of James to her obedience ought to yield to a claim more sacred. And, indeed, all divines and publicists agree in this, that when the daughter of a prince of one country is married to a prince of another country, she is bound to forget her own people and her father's house, and, in the event of a rupture between her husband and her parents, to side with her husband. This is the undoubted rule even when the husband is in the wrong; and to Mary the enterprise which William meditated appeared not only just, but holy.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 380.

2686. HUSBAND, Servitude of. *Belisarius. [After his conquests of Italy and his victory over the Persian] Belisarius reposed from his toils in the high station of general of the East and count of the domestics; and the older consuls and patricians respectfully yielded the precedence of rank to the peerless merit of the first of the Romans. The first of the Romans still submitted to be the slave of his wife. [See more at No. 1949].—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 43, p. 263.

2687. HUSBAND, A vicious. *Of Mary Queen of Scots. The consort of Mary made an ill return to her affection; he was a weak man, an abandoned profligate, and addicted to the meanest of vices. Pleased as she had been at first with his person and external accomplishments, it was impossible that her affection should not at length have given place to disgust at a character so worthless and despicable; and Darnley, enraged at her increasing coldness, was taught to believe that he was supplanted in the queen's affections by the arts and insinuations of a favorite—a despicable one indeed—the musician Rizzio, whom Mary had promoted to the office of her secretary. . . . A new plot was devised by Morton and Lethington, of which the weak and vicious Darnley was made an active instrument. The queen was then far advanced in her pregnancy, when, as she was one evening at supper in a private apartment of her palace, along with the Countess of Argyle, while her secretary Rizzio and some other of her domestics were in waiting, the Earl of Morton, with one hundred and sixty men, took possession of the palace; a few ruffians in arms broke into the apartment, Darnley himself showing the way by a private staircase; they overturned the table at which the queen sat, and seizing the secretary Rizzio, who clung for protection to the garments of his mistress, they stabbed him to the heart, and thence dragging him into the ante-chamber, laid him dead with numberless wounds.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 28, p. 386.

2688. HUSBANDRY, Changes by. *Caliph Omar. He requested that his lieutenant would place before his eyes the realm of Pharaoh and the Amalekites; and the answer of Amrou exhibits a lively and not unfaithful picture of that singular country. "O commander of the faithful, Egypt is a compound of black earth and green plants between a pulverized mountain and a red sand. . . . According to the vicissitudes of the seasons, the face of the country is adorned with a silver wave, a verdant emerald, and the deep yellow of a golden harvest."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 233.

2689. HUSBANDS, Good. *Romans. [The Sabines attacked the Romans, who had carried away their daughters and made them wives. The women rushed between the armies and plead for peace, speaking tenderly to both sides.] The generals proceeded to a conference. In the mean time the women presented their husbands and children to their fathers and brothers, brought refreshments to those that wanted them, and carried the wounded home to be cured. Here they showed them that they had the ordering of their own houses, what attentions their husbands paid them, and with what respect and indulgence they were treated. Upon this a peace was concluded, the conditions of which were, that such of the women as chose to remain with their husbands should be exempt from all labor and drudgery, except spinning; that the city should be inhabited by the Romans and Sabines in common, with the name of Rome, from Romulus.—PLUTARCH'S ROMULUS.

2690. HUSBANDS to love. *Wives to Obey. [Mary, wife of Prince William of Orange and the heir apparent to the English throne, was asked what her husband the prince should be if she became queen. She called in her husband and] she promised him he should always bear rule; and she asked only that he would obey the command of "Husbands, love your wives," as she should do that, "Wives, be obedient to your husbands in all things."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 27, p. 432.

2691. HYPOCHONDRIA, Constitutional. *William Cowper. When Cowper was thirty-two, and still living in the Temple, came the sad and decisive crisis of his life. He went mad, and attempted suicide. What was the source of his madness? There is a vague tradition that it arose from licentiousness, which, no doubt, is sometimes the cause of insanity. But in Cowper's case there is no proof of anything of the kind. . . . The truth is, his malady was simple hypochondria, having its source in delicacy of constitution and weakness of digestion, combined with the influence of melancholy surroundings. . . . When its crisis arrived he was living by himself without any society of the kind that suited him (for the excitement of the Nonsense Club was sure to be followed by reaction); he had lost his love, his father, his home, and, as it happened, also a dear friend; his little patrimony was fast dwindling away; he must have despaired of success in his profession; and his outlook was altogether dark. It yielded to the remedies to which hypochondria usually yields—air, exercise, sunshine, cheerful society, congenial occupation. It came with January and went with May.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 1.

2692. HYPOCRISY, Brazen. *Pope Adrian VI. [After the capture of Rome by the emperor

Charles V. the] helpless pope was treated with gross indignity, and closely imprisoned in the Castle of St. Angelo. Charles, with grotesque hypocrisy, professed the deepest distress at the misfortunes of the holy father, and ordered public prayers in all the churches of Spain for his deliverance.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 14, § 10.

2693. HYPOCRISY, Diplomatic. Bonaparte. [In Egypt he sought to conciliate the people by publishing:] "We Frenchmen are true Mussulmans. Have not we destroyed the pope, who called upon Europe to make war upon the Mussulmans? Have we not destroyed the Knights of Malta because these madmen believed that God had called them to make war upon Mussulmans?" After obtaining possession of Cairo, "'The Favorite of Victory' was seated in the grand mosque at the Feast of the Prophets, sitting cross-legged as he repeated the words of the Koran, and edified the sacred college by his piety."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 20, p. 354.

2694. HYPOCRISY exposed. Charles II. Two papers, in which were set forth very concisely the arguments ordinarily used by Roman Catholics in controversy with Protestants, had been found in Charles's strong-box, and appeared to be in his handwriting. These papers James showed triumphantly to several Protestants, and declared that, to his knowledge, his brother had lived and died a Roman Catholic. One of the persons to whom the manuscripts were exhibited was Archbishop Sancroft. He read them with much emotion, and remained silent. Such silence was only the natural effect of a struggle between respect and vexation.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 41.

2699. HYPOCRITE, An accomplished. "Dick" Talbot. Whenever he opened his mouth, he ranted, cursed, and swore with such frantic violence that superficial observers set him down for the wildest of libertines. The multitude was unable to conceive that a man who, even when sober, was more furious and boastful than others when they were drunk, and who seemed utterly incapable of disguising any emotion or keeping any secret, could really be a cold-hearted, far-sighted, scheming sycophant; yet such a man was Talbot. In truth, his hypocrisy was of a far higher and rarer sort than the hypocrisy which had flourished in Barebones' Parliament; for the consummate hypocrite is not he who conceals vice behind the semblance of virtue, but he who makes the vice which he has no objection to show a stalking horse to cover darker and more profitable vice which it is for his interest to hide.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 45.

2700. HYPOCRITE, Epitaph of the. Greek Emperor. [The Emperor Alexius was by the clergy esteemed a Christian.] But the sincerity of his moral and religious virtues was suspected by the persons who had passed their lives in his familiar confidence. In his last hours, when he was pressed by his wife Irene to alter the succession, he raised his head, and breathed a pious ejaculation on the vanity of this world. The indignant reply of the empress may be inscribed as an epitaph on his tomb: "You die, as you have lived—A HYPOCRITE!"—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 48, p. 620.

2701. IDEAS, Penalty for. John Milton. Proud, reserved, self-contained, repellent, brooding over his own ideas, not easily admitting into his mind the ideas of others. It is indeed an erroneous estimate of Milton to attribute to him a hard or austere nature. He had all the quick sensibility which belongs to the poetic temperament, and longed to be loved that he might love again. But he had to pay the penalty of all who believe in their own ideas, in that their ideas come between them and the persons that approach them, and constitute a mental barrier which can only be broken down by sympathy. And sympathy for ideas is hard to find, just in proportion as those ideas are profound, far-reaching, the fruit of long study and meditation. Hence it was that Milton did not associate readily with his contemporaries, but was affable and instructive in conversation with young persons, and those who would approach him in the attitude of disciples.—PATTISON'S MILTON, ch. 11.

2702. IDLENESS, Burden of, Spartans. The insipid and inactive life of the Spartans was accordingly a perpetual subject of railery to the rest of the Greeks, and to none more than to the busy, restless, and volatile Athenians. To this purpose Ælian mentions a witticism of Alcibiades, when some one was vaunting to him the contempt which the Lacedæmonians had for death: "It is no wonder," said he, "since it relieves them from the heavy burden of an idle and stupid life."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9, p. 97.

2703. IDLENESS punished, Beggars. Sturdy beggars . . . shall be set at work at the king's charges, some at Dover, and some at the place where the water hath broken in on the land, and other more places. Then if they fall to idleness, the idler shall be had before a justice of the peace and his fault written; then if he be taken idle again in another place, he shall be known where his dwelling is, so at the second mention he shall be burned in the hand; and if he fail the third time he shall die for it. [In 1536 it was whipping for the first offence, whipping for the second offence, and] the upper part of the gristle of the right ear clean cut off. [For the third offence, imprisonment in the jail,] and at the next quarter sessions, if indicted of wandering, loitering, and idleness, and found guilty, "he shall have judgment to suffer pains and execution of death as a felon and as an enemy of the Commonwealth."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 21, p. 342.

2704. ———. Athens. It was a punishable crime at Athens to be idle, and every citizen was compelled to industry and to the utmost exertion of his talents. It was not enough that each should choose himself a particular profession. The court of Areopagus inquired into and ascertained the extent of his funds, the amount of his expenditure, and consequently the measure of his industry and economy.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 10, p. 108.

2705. IDOL, A helpless, Brahmin. The pagoda of Sumnat was situate on the promontory of Guzarat, in the neighborhood of Diu, one of the last remaining possessions of the Portuguese. It was endowed with the revenue of two thousand villages; two thousand Brahmins were consecrated to the service of the Deity, whom they washed each morning and evening in water from the distant Ganges; the subordinate ministers consisted of three hundred musicians, three hundred barbers, and five hundred dancing girls, conspicuous for their birth or beauty. Three sides of the temple were protected by the ocean, the narrow isthmus was fortified by a natural or artificial precipice; and the city and adjacent country were peopled by a nation of fanatics. They confessed the sins and the punishment of Kinnoge and Delhi; but if the impious stranger should presume to approach their holy precincts, he would surely be overwhelmed by a blast of the divine vengeance. By this challenge the faith of Mahmud [the Turk] was animated to a personal trial of the strength of this Indian deity. Fifty thousand of his worshippers were pierced by the spear of the Moslems; the walls were scaled; the sanctuary was profaned; and the conqueror aimed a blow of his iron mace at the head of the idol. The trembling Brahmins are said to have offered £10,000,000 sterling for his ransom; and it was urged by the wisest counsellors that the destruction of a stone image would not change the hearts of the Gentoos, and that such a sum might be dedicated to the relief of the true believers. "Your reasons," replied the sultan, "are specious and strong; but never in the eyes of posterity shall Mahmud appear as a merchant of idols." He repeated his blows, and a treasure of pearls and rubies, concealed in the belly of the statue, explained in some degree the devout prodigality of the Brahmins. The fragments of the idol were distributed to Gazna, Mecca, and Medina.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 57, p. 502.

2706. IDOLATRY of Heroism. Claudius. [When he returned from the conquest of Britain] the army saluted him with the title of Imperator; and he returned to Rome, to assume the name of Britannicus, and to be worshipped as a god.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 2, p. 19.

2707. IGNORANCE of Bigotry. Reign of Charles II. Divines who were the boast of the universities and the delight of the capital . . . leaned toward constitutional principles of government, lived on friendly terms with Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists, would gladly have seen a full toleration granted to all Protestant sects, and would even have consented to make alterations in the Liturgy for the purpose of conciliating honest and candid Non-conformists. But such latitudinarianism was held in horror by the country parson. He was, indeed, prouder of his ragged gown than his superiors of their lawn and of their scarlet hoods. The very consciousness that there was little in his worldly circumstances to distinguish him from the villagers to whom he preached, led him to hold immoderately high the dignity of that sacerdotal office which was his single title to reverence.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 310.

2708. IGNORANCE confessed. Samuel Johnson. A few of his definitions must be admitted to be erroneous. . . . A lady once asked him how he came to define Pastern the knee of a horse; instead of making an elaborate defence, as she expected, he at once answered, "Ignorance, madam, pure ignorance." [Author of Dictionary, etc.]—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 79.

2709. IGNORANCE, Folly of. West Indians. They gave their own island of Hayti priority of existence over all others, and believed that the sun and moon originally issued out of a cavern in the island to give light to the world. This cavern still exists, about seven or eight leagues from Cape François, now Cape Haytien, and is known by the name of La Voute à Minguet. It is about one hundred and fifty feet in depth, and nearly the same in height, but very narrow. It receives no light but from the entrance, and from a round hole in the roof, whence it was said the sun and moon issued forth to take their places in the sky.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 6, ch. 10.

2710. IGNORANCE, General. Reign of Charles II. The clergy had also lost the ascendancy which is the natural reward of superior mental cultivation. Once the circumstance that a man could read had raised a presumption that he was in orders; but in an age which produced such laymen as William Cecil and Nicholas Bacon, Roger Ascham and Thomas Smith, Walter Mildmay and Francis Walsingham, there was no reason for calling away prelates from their dioceses to negotiate treaties, to superintend the finances, or to administer justice.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 303.

2711. IGNORANCE, Geographical. Captain John Smith. With a company of six Englishmen and two Indian guides he began the ascent of the Chickahominy River. It was generally believed by the people of Jamestown that by going up this stream they could reach the Pacific Ocean. Smith knew well enough the absurdity of such an opinion, but humored it because of the opportunity it gave him to explore new territory. The rest might dig imaginary gold dust and hunt for the Pacific; he would see the country and mark the course of the river.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 9, p. 99.

2712. IGNORANCE, Impediments of. Columbus. [The counsellors of the King of Spain urged against a westward voyage of discovery.] The doctrine of antipodes, . . . incompatible with the historical foundations of our faith, . . . would be to maintain that there were nations not descended from Adam; . . . in the Psalms the heavens are said to be extended like a hide—that is, . . . covering of a tent; . . . they brought up the chimera . . . of the insupportable heat of the torrid zone. . . . Even granting this could be passed, they observed that the circumference of the earth must be so great as to require at least three years to the voyage, and those who should undertake it must perish of hunger and thirst, from the impossibility of carrying provisions for so long a period. He was told, on the authority of Epicurus, that, admitting the earth to be spherical, it was only inhabitable in the northern hemisphere, and in that section only was canopied by the heavens; that the opposite half was a chaos, a gulf, or a mere waste of water. Not the least absurd objection advanced was, that should a ship even succeed in reaching, in this way, the extremity of India, she could never get back again; for the rotundity of the globe would present a kind of mountain, up which it would be impossible for her to sail with the most favorable wind.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 2, ch. 3.

2713. IGNORANCE, Loss by. Egyptians. While such was the state of affairs in the East, the Venetians, who had hitherto engrossed the whole trade from India, by means of the Red Sea and the port of Alexandria, soon perceived that this most lucrative commerce was on the point of annihilation, and that every advantage of the Indian trade must now be transferred to the Portuguese. Various expedients were thought of to obviate these impending misfortunes. It was the interest of the Sultan of Egypt to concur with the Venetians in support of a trade from which he as well as they had derived great benefits. A plan was meditated for some time of cutting through the Isthmus of Suez, and thus joining the Mediterranean and the Red Sea; but the Egyptians were apprehensive that their low and flat country might be drowned altogether in this attempt, and therefore the project was abandoned. [A.D. 1518.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 18, p. 270.

2714. IGNORANCE vs. Negligence. Samuel Johnson. [At school.] Mr. Hunter, the headmaster, according to his account, "was very severe, and wrong-headedly severe. He used," said he, "to beat us unmercifully; and he did not distinguish between ignorance and negligence; for he would beat a boy equally for not knowing a thing, as for neglecting to know it. He would ask a boy a question, and if he did not answer it he would beat him, without considering whether he had an opportunity of knowing how to answer it. For instance, he would call up a boy and ask him Latin for a candlestick, which the boy could not expect to be asked. Now, sir, if a boy could answer every question there was no need of a master to teach him."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 7.

2715. IGNORANCE, Night of. England. After the example of Charlemagne, the English Alfred, posterior to him about fifty years, introduced among the Anglo-Saxons a taste for literature, of which he himself, a most accomplished character, possessed a remarkable share. He encouraged learning, not only by his own example, but by founding seminaries and rewarding the labors of ingenious men. But these favorable appearances were blasted no less by the ignorance and barbarism of his successors than by the continual disorders of the kingdom from the Danish incursions; and from the age of Alfred to the Norman conquest there was in England a long night of the most illiberal ignorance.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 16, p. 244.

2716. IGNORANCE, Official. Duke of Newcastle. [The Duke of Newcastle, the Secretary of the Treasury under George II., was an ignorant official.] He had heard that 30,000 French had marched to Cape Breton. "Where did they get transports?" was asked. "Transports!" cried he; "I tell you they marched by land." "By land to the island of Cape Breton?" "What! is Cape Breton an island?" It was pointed out on the map; and the delighted minister, hugging his informant, ejaculated, "Egad! I'll go directly and tell the king that Cape Breton is an island."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 13, p. 198.

2717. ——. Duke of Newcastle. For nearly four and twenty years he remained minister for British America; yet to the last the statesman who was so deeply versed in the statistics of elections knew little of the continent of which he was the guardian. He addressed letters, it used to be confidently said, to "the island of New England," and could not tell but that Jamaica was in the Mediterranean. Heaps of colonial memorials and letters remained unread in his office; and a paper was almost sure of neglect unless some agent remained with him to see it opened.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 1.

2718. IGNORANCE, Professional. Navy. Most of the ships which were afloat were commanded by men who had not been bred to the sea. . . . Great fleets had been intrusted to the direction of Rupert and Monk; Rupert, who was renowned chiefly as a hot and daring cavalry officer, and Monk, who, when he wanted his ship to tack to larboard, moved the mirth of his crew by calling out, "Wheel to the left!" But about this time wise men began to perceive that the rapid improvement, both of the art of war and of the art of navigation, made it necessary to draw a line between two professions which had hitherto been confounded.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 279.

2719. IGNORANCE removed. Europeans. "Who could imagine," says M. Goguet, "that that ingenious people to whom Europe is indebted for all its knowledge were descended from savages who wandered in the woods and fields, without laws or leaders, having no other retreat but dens and caverns, ignorant even of the use of fire, and so barbarous as even to eat one another?"—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 7, p. 59.

2720. IGNORANCE, Royal. Eastern Empire. The elder Justin, as he is distinguished from another emperor of the same family and name, ascended the Byzantine throne at the age of sixty-eight years; and, had he been left to his own guidance, every moment of a nine years' reign must have exposed to his subjects the impropriety of their choice. His ignorance was similar to that of Theodoric; and it is remarkable that in an age not destitute of learning two contemporary monarchs had never been instructed in the knowledge of the alphabet.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40, p. 42.

2721. IGNORANCE, Stubborn. Inquisitors. In Rome, . . . 1633, . . . Galileo . . . appeared before an assembly of cardinals and inquisitors, where he was permitted to speak in his defence [against the charge of heresy]. He began to demonstrate the truth of the Copernican system, as he had been wont to do at the university. His accusers, ignorant of science, could not comprehend his reasoning. . . . They broke in upon his arguments with loud outcries, accusing him of bringing scandal upon the church, and repeating over and over the passage of the Bible which declares that Joshua commanded the sun and moon to stand still, and they obeyed him. In vain Galileo reminded them that the Bible also says that the heavens are solid and are polished like a mirror of brass; in vain he pointed out that the language of the Bible is invariably conformed to the state of science at the time when it was written. The assembled priests only shrugged their shoulders at his reasoning, or interrupted him with derisive and contemptuous shouts.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 263.

2722. IGNORANCE, Superstition of. Ancients. The ancients, who had a very faint and imperfect knowledge of the great peninsula of Africa, were sometimes tempted to believe that the torrid zone must ever remain destitute of inhabitants; and they sometimes amused their fancy by filling the vacant space with headless men, or rather monsters; with horned and cloven-footed satyrs; with fabulous centaurs, and with human pygmies, who waged a bold and doubtful warfare against the cranes.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 25, p. 576.

2723. IGNORANCE, Unappreciative. Utility. [When the army of Galerius sacked the camp of the routed Persians a] bag of shining leather, filled with pearls, fell into the hands of a private soldier; he carefully preserved the bag, but he threw away its contents, judging that whatever was of no use could not possibly be of any value.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13, p. 425.

2724. IGNORANCE, Zealous. Crusaders. [Among the Crusaders] the chiefs themselves had an imperfect notion of the length of the way and the state of their enemies; and such was the stupidity of the people, that, at the sight of the first city or castle beyond the limits of their knowledge, they were ready to ask whether that was not the Jerusalem, the term and object of their labors.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58, p. 552.

2725. ILLEGITIMACY respected. William the Conqueror. It appeared to Edward more advisable to nominate for his successor William, Duke of Normandy, a prince whose power, reputation, and great abilities were sufficient to support any destination which he might make in his favor. This celebrated prince was the natural son of Robert, Duke of Normandy, by the daughter of a furrier of Falaise. Illegitimacy in those days was accounted no stain, and his father left him, while yet a minor, heir to his whole dominions. He had to struggle with an arrogant nobility, several of whom even advanced claims to his crown; but he very early showed a genius capable of asserting and vindicating his rights, and soon became the terror both of his rebellious subjects and of foreign invaders.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 5, p. 115.

2726. ILLITERACY compensated. Col. William Washington. [Colonel Tarleton was made a prisoner with Cornwallis' army.] Because of his cruel and resentful disposition he was most heartily despised by the republicans. . . . Tarleton spoke of Washington as an illiterate fellow, hardly able to write his name. "Ah, colonel," said Mrs. Jones, "you ought to know better, for you bear on your person proof that he knows very well how to make his mark." [He had been severely wounded in his hand.]—NOTE IN CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 6.

2729. ILLUSTRATIONS, Use of. Abraham Lincoln. Much has been said of Mr. Lincoln's habit of telling stories, and it could scarcely be exaggerated. He had a keen sense of the humorous and the ludicrous, and relished jokes and anecdotes for the amusement they afforded him. But story-telling was with him rather a mode of stating and illustrating facts and opinions than anything else. There is a great difference among men in the manner of expressing their thoughts. Some are rigidly exact, and give everything they say a logical form; others express themselves in figures and by illustrations drawn from nature or history. Mr. Lincoln often gave clearness and force to his ideas by pertinent anecdotes and illustrations drawn from daily life.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 21, p. 720.

2730. IMAGE, Supernatural. *Image of Christ. [The perfect impression of His face on a piece of linen.] The image of Edessa was preserved with respect and gratitude; and if the Armenians rejected the legend, the more credulous Greeks adored the similitude, which was not the work of any mortal pencil, but the immediate creation of the divine original. The style and sentiments of a Byzantine hymn will declare how far their worship was removed from the grossest idolatry. "How can we with mortal eyes contemplate this image, whose celestial splendor the host of heaven presumes not to behold? He who dwells in heaven condescends this day to visit us by His venerable image; He who is seated on the cherubim visits us this day by a picture, which the Father has delineated with His immaculate hand, which He has formed in an ineffable manner, and which we sanctify by adoring it with fear and love." Before the end of the sixth century these images, made without hands (in Greek it is a single word), were propagated in the camps and cities of the Eastern empire; they were the objects of worship and the instruments of miracles; and in the hour of danger or tumult their venerable presence could revive the hope, rekindle the courage, or repress the fury of the Roman legions.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 49, p. 6.

2731. IMAGES in Churches. A.D. 300. The public religion of the early Catholics was uniformly simple and spiritual; and the first notice of the use of pictures is in the censure of the council of Illiberis, three hundred years after the Christian era. At first the experiment was made with caution and scruple, and the venerable pictures were discreetly allowed to instruct the ignorant, to awaken the cold, and to gratify the prejudices of the heathen proselytes. By a slow though inevitable progression the honors of the original were transferred to the copy; the devout Christian prayed before the image of a saint; and the Pagan rites of genuflection, luminaries, and incense again stole into the Catholic Church. The scruples of reason or piety were silenced by the strong evidence of visions and miracles; and the pictures which speak and move and bleed must be endowed with a divine energy, and may be considered as the proper objects of religious adoration. . . . The use and even the worship of images was firmly established before the end of the sixth century. . . . The first introduction of symbolic worship was in the veneration of the cross and of relics.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 49, p. 2.

sult the abbot. "Rather than abstain from adoring Christ and His Mother in their holy images, it would be better for you," replied the casuist, "to enter every brothel and visit every prostitute in the city."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 49, p. 38.

2733. IMAGINATION, Active. *Bunyan. He saw evil spirits in monstrous shapes, and fiends blowing flames out of their nostrils. "Once," says a biographer who knew him well, and had heard the story of his visions from his own lips, "he dreamed that he saw the face of heaven as it were on fire, the firmament crackling and shivering with the noise of mighty thunder, and an archangel flew in the midst of heaven, sounding a trumpet, and a glorious throne was seated in the east, whereon sat One in brightness like the morning star. Upon which he, thinking it was the end of the world, fell upon his knees and said, 'Oh, Lord, have mercy on me! What shall I do? The Day of Judgment is come, and I am not prepared.'"—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 1.

2734. IMAGINATION corrected. *Washington Irving. His next literary favorites were "Robinson Crusoe" and "Sindbad the Sailor," and a collection of voyages and travels, entitled "The World Displayed," which he used to read at night by the glimmer of secreted candles after he had retired to bed, and which begot in him a desire to go to sea—a strong desire that by the time he left school almost ripened into a determination to run away from home and be a sailor. It led him, at any rate, to try to eat salt pork, which he abominated, and to lie on the hard floor, which, of course, was distasteful to him. These preliminary hardships proved too much for his heroism, so the notion of becoming a gallant tar was reluctantly abandoned.—STODDARD'S IRVING, p. 13.

2735. IMAGINATION, Delusions of. *Spanish Explorers. America was the region of romance, where the heated imagination could indulge in the boldest delusions; where the simple natives ignorantly wore the most precious ornaments; and by the side of the clear runs of water the sands sparkled with gold.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 2.

2736. IMAGINATION, Diseased. *Poet Shelley. Toward midnight on the 18th of July Byron recited the lines in "Christabel" about the lady's breast; when Shelley suddenly started up, shrieked, and fled from the room. He had seen a vision of a woman with eyes instead of nipples. . . . He was writing notes upon the phenomena of sleep. . . . Mrs. Shelley informs us that the mere effort to remember dreams of thrilling or mysterious import so disturbed his nervous system that he had to relinquish the task. At no period of his life was he wholly free from visions which had the reality of facts. Sometimes they occurred in sleep, and were prolonged with painful vividness into his waking moments. Sometimes they seemed to grow out of his intense meditation, or to present themselves before his eyes as the projection of a powerful inner impression. All his sensations were abnormally acute, and his ever-active imagination confused the border-lands of the actual and the visionary.—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 4.

2737. IMAGINATION, Misled by the. Historians. The imagination is a great deceiver. We have a curious example of this truth in the different accounts which have come down to us respecting the appearance of General Washington. Josiah Quincy and his wife both saw this illustrious man, and both were persons of eminent intelligence and perfect truth. Nevertheless, how different their impressions! Mrs. Quincy, who was of a highly imaginative temperament, used to speak of him as being as far above ordinary mortals, in grace and majesty of person and demeanor, as he was in character. Mr. Quincy, on the contrary, though revering Washington not less, thought him rather countrified and awkward in his appearance and manners. He used to say that "President Washington had the air of a country gentleman not accustomed to mix much with society, perfectly polite, but not easy in his address and conversation, and not graceful in his gait and movements." We can account for these different representations by supposing that one of the witnesses was, and the other was not, misled by the imagination.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 755.

2738. IMAGINATION overwrought. Poet Shelley. His somnambulism returned, and he saw visions. On one occasion he thought that the dead Allegra rose from the sea, and clapped her hands, and laughed, and beckoned to him. On another he roused the whole house at night by his screams, and remained terror-frozen in the trance produced by an appalling vision. This mood he communicated, in some measure, to his friends. One of them saw what she afterward believed to have been his phantom, and another dreamed that he was dead.—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 7.

2739. IMAGINATION, Ruled by. Napoleon I. "It is nothing but imagination," said one, once to Napoleon. "Nothing but imagination!" he rejoined. "Imagination rules the world."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 19.

2740. IMAGINATION in Statesmanship. Napoleon I. [A.D. 1798. He was about to begin his campaign.] In private he expressed in the strongest terms his horror of Jacobin cruelty and despotism. "The Directors [of France]," said he, "cannot long retain their position. They know not how to do anything for the imagination of the nation."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 10.

2741. IMAGINATION, Suffering by. Blaise Pascal. As he was riding one day in Paris, in a carriage drawn by four horses, the leading horses took fright, ran away, and dashing upon a bridge, which was without railings, sprang into the water. Fortunately the traces broke, the carriage stopped on the very edge of the bridge, and no one was injured. Pascal, however, whose mind and body were worn and weakened by excessive study, was so completely terrified that for many months he fancied he saw an abyss yawning at his side, into which he was about to be precipitated. To break the illusion, he would place a chair at that side of him; but it was long before he could lose the sense of imminent peril from this imaginary precipice.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 100.

2742. IMAGINATION, Victim of. Columbus. [From natives of San Salvador.] He understood

also that there was land to the south, the south-west, and the north-west, and that the people from the last-mentioned quarter frequently proceeded to the south-west in quest of gold and precious stones, making in their way descents upon the islands, and carrying off the inhabitants. Several of the natives showed him scars of wounds received in battles with these invaders. It is evident that a great part of this fancied intelligence was self-delusion on the part of Columbus; for he was under a spell of the imagination, which gave its own shapes and colors to every object. He was persuaded that he had arrived among the islands described by Marco Polo as lying opposite Cathay, in the Chinese sea, and he construed everything to accord with the account given of those opulent regions. Thus the enemies which the natives spoke of as coming from the north-west he concluded to be the people of the mainland of Asia.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 4, ch. 1.

2743. IMITATION, Fameless. Fenimore Cooper. He had never given any indication of possessing a talent for literature. . . . He was reading aloud to his wife one of those tedious and trivial English novels which were so common before Scott and Cooper supplanted them. Weary of the spiritless delineation of inane characters, he said to his wife, with a yawn, "I can write a better novel than that myself." . . . "You had better try," replied she, and thought no more of it. It was a happy and a timely suggestion. He was young, energetic, with plenty of ambition, and nothing to do. Without telling even his wife of his intention, he began to write a novel, which he named "Precaution," and which, after a few weeks of secret toil, he had the pleasure of submitting to his wife's inspection, and reading it to a circle of friends. It is a curious thing, but he produced merely a tolerable imitation of the very kind of novel with which he had been so much disgusted. . . . This partial failure was the event which roused him to a consciousness of his abilities. He now abandoned English models, and formed the scheme of producing a story of American life, a tale of the Revolution—the classic period in the history of the infant nation. The "Spy" was the result of his labors—the first and greatest of a class of novels now to be numbered by thousands.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 725

2744. IMITATION unappreciated. Art. [Agasilus, the Lacedæmonian king,] being asked to go to hear a man who mimicked the nightingale to great perfection, he refused and said, "I have heard the nightingale herself."—PLUTARCH'S AGESILAUS.

2745. IMMORTALITY, Belief in. Poet Shelley. Whatever Shelley may from time to time have said about the immortality of the soul, he was no materialist, and no believer in the extinction of the spiritual element by death. Yet he was too wise to dogmatize upon a problem which by its very nature admits of no solution in this world. "I hope," he said, "but my hopes are not unmixed with fear for what will befall this inestimable spirit when we appear to die." On another occasion he told Trelawny, "I am content to see no farther into futurity than Plato and Bacon. My mind is tranquil; I have no fears and some hopes. In our present gross material state our faculties are clouded ; when death removes our clay coverings, the mystery will be solved."—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 6.

2746. IMMORTALITY, Faith in. Arabs. [Some of the Arabs think] the life of man to be but one of those infinite periods of existence to be renewed in other worlds and under other forms. When an Arab died, his finest camel was tied to a stake beside his grave, and left to expire of hunger upon the body of its master, in order that he should be furnished with his habitual moutage in the region to which death had introduced him.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 46.

2747. IMMORTALITY, Hope of. Raleigh. Sir Walter Raleigh, the night before his death, wrote these lines on a blank leaf of his Bible :

'E'en such is time ; who takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have,
And pays us but with age and dust ;
Who in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wander'd all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days,
But from this earth, this grave, this dust,
The Lord will raise me up, I trust."

—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 24, p. 376.

2748. IMPATIENCE, Disagreement by. Alexander Hamilton. This impatience and discontent led finally to a rupture between General Washington and his aide-de-camp. . . . Hamilton himself has related : "Two days ago . . . the general and I passed each other on the stairs ; he told me he wanted to speak with me ; I answered that I would wait upon him immediately. I went below and delivered Mr. Tilghman a letter to be sent to the commissary, containing an order of a pressing and interesting nature. Returning to the general, I was stopped on the way by the Marquis de Lafayette, and we conversed together about a minute on a matter of business. He can testify how impatient I was to get back, and that I left him in a manner which, but for our intimacy, would have been more than abrupt. Instead of finding the general, as is usual, in his room, I met him at the head of the stairs, where, accosting me in an angry voice, 'Colonel Hamilton,' said he, 'you have kept me waiting at the head of the stairs these ten minutes ; I must tell you, sir, you treat me with disrespect.' I replied, without petulancy, but with decision, 'I am not conscious of it, sir ; but since you have thought it necessary to tell me so, we part.' 'Very well, sir,' said he, 'if it be your choice,' or something to that effect, and we separated. I sincerely believe my absence, which gave so much umbrage, did not last two minutes. In less than an hour after Mr. Tilghman came to me in the general's name, assuring me of his confidence in my ability, integrity, usefulness, etc., and of his desire, in a candid conversation, to heal a difference which could not have happened but in a moment of passion. I requested Mr. Tilghman to tell him, first, that I had taken my resolution in a manner not to be revoked."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 473.

2749. IMPATIENCE, Folly of. Oliver Goldsmith. Goldsmith adverts, in his own humorous way, to his impatience at the tardiness with which his desultory and unacknowledged essays crept into notice. "I was once induced," says he, "to show my indignation against the public by discontinuing my efforts to please, and was bravely resolved, like Raleigh, to vex them by burning my manuscripts in a passion. Upon reflection, however, I considered what set or body of people would be displeased at my rashness. The sun, after so sad an accident, might shine next morning as bright as usual ; men might laugh and sing the next day, and transact business as before ; and not a single creature feel any regret but myself. . . . Perhaps all Grub Street might laugh at my fate, and self-approving dignity be unable to shield me from ridicule."—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 9, p. 66.

2750. IMPEACHMENT, Escape from. President Johnson. Concerning the reorganization of the Southern States, the real question at issue was whether a civil or a military method . . . ought to be adopted. . . . The President had urged [the former] ; . . . in Congress the opposite opinion prevailed. . . . On the 21st of February, 1868, he notified Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, of his dismissal from office. The act was regarded by Congress as a usurpation of authority, and a violation of law on the part of the President. . . . Articles of impeachment were agreed to by the House of Representatives. . . . On the 26th of May . . . the President was acquitted. But his escape was very narrow : a two-thirds majority [of the Senate] was required to convict, and but one vote was wanting.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 67, p. 550.

2751. IMPORTUNITY, Victim of. Charles II. He was a slave without being a dupe. Worthless men and women, to the very bottom of whose hearts he saw, and whom he knew to be destitute of affection for him and undeserving of his confidence, could easily wheedle him out of titles, places, domains, State secrets, and pardons. He bestowed much, yet he neither enjoyed the pleasure nor acquired the fame of beneficence. He never gave spontaneously, but it was painful to him to refuse. The consequence was, that his bounty generally went, not to those who deserved it best, nor even to those whom he liked best, but to the most shameless and importunate suitor who could obtain an audience.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 158.

2752. IMPOSSIBILITIES accomplished. Bridge at Lodi. A. D. 1796. [Napoleon proposed to cross the bridge at Lodi in the face of the Austrian batteries that swept it.] "It is impossible," said one [of his officers], "that any men can force their way across that narrow bridge, in the face of such an annihilating storm of balls as must be encountered." "How ! impossible !" exclaimed Napoleon ; "that word is not French." [Napoleon, bearing a standard, was the second across.] —ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 5.

2753. IMPOSITION, Artful. Alexander. It was impossible to retain the territory he had overrun ; and his troops, foreseeing no end to their labors, positively refused to proceed. With a sensible mortification to his pride, he was forced to return to the Indus, after rearing, as monuments of his conquests, twelve altars upon the eastern banks of the Hyphasis, of enormous height, on which he inscribed his own name, with those of his father Ammon and his brothers Hercules and Apollo. He is said also to have traced a camp in the same place of three times the necessary extent, surrounding it with a strong rampart and fosse, and to have built in it enormous stables for horses, with the mangers of a most extraordinary height. He is, in like manner, said to have caused suits of armor to be buried in the earth, of size far exceeding the human proportions, with bedsteads, and all other utensils on a similar gigantic scale.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4, p. 190.

2754. IMPOSITION, Official. William Cowper's Letter. [To Rev. John Newton,] the junior son of Molly Boswell. He had stolen some iron-work, the property of Griggs the butcher. Being convicted, he was ordered to be whipped, which operation he underwent at the cart's tail, from the stone-house to the high arch, and back again. He seemed to show great fortitude, but it was all an imposition upon the public. The beadle, who performed it, had filled his left hand with yellow ochre, through which, after every stroke, he drew the lash of his whip, leaving the appearance of a wound upon the skin, but in reality not hurting him at all. This being perceived by Mr. Constable H., who followed the beadle, he applied his cane, without any such management or precaution, to the shoulders of the too merciful executioner. The scene immediately became more interesting. The beadle could by no means be prevailed upon to strike hard, which provoked the constable to strike harder; and this double flogging continued till a lass of Silver End, pitying the pitiful beadle thus suffering under the hands of the pitiless constable, joined the procession, and placing herself immediately behind the latter, seized him by his capillary club, and pulling him backward by the same, slapped his face with a most Amazon fury. This concatenation of events has taken up more of my paper than I intended it should, but I could not forbear to inform you how the beadle thrashed the thief, the constable the beadle, and the lady the constable, and how the thief was the only person concerned who suffered nothing.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 7.

2755. IMPOSTOR, Contemptible. Lambert Simmel. The reign of Henry VII. was disturbed for awhile by two very singular enterprises. The Earl of Warwick, son of the late Duke of Clarence, had been confined by Richard in the Tower, and by his long imprisonment was totally unknown, and unacquainted with the world. One Simon, a priest of Oxford, trained up a young man, Lambert Simmel, the son of a baker, to counterfeit the Earl of Warwick's person, and instructed him in the knowledge of all the facts which were necessary to support the imposture. He first made his public appearance in Dublin, where he found many to espouse his cause, and he was there solemnly crowned King of England and Ireland. Thence passing over to England, he ventured to give battle to Henry near Nottingham. Simmel, with his tutor, the priest, were both taken prisoners. The priest, who could not be tried by the civil power, was imprisoned for life; and the impostor himself, who was too mean an object for the revenge of Henry, was employed by him as a scullion in his kitchen.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14, p. 229.

2756. IMPOSTOR, Deceived by a. Perkin Warbeck. The old Duchess of Burgundy, sister of Edward IV. and widow of Charles the Bold, who wished by all means to embroil the government of Henry, caused a report to be spread that the young Duke of York, who, along with his brother Edward, was hitherto believed to have been smothered in the Tower by Richard III., was still alive, and she soon after produced a young man who assumed his name and character; this was Perkin Warbeck, the son of a Jew broker of Antwerp, a youth of great personal beauty and insinuating address. He found means, for a considerable time, to carry on the deception, and seemed, from his valor and abilities, to be not undeserving of the rank which he assumed. For five years he supported his cause by force of arms, and was aided by a respectable proportion of the English nobility. James IV., King of Scotland, espoused his interest, and gave him in marriage a relation of his own, a daughter of the Earl of Huntley. . . . [He was captured and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14, p. 229.

2757. ———. Reign of James II. In 1698, when England had long enjoyed constitutional freedom under a new dynasty, the son of an inn-keeper passed himself on the yeomanry of Sussex as their beloved Monmouth, and defrauded many who were by no means of the lowest class. Five hundred pounds were collected for him. The farmers provided him with a horse. Their wives sent him baskets of chickens and ducks, and were lavish, it was said, of favors of a more tender kind; for, in gallantry at least, the counterfeit was a not unworthy representative of the original. When this impostor was thrown into prison for his fraud, his followers maintained him in luxury.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 583.

2758. IMPOSTOR punished. Reign of James II. Such was the devotion of the people to their unhappy favorite, that, in the face of the strongest evidence by which the fact of a death was ever verified, many continued to cherish a hope that he was still living, and that he would again appear in arms. A person, it was said, who was remarkably like Monmouth had sacrificed himself to save the Protestant hero. The vulgar long continued, at every important crisis, to whisper that the time was at hand, and that King Monmouth would soon show himself. In 1686 a knave who had pretended to be the duke, and had levied contribution in several villages of Wiltshire, was apprehended and whipped from Newgate to Tyburn.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 583.

2759. IMPOSTOR reproved. General Grant. [Early in the war his command were marching in Missouri. One of the lieutenants obtained refreshments for himself and friends by assuming to be General Grant and staff. Grant came to the same house for refreshments, and was curtly told he could have nothing, because General Grant and staff had eaten everything except a pumpkin-pie. Grant gave half a dollar for it, and requested the woman to keep it till sent for. When the army halted, parade was formed, and expectations aroused by so unusual a circumstance when on a long march. The following order was read: "Lieutenant Wickfield, . . . having on this day eaten everything in Mrs. Selvidge's house, at the crossing, . . . except one pumpkin-pie, Lieutenant Wickfield is hereby ordered to return with an escort of one hundred cavalry and eat that pie also.—U. S. Grant, Brigadier-General Commander.” It is impossible to describe the effect . . . on the troops.—HEADLEY’S GRANT, p. 50.

2760. IMPOSTOR rewarded. Titus Oates. A worthless impostor, one Titus Oates, who had more than once changed his religion, now set the whole nation in a ferment by the discovery of a pretended plot of the Catholics. He asserted that the pope, claiming the sovereignty of England, had intrusted the exercise of his power to the Jesuits, who had already got patents for the principal offices of the kingdom; that fifty Jesuits had undertaken that the king should be assassinated, and the crown bestowed on the Duke of York, who, if he declined it, was likewise to be murdered; that the Jesuits, who it was supposed had already almost reduced London to ashes in the late dreadful fire, had planned another fire and massacre, with which they intended to begin the execution of their project. . . . The informer received the thanks of Parliament, with a pension of £1200 sterling.—TYTLER’S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30, p. 421.

2761. IMPOSTURE, Political. “Voice in the Wall.” [In 1554, when England was disquieted by the partisans for Catholic Mary on the one side, against those of Protestant Elizabeth on the other,] imposture availed itself of the prevailing disquiet to stimulate the superstitious by a pretended voice in a wall, which was silent when “God save Queen Mary” was uttered, but which cried, “So be it” when “God save the Lady Elizabeth” was pronounced. More than 17,000 persons were collected round this house.—KNIGHT’S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 5, p. 72.

2762. IMPRESSIONS, Early. William III. [William, Prince of Orange.] The Dutch language was the language of his nursery. Among the Dutch gentry he had chosen his early friends. The amusements, the architecture, the landscape of his native country had taken hold on his heart. To her he turned with constant fondness from a prouder and fairer rival. In the gallery of Whitehall he pined for the familiar house in the wood at the Hague, and never was so happy as when he could quit the magnificence of Windsor for his far humbler seat at Loo. During his splendid banishment it was his consolation to create round him, by building, planting, and digging, a scene which might remind him of the formal piles of red brick, of the long canals, and of the symmetrical flower-beds amid which his early life had been passed.—MACAULAY’S ENG., ch. 7, p. 168.

2763. IMPRESSIONS, Tragical. Charles I. Then taking the little Duke of Gloucester, who was only five years old, upon his knees, and desiring to impress upon the mind of the infant, by a tragical image, the counsel which through him he addressed to all the family, “My child,” said he, “they are going to cut off thy father’s head!” The boy gazed with anxious and astonished looks upon the countenance of the speaker. “Yes,” continued the king, seeking to fix the terrible remembrance by repetition, “they will cut off my head, and perhaps make thee king! But pay attention to my words: thou must not be made a king by them while thy elder brothers, Charles and James, are living. They will cut off their heads also, if they can lay hands on them, and will end by cutting off thine. I therefore command thee never to be made a king by them.” The child, who was impressed with the mournful scene and solemn warning, appeared suddenly struck by a light and a sense of obedience beyond his age. “No,” he replied, “I will not consent—they shall never make me a king. I will be torn to pieces first!” Charles, in this infantine heroism, recognized a voice from heaven, which assured him that his posterity would be true to themselves in seeking to restore the throne after his decease. He shed tears of joy as he surrendered back the Duke of Gloucester to the arms of the jailers.—LAMARTINE’S CROMWELL, p. 46.

2764. IMPRISONMENT, Long. John Bunyan’s. Such was the world-famous imprisonment of John Bunyan, which has been the subject of so much eloquent declamation. It lasted in all for more than twelve years. It might have ended at any time if he would have promised to confine his addresses to a private circle. It did end after six years. He was released under the first declaration of indulgence; but as he instantly recommenced his preaching, he was arrested again. Another six years went by; he was again let go, and was taken once more immediately after, preaching in a wood. This time he was detained but a few months, and in form more than reality. The policy of the government was then changed, and he was free for the rest of his life.—FROUDE’S BUNYAN, ch. 6.

2765. IMPROVEMENT opposed. Elias Howe. Like all the other great inventors, Mr. Howe found that when he had completed his machine his difficulties had but begun. After he had brought the machine to the point of making a few stitches, he went to Boston one day to get a tailor to come to Cambridge and arrange some cloth for sewing, and give his opinion as to the quality of the work done by the machine. The comrades of the man to whom he first applied dissuaded him from going, alleging that a sewing-machine, if it worked well, must necessarily reduce the whole fraternity of tailors to beggary; and this proved to be the unchangeable conviction of the tailors for the next ten years. It is probable that the machines first made would have been destroyed by violence but for another fixed opinion of the tailors, which was, that no machine could be made that would really answer the purpose.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 683.

2766. IMPROVEMENT repressed. Social. [In the beginning of the eighteenth century] the facilities possessed by the people of passing from one occupation to another occupation were very limited, and the power of what we term rising in the world was equally restricted. In the locality in which a laborer was born he generally remained to the end of his life. . . . The severe enforcement of the laws of apprenticeship kept a man forever in the particular pursuit for which he had served seven years of dreary education.—KNIGHT’S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 4, p. 48.

2767. IMPULSE, Success by. Sylla writes in his Commentaries that his instantaneous resolutions and enterprises, executed in a manner different from what he had intended, always succeeded better than those on which he bestowed the most time and forethought. It is plain too from that saying of his, that he was born rather for fortune than war, that he attributed more to fortune than to valor.—PLUTARCH'S SYLLA.

2769. INAUGURATION, Mystic. Togrul. [The Sultan of Turkey.] After the chastisement of the guilty and the restoration of peace, the royal shepherd accepted the reward of his labors; and a solemn comedy represented the triumph of religious prejudice over barbarian power. The Turkish sultan embarked on the Tigris, landed at the gate of Racca, and made his public entry on horseback. At the palace-gate he respectfully dismounted and walked on foot, preceded by his emirs without arms. The caliph [Cayem] was seated behind his black veil; the black garment of the Abbassides was cast over his shoulders, and he held in his hand the staff of the apostle of God. The conqueror of the East kissed the ground, stood some time in a modest posture, and was led toward the throne by the vizier and an interpreter. After Togrul had seated himself on another throne, his commission was publicly read, which declared him the temporal lieutenant of the vicar of the prophet. He was successively invested with seven robes, seven climates of the Arabian empire. His mystic veil was perfumed with musk; two crowns were placed on his head, two cimeters were girded to his side, as the symbols of a double reign over the East and West.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 57, p. 510.

2770. INAUGURATION, Simplicity of. Thomas Jefferson. The President-elect... was dressed in plain cloth, which was very unusual at that time, as we may see in old portraits. He came out of his lodgings unattended, and mounted his horse, which had been waiting for him before his door. He rode to the Capitol, unaccompanied by any friend, and without a servant, and when he had reached the building he dismounted without assistance, and with his own hands tied the horse to a paling of the fence. He was received at the steps of the Capitol by a large number of his political friends, who absolutely would not permit him to carry out his intention of going alone to the senate-chamber to take the oath of office. A kind of procession was formed, and they walked together to the apartment.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 353.

2771. INCAPACITY, Official. Bibulus. The weather was wild. Even of transports he had but enough to carry half his army in a single trip.

With such a prospect and with the knowledge that if he reached Greece at all he would have to land in the immediate neighborhood of Pompey's enormous host, surprise has been expressed that Cæsar did not prefer to go round through Ilyria, keeping his legions together. But Cæsar had won many victories by appearing where he was least expected. He liked well to descend like a bolt out of the blue sky; and for the very reason that no ordinary person would under such circumstances have thought of attempting the passage, he determined to try it. Long marches exhausted the troops. In bad weather the enemy's fleet preferred the harbors to the open sea; and perhaps he had a further and special ground of confidence in knowing that the officer in charge at Corfu was his old acquaintance, Bibulus—Bibulus, the fool of the aristocracy, the butt of Cicero, who had failed in everything which he had undertaken, and had been thanked by Cato for his ill successes. Cæsar knew the men with whom he had to deal. He knew Pompey's incapacity; he knew Bibulus's incapacity.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 22.

2772. INCENDIARY punished. Roman. After the previous ceremony of whipping, he himself was delivered to the flames; and in his example alone our reason is tempted to applaud the justice of retaliation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 372.

2773. INCONSISTENCY of Character. Pity. To a point of honor Motassem, the Mohammedan general, had sacrificed a flourishing city, two hundred thousand lives, and the property of millions. The same caliph descended from his horse and dirtied his robe to relieve the distress of a decrepit old man, who, with his laden ass, had tumbled into a ditch. On which of these actions did he reflect with the most pleasure when he was summoned by the angel of death?—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 52, p. 320.

2774. INCONSISTENCY, Christian. Effect. [The Emperor Julian is known in history as "the Apostate."] The cause of his strange and fatal apostasy may be derived from the early period of his life, when he was left an orphan in the hands of the murderers of his family. The names of Christ and of Constantius, the ideas of slavery and of religion, were soon associated in a youthful imagination, which was susceptible of the most lively impressions. [Constantius murdered his father and mother and imprisoned him during his youth.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 23, p. 410.

2775. INCONSISTENCY, Disgraceful. William Penn. [See No. 1842.] Then Penn tried a gentler tone. He had an interview with Hough and with some of the fellows, and, after many professions of sympathy and friendship, began to hint at a compromise. The king could not bear to be crossed. The college must give way. Parker must be admitted. But he was in very bad health. All his preferments would soon be vacant. "How should you like," said Penn, "to see Doctor Hough Bishop of Oxford?" Penn had passed his life in declaiming against a hireling ministry. He held that he was bound to refuse the payment of tithes, and this even when he had bought land chargeable with tithes, and had been allowed the value of the tithes in the purchase-money. According to his own principles, he would have committed a great sin if he had interfered for the purpose of obtaining a benefice on the most honorable terms for the most pious divine. Yet to such a degree had his manners been corrupted by evil communications, and his understanding obscured by inordinate zeal for a single object, that he did not scruple to become a broker in simony of a peculiarly discreditable kind, and to use a bishopric as a bait to tempt a divine to perjury.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 275.

2776. INCONSISTENCY by Self-interest. Samuel Johnson. Having defined the word pension as "pay given to a State hiring for treason to his country," he himself became a pensioner; and . . . with small hire . . . set about the task of his work-masters. In a tract called "Taxation no Tyranny," he echoed to the crowd [the wishes of the ministry against America].—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 24.

2777. INCREASE, Ineffective. George III. A.D. 1775. [He was determined to crush the opposition of the American colonies.] When he announced that a numerous body of German troops was to join the British forces, [the Duke of] Grafton [keeper of the privy seal] answered earnestly: "Your Majesty will find too late that twice the number will only increase the disgrace, and never effect the purpose."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 51.

2778. INDECISION of Timidity. Conspirator. [Gaston of Orleans and Count de Soissons entered into a conspiracy against the life of Richelieu.] The unsuspecting minister descended the staircase surrounded by the conspirators, and at this moment his fate hung upon a thread. But Gaston's nerve failed him: he hesitated to give the appointed signal; the rest dared not strike without his orders; they separated, and the cardinal escaped.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 19, § 12.

2779. INDECISION in Wrong-doing. James II. [The clergy had generally refused to read the king's anti-Protestant manifesto.] Even the king stood aghast for a moment at the violence of the tempest which he had raised. What step was he to take next? He must either advance or recede; and it was impossible to advance without peril, or to recede without humiliation. At one moment he determined to put forth a second order, enjoining the clergy in high and angry terms to publish his declaration, and menacing every one who should be refractory with instant suspension. This order was drawn up and sent to the press, then recalled, then a second time sent to the press, then recalled a second time.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 328.

2780. INDEPENDENCE, American. Samuel Adams. [The governor of Massachusetts, in October, 1773, wrote Lord Dartmouth, the colonial secretary, that Samuel Adams] was the first person that openly and in any public assembly declared for a total independence.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 22, p. 337.

2781. INDEPENDENCE, Childish. Young Samuel Johnson. One day when the servant who used to be sent to school to conduct him home not having come in time, he set out by himself, though he was then so near-sighted that he was obliged to stoop on his hands and knees to take a view of the kennel before he ventured to step over it. His schoolmistress, afraid that he might miss his way or fall into the kennel, or be run over by a cart, followed him at some distance. He happened to turn about and perceive her. Feeling her careful attention as an insult to his manliness, he ran back to her in a rage, and beat her as well as his strength would permit.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 5.

2782. INDEPENDENCE, Declaration of. American. Thus, on the 4th of July, was completed what has been not unjustly termed "the most memorable public document which history records."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 23, p. 367.

2783. — — — Congress. August 3, 1776. The members of Congress, having no army but a transient one, no confederation, no treasury, no supplies of materials of war, signed the Declaration of Independence, which had been engrossed on parchment.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 2.

2784. INDEPENDENCE defeated. Canadian. In the latter part of 1837 there was an insurrection in Canada. A portion of the people, dissatisfied with the British Government, broke out in revolt, and attempted to establish their independence. The insurgents found much sympathy and encouragement in the United States. . . . Seven hundred men [from New York] seized and fortified Navy Island, in the Niagara River. The loyalists of Canada attempted to capture the place, and failed. They succeeded, however, in firing the Caroline, the supply-ship of the adventurers, cut her moorings, and sent the burning vessel over Niagara Falls. . . . The President [Van Buren] issued a proclamation of neutrality, forbidding interference with the affairs of Canada. The New York insurgents on Navy Island were obliged to surrender, and order was restored.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 55, p. 438.

2785. INDEPENDENCE determined. Algernon Sidney. While hunting with Louis XIV. . . . in a royal park near Paris, . . . the king was so captivated by the stranger's horse that he determined to possess it, and sent a messenger to ask the owner to name the price and deliver the animal. This was the king's way of buying anything upon which he had fixed covetous eyes, and no one ever presumed to refuse him. But this Englishman, to the surprise of the messenger, and to the great irritation of the king, replied to the proposal that his horse was not for sale. The haughty monarch caused a liberal price for a horse to be counted out, and sent it to the Englishman, with a positive order to accept the same and surrender the animal. An exile from his native land, where, at that bad time, there was no justice for such as he, where king and ministers were the paid servants of the French monarch, he seemed to have no choice but to obey. But this was a man of the heroic type. He drew a pistol, and shot the horse through the head, saying: "My horse was born a free creature, has served a free man, and shall not be mastered by a king of slaves." There you have Algernon Sidney, the blunt, brave, noble-minded Republican, among the first of his time and country who clearly understood the rights of man and the just foundation of human government—the forerunner of our Jefferson and Madison.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 807.

2786. INDEPENDENCE, Domestic. Washington's Mother. George Washington asked her to come and live with him at Mount Vernon. "I thank you, George," she said, "but I prefer being independent." And so to the last she lived in her own plain farmhouse, and superintended the culture of her own acres, not disdaining to labor with her own hands. When Lafayette visited her he found her at work in her garden, with her old sun-bonnet on, and she came in to see him, saying, "I would not pay you so poor a compliment, marquis, as to stay to change my dress."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 11.

2787. INDEPENDENCE, Ministerial. Methodists. [In 1796 Dr. Coke presided at the session of the Methodist Conference held at Baltimore; and one of the striking features of this good Englishman's character was, that he was impatient of contradiction, and not wholly insensible to his own personal importance. He had on this occasion introduced some proposition which seemed to some of the preachers a little dictatorial; and one of them, an Irishman, by the name of Mathews, . . . sprung to his feet, and cried out, "Popery! Popery! Popery!" Dr. Coke rebuked the impulsive rudeness of Mathews. While the conference was now in a state of great suspense and agitation, Dr. Coke seized the paper containing his own resolution, and tearing it up, not in the most moderate manner, looked round upon the preachers, and said, "Do you think yourselves equal to me?" Nelson Reed instantly arose, and said: "Dr. Coke has asked whether we think ourselves equal to him; I answer, Yes; we do think ourselves equal to him, notwithstanding he was educated at Oxford, and has been honored with the degree of Doctor of Laws; and more than that, we think ourselves equal to Dr. Coke's king." [The doctor saw his error, and asked pardon.]—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 2, p. 70.

2788. INDEPENDENCE, Natural. Julius Cæsar. Cæsar was now eighteen, his daughter Julia having been lately born. He had seen his party ruined, his father-in-law and young Marius killed, and his nearest friends dispersed or murdered. . . . The dictator had his eye on him, and Sylla had seen something in "the youth with the loose girdle" which struck him as remarkable. Closely connected though Cæsar was both with Cinna and Marius, Sylla did not wish to kill him if he could help it. There was a cool calculation in his cruelties. . . . Making a favor perhaps of his clemency, he proposed to Cæsar to break with his liberal associates, divorce Cinna's daughter, and take such a wife as he would himself provide. If Pompey had complied, who had made a position of his own, much more might it be expected that Cæsar would comply. Yet Cæsar answered with a distinct and unhesitating refusal. The terrible Sylla, in the fulness of his strength, after desolating half the homes in Italy, after revolutionizing all Roman society, from the peasant's cottage in the Apennines to the senate-house itself, was defied by a mere boy! Throughout his career Cæsar displayed always a singular indifference to life. He had no sentimental passion about him, no Byronic mock-heroics. He had not much belief either in God or the gods. On all such questions he observed from first to last a profound silence. But one conviction he had. He intended, if he was to live at all, to live master of himself in matters which belonged to himself. Sylla might kill him if he so pleased. It was better to die than to put away a wife who was the mother of his child, and to marry some other woman at a dictator's bidding. Life on such terms was not worth keeping.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 8.

2789. INDEPENDENCE necessary. Archbishop Anselm. The boldness of Anselm's attitude not only broke the tradition of ecclesiastical servitude, but infused through the nation at large a new spirit of independence. The real character of the strife appears in the primate's answer when his remonstrances against the lawless exactions from the church were met by a demand for a present on his own promotion, and his first offer of £500 was contemptuously refused. "Treat me as a free man," Anselm replied, "and I devote myself and all that I have to your service; but if you treat me as a slave you shall have neither me nor mine." A burst of the red king's [William] fury drove the archbishop from court, and he finally decided to quit the country; but his example had not been lost, and the close of William's reign found a new spirit of freedom in England with which the greatest of the conqueror's sons was glad to make terms.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 116.

2790. INDEPENDENCE proclaimed. American. On the 7th of June, 1776, Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia, offered a resolution in Congress declaring that the united colonies are and of right ought to be free and independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown; and that all political connection between them and Great Britain is and ought to be dissolved. A long and exciting debate ensued. . . . On the 1st of July Lee's resolution was taken up, and at the same time the committee's report was laid before Congress. On the next day the original resolution was adopted. During the 3d the formal declaration was debated with great spirit. . . . The discussion was resumed on the 4th, and at two o'clock in the afternoon of that memorable day the DECLARATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE was adopted by a unanimous vote.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 39, p. 309.

2791. INDEPENDENCE, Profitless. Samuel Johnson. [The Crown bestowed on him a pension.] I talked of the numerous reflections which had been thrown out against him on account of his having accepted a pension from his present Majesty. "Why, sir," said he, with a hearty laugh, "it is a mighty foolish noise that they make. I have accepted of a pension as a reward which has been thought due to my literary merit; and now that I have this pension, I am the same man in every respect that I have ever been; I retain the same principles. It is true that I cannot now curse" (smiling) "the House of Hanover; nor would it be decent for me to drink King James' health in the wine that King George gives me money to pay for. But, sir, I think that the pleasure of cursing the House of Hanover and drinking King James' health are amply overbalanced by £300 a year."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 119.

2792. INDEPENDENCE, Religious. Cromwell's Time. They held the Presbyterians in as great abhorrence as those of the Church of England. They pretended to immediate inspiration from heaven; rejected all ecclesiastical establishments; disclaimed all creeds and systems of belief; and, despising every distinction of governors and governed, held all men—king, nobility, and commons—to be upon a level of equality. Of this sect Cromwell was one of the chief leaders. He was a person of a rude and uncultivated, but very superior genius—a man whose peculiar dexterity lay in discovering the characters and taking advantage of the weaknesses of mankind. He was in religion at once an enthusiast and a hypocrite; in political matters, both a leveller and a tyrant; and in common life, cautious, subtle, and circumspect; at the same time he was daring and impetuous.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 29, p. 406.

2793. INDIFFERENCE, Cruel. Julius Cæsar. They were expected to decorate the city with new ornaments and to entertain the people with magnificent spectacles. If they fell short of public expectation, they need look no further for the suffrages of their many-headed master. . . . Cæsar, either more ambitious or less confident in his services, raised a new and costly row of columns in front of the Capitol. He built a temple for the Dioscuri, and he charmed the populace with a show of gladiators unusually extensive. Personally he cared nothing for these sanguinary exhibitions, and he displayed his indifference ostentatiously by reading or writing while the butchery was going forward. But he required the favor of the multitude, and then, as always, took the road which led most directly to his end.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 11.

2794. INDIFFERENCE, Religious. Charles II. Charles [II.] was a heartless voluptuary, and selfish in his craving for ease and pleasure. Secretly a Papist, openly a scoffer, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, or Independent might harass each other, so that Charles was quiet.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 14, p. 234.

2795. INDIGNATION expressed. Patriots to a Tory. A.D. 1774. The people of Plymouth were grieved that George Watson, their respected townsman, was willing [to be a member of the Tory council appointed in Massachusetts by Governor Gates]. . . . On the first Lord's day after his purpose was known, as soon as he took his seat in meeting, his neighbors and friends put on their hats before the congregation and walked out of the house. The extreme public indignity was more than he could bear. As they passed his pew, he hid his face by bending his head over his cane, and determined to resign.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 8.

2797. INDISCRETION, Destructive. Passion. [The Emperor Valentinian drew his sword—the first sword he ever drew—and plunged it in the breast of Ætius, the general who had saved his empire but excited his envy.] The emperor was confounded by the honest reply of a Roman, whose approbation he had not disdained to solicit. "I am ignorant, sir, of your motives or provocations; I only know that you have acted like a man who cuts off his right hand with his left."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 35, p. 455.

2798. INDISCRETION, Pre-eminent. Bishop Burnet. Burnet was allowed by his friends and admirers to be the most officious and indiscreet of mankind; but the sagacious prince perceived that this pushing, talkative divine, who was always blabbing secrets, asking impertinent questions, obtruding unasked advice, was nevertheless an upright, courageous, and able man, well acquainted with the temper and the views of British sects and factions.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 165.

2799. INDULGENCE, Constitutional. Samuel Johnson. [He engaged to translate "A Voyage to Abyssinia" from the French into English. He began, and the printer] was set to work with what was ready, and Johnson engaged to supply the press with copy as it should be wanted; but his constitutional indolence soon prevailed, and the work was at a stand. Mr. Hector, who knew that a motive of humanity would be the most prevailing argument with his friend, went to Johnson, and represented to him that the printer could have no other employment till this undertaking was finished, and that the poor man and his family were suffering. Johnson upon this exerted the powers of his mind, though his body was relaxed. He lay in bed with the book, which was a quarto, before him, and dictated while Hector wrote.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 17.

2800. INDULGENCE given to Sin. Penance. [During the time of Charlemagne the more ordinary offences of fornication and adultery, of perjury and sacrilege, of rapine and murder, were expiated by a penance, which, according to the various circumstances, was prolonged from forty days to seven years.] A literal accomplishment of penance was indeed impracticable: the guilt of adultery was multiplied by daily repetition; that of homicide might involve the massacre of a whole people; each act was separately numbered; and in those times of anarchy and vice a modest sinner might easily incur a debt of three hundred years. His insolvency was relieved by a commutation, or indulgence; a year of penance was appreciated at twenty-six solidi of silver, about £4 sterling, for the rich; at 3 solidi, or 9s., for the indigent; and these alms were soon appropriated to the use of the church, which derived, from the redemption of sins, an inexhaustible source of opulence and dominion. A debt of three hundred years, or £1200, was enough to impoverish a plentiful fortune; the scarcity of gold and silver was supplied by the alienation of land; and the princely donations of Pepin and Charlemagne are expressly given for the remedy of their soul. It is a maxim of the civil law that whosoever cannot pay with his purse must pay with his body; and the practice of flagellation was adopted by the monks, a cheap though painful equivalent. By a fantastic arithmetic, a year of penance was taxed at three thousand lashes; and such was the skill and patience of a famous hermit, St. Dominic of the Iron Cuirass, that in six days he could discharge an entire century by a whipping of three hundred thousand stripes. His example was followed by many penitents of both sexes; and, as a vicarious sacrifice was accepted, a sturdy disciplinarian might expiate on his own back the sins of his benefactors. These compensations of the purse and the person introduced, in the eleventh century, a more honorable mode of satisfaction.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58, p. 54.

2801. INDULGENCES, Cargo of. Papal. [In 1593 Thomas White, of London, captured in a Spanish vessel two millions of papal bulls for indulgences.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 17, p. 267.

2802. INDULGENCES, Papal. Tetzel. The form of the absolution issued by Tetzel was as follows: "I absolve thee from all ecclesiastical censures, and from all thy sins, how enormous soever; and by this plenary indulgence I remit thee all manner of punishment which thou oughtest to suffer in purgatory. And I restore thee to the sacraments of the church, and to that innocence and purity which thou hadst at thy baptism; so as, at death, the gates of hell shall be shut against thee, and the gates of paradise shall be laid open to receive thee. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen."—Keith's Hist. of Scotland, Introd., p. 4.—NOTE IN TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 20, p. 291.

2803. INDULGENCES, Sale of. Church-building. A project had likewise been set on foot by his predecessor, Julius II., which Leo keenly adopted, and which required a prodigious sum of money to carry it into execution. This was the building of St. Peter's Church at Rome, a fabric which it was intended should surpass all the magnificent structures that had ever been reared by the art of man. For the construction of this noble edifice, and to supply the luxuries of his court, Leo X. had recourse (to use an expression of Voltaire) to one of the keys of St. Peter, to open the coffers of Christians. Under the pretence of a crusade against the Turks, he instituted through all Christendom a sale of indulgences, or releases from the pains of purgatory, which a pious man might purchase for a small sum of money either for himself or for his friends. Public offices were appointed for the sale of them in every town, and they were farmed or leased out to the keepers of taverns and bagnios. Their efficacy was proclaimed by all the preachers, who maintained that the most atrocious offences against religion might be expiated and forgiven by the purchase of a remission. A Dominican friar of the name of Tetzel, a principal agent in this extraordinary and most abominable merchandise, was wont to repeat in his public orations this blasphemous assertion, "That he himself had saved more souls from hell by these indulgences than St. Peter had converted to Christianity by his preaching."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 20, p. 291.

2804. INDUSTRY, Education in. Samuel Johnson. At the inn where we dined the gentlewoman said that she had done her best to educate her children; and, particularly, that she had never suffered them to be a moment idle. JOHNSON: "I wish, madam, you would educate me too, for I have been an idle fellow all my life." "I am sure, sir," said she, "you have not been idle." JOHNSON: "Nay, madam, it is very true; and that gentleman there" (pointing to me) "has been idle. He was idle at Edinburgh. His father sent him to Glasgow, where he continued to be idle. He then came to London, where he has been very idle; and now he is going to Utrecht, where he will be as idle as ever." I asked him privately how he could expose me so.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 129.

2805. INDUSTRY, Exposition of. Timour. [About A.D. 1400 Timour gathered at his capital all the officers and chief men for a national council. When assembled] there was an exhibition of all the industry, of all the arts, and all the trades of the world, as far as subject to the laws of the Khan. The most expert artisans displayed there the master-works of their professions; in their shops they erected trophies, arches of flowers to represent the victories, wherein they showed superior skill in the refinements of their various trades. The jewellers exhibited necklaces of pearls and precious stones, principally rubies, grenadines, and sapphires, with an infinity of pieces of rock crystal, of coral and of agate. A vast amphitheatre was erected for the ladies, in front of which played the musicians, with all the species of amusements. There was also an amphitheatre assigned to all the trades, and containing thus a hundred compartments.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 365.

2806. INDUSTRY, Happiness by. English. [Early in the eighteenth century] the greater number of fashionable women "spent their hours in an indolent state of body and mind, without either recreations or reflections." Stimulants, if we may believe the censor, were sometimes resorted to: "Palestris, in her drawing-room, is supported by spirits, to keep off the return of spleen and melancholy, before she can get over half the day, for want of something to do; while the wench in the kitchen sings and scours from morning to night."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 27, p. 418.

2807. INDUSTRY misapplied. Jamestown Colony. The kind of industry which Smith had encouraged in the colony was now laughed at. As soon as the weather would permit . . . [the colonists] began to stroll about the country digging for gold. In a bank of sand . . . some glittering particles were found, and the whole settlement was in a blaze of excitement. Martin [a member of council] . . . in imagination saw himself loaded with wealth and honored with a peerage. [Another member] . . . having filled up one of his ships with the supposed gold-dust, then sailed up the James River to find the Pacific Ocean. Fourteen weeks of the precious springtime, that ought to have been given to ploughing and planting, were consumed in this stupid nonsense. Even the Indians ridiculed the madness of the men who for imaginary grains of gold were wasting their chances for a crop of corn.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 9, p. 102.

2808. INDUSTRY, Proof of. Calloused Hands. [The persecutors of the Christians during the reign of Trajan found] the grandsons of St. Jude the apostle, who himself was the brother of Jesus Christ. Their natural pretensions to the throne of David might perhaps attract the respect of the people, and excite the jealousy of the governor. . . . When they were examined concerning their fortune and occupation, they showed their hands, hardened with daily labor, and declared that they derived their whole subsistence from the cultivation of a farm near the village of Cocaba, of the extent of about twenty-four English acres, and of the value of 9000 drachms, or £300 sterling. The grandsons of St. Jude were dismissed with compassion and contempt.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16, p. 24.

2809. INDUSTRY, Report of. Egyptians. [The law] of Amasis ordained every individual to appear annually before a particular magistrate and give an account of his profession and the manner in which he acquired his subsistence. A capital punishment, it is said, was decreed against the person who could not show that he procured it by honest means. We shall observe a similar treatment of the Athenian republic.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4, p. 38.

2810. INDUSTRY sacrificed to Pride. Charles I. [During the reign of Charles I.] all shops in Cheapside and Lombard Street, except those of the goldsmiths, were commanded to be shut up, that the great avenue to the cathedral might not exhibit any trace of vulgar industries, and that when foreigners went to see the Lord Mayor's procession, they might not be offended by butchers' stalls and "fripperies."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 26, p. 425.

2811. INDUSTRY, Standard of. Leathern Apron. [While Timour, the conquering Tartar,] was wintering at the foot of the Caucasus and inviting whole populations to his gigantic hunting parties, those images of the pleasures of Tartary, Isphahan, occupied by the rear guard of his army, arose at the drum sound of a patriotic blacksmith, who hoisted as a standard his leathern apron. At his voice the Persians massacred 3000 Tartars, and delivered the city from their oppressors.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 311.

2812. INDUSTRY, Virtue by. Corrective. It was reported by Hannibal that, in order to preserve his troops from the dangerous temptations of idleness, he had obliged them to form large plantations of olive trees along the coast of Africa. From a similar principle, Probus exercised his legions in covering with rich vineyards the hills of Gaul and Pannonia, and two considerable spots are described, which were entirely dug and planted by military labor. . . . One of these . . . by converting into tillage a large and unhealthy tract of marshy ground. . . . An army thus employed constituted perhaps the most useful as well as the bravest portion of Roman subjects.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12, p. 385.

2813. INEXPERIENCE, Mistakes from. Retreat. [At the beginning of the civil war the Parliament's troops were defeated in a skirmish at Worcester. A witness says:] "The lieutenant commanded us to wheel about; but our gentlemen, not yet well understanding the difference between wheeling about and shifting for themselves, their backs being toward the enemy whom they now thought to be close in the rear, retired to the army in a very dishonorable manner."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 1, p. 3.

2814. INEXPERIENCE, Presumption of. Youth. Æmilius having joined Nasica, marched in good order against the Macedonians. But when he saw the disposition and number of their forces he was astonished, and stood still to consider what was proper to be done. Hereupon the young officers, eager for the engagement, and particularly Nasica, flushed with his success at Mount Olympus, pressed up to him, and begged of him to lead them forward without delay. Æmilius only smiled and said, "My friend, if I was of your age I should certainly do so; but the many victories I have gained have made me observe the errors of the vanquished, and forbid me to give battle immediately after a march to an army well drawn up, and every way prepared."—PLUTARCH'S ÆMILIUS.

2815. INEXPERIENCE removed. By Loss. "Were you ever in a battle?" asked the Prince of Condé of the young Duke of Gloucester, son of Charles I., who had joined him as a volunteer [to engage in the battle of "the Downs," before Dunkirk]. The prince answered in the negative. "Well," returned Condé, irritated by the incapacity and obstinacy of the Spaniards, "in the course of half an hour you will see us lose one." His words were fully verified; the Spanish army was totally overthrown, and dispersed in all directions.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 20, § 10.

2816. INFAMY posthumous. Roman Emperor Commodus. [After his assassination the] memory of Commodus was branded with eternal infamy. The names of tyrant, of gladiator, of public enemy, resounded in every corner of the house. They decreed in tumultuous votes that his honors should be reversed, his titles erased from the public monuments, his statues thrown down, his body dragged with a hook into the stripping-room of the gladiators, to satiate the public fury; and they expressed some indignation against those officious servants who had already presumed to screen his remains from the justice of the Senate.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 118.

2817. INFAMY, Stain of. Frenchtown, Indiana. The Americans were suddenly assailed by . . . 1005 British and Indians under command of General Proctor. A severe battle was fought. . . . General Winchester having been taken by the enemy, advised his forces to capitulate under a pledge of protection given by Proctor and his subordinates. As soon as the surrender was made the British general went off at a rapid rate to return to Malden. The American wounded were left to the mercy of the savages, who at once began their work with tomahawk and scalping-knife and torch. The two houses into which most of the wounded had been crowded were fired, while the painted barbarians stood around them and hurled back into the flames whoever attempted to escape. The rest of the prisoners were dragged away, through untold sufferings, to Detroit. . . . This shameful campaign has fixed on the name of Proctor the indelible stain of infamy.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 50, p. 400.

2818. INFANTS in Heaven. Swedenborg. As soon as infants are raised from the dead, which takes place immediately after decease, they are carried up to heaven, and delivered to the care of angels of the female sex, who in the life of the body loved infants tenderly, and at the same time loved God. By these good angels they are educated and brought up until they attain a suitable age, when they are transferred to other teachers. They grow up and become young men and women; are instructed in wisdom and trained in the duties of the heavenly life; and when their character is fully developed they become settled in some society, either of the celestial or spiritual kingdom, in agreement with their inherited genius or disposition. —WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 13, p. 115.

2819. INFATUATION, Destructive. Nero.

Nero became deeply enamored of Poppæa Sabina, the wife of his friend Otho, and one of the most cruel and cold-blooded intriguers amid the abandoned society of Roman matrons. Nero was deeply smitten with her infantile features, the soft complexion, which was preserved by daily bathing in warm asses' milk, her assumed modesty, her genial conversation and sprightly wit. He was especially enchanted with her soft, abundant hair, the envy of Roman beauties, for which he invented the fantastic, and to Roman writers the supremely ludicrous, epithet of "amber tresses." From the day that he first saw Poppæa a headlong deterioration is traceable in his character. She established a complete influence over him, and drove him by her taunts and allurements to that crime which, even among his many enormities, is the most damning blot upon his character—the murder of his mother. She lived in daily dread of assassination. Her watchfulness evaded all attempts at poisoning, and she was partly protected against them by the current fiction that she had fortified herself by the use of antidotes. Plots to murder her by the apparently accidental fall of the fretted roof in one of the chambers of her villa were frustrated by the warning which she received from her spies. At last Anicetus, a freedman, admiral of the fleet at Misenum, promised Nero to secure her end in an unsuspecting manner by means of a ship which should suddenly fall to pieces in mid-sea. Nero invited her to a banquet at Baia, which was to be the sign of their public reconciliation. Declining, however, to sail in the pinnace which had been surreptitiously fitted up for her use, she was carried to her son's villa in her own litter. [The weighted canopy was made to fall, but she escaped] . . . bolts were withdrawn, and the ship fell to pieces, but she swam ashore, and was soon afterward assassinated. —FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, p. 25.

2820. INFATUATION of Pride. James II.

James was bent on ruining himself, and every attempt to stop him only made him rush more eagerly to his doom. When his throne was secure, when his people were submissive, when the most obsequious of Parliaments was eager to anticipate all his reasonable wishes, when foreign kingdoms and commonwealths paid emulous court to him, when it depended only on himself whether he would be the arbiter of Christendom, he had stooped to be the slave and the hireling of France. And now when, by a series of crimes and follies, he had succeeded in alienating his neighbors, his subjects, his soldiers, his sailors, his children, and had left himself no refuge but the protection of France, he was taken with a fit of pride, and determined to assert his independence. That help which, when he did not want it, he had accepted with ignominious tears, he now, when it was indispensable to him, threw contemptuously away. Having been abject when he might, with propriety, have been punctilious in maintaining his dignity, he became ungratefully haughty at a moment when haughtiness must bring on him at once derision and ruin. He resented the friendly intervention which might have saved him. Was ever king so used? Was he a child, or an idiot, that others must think for him? —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 416.

2821. INFERENCE feared. Pest-field. On the east was a field not to be passed without a shudder by any Londoner of that age. There, as in a place far from the haunts of men, had been dug, twenty years before, when the great plague was raging, a pit into which the dead-carts had nightly shot corpses by scores. It was popularly believed that the earth was deeply tainted with infection, and could not be disturbed without imminent risk to human life. No foundations were laid there till two generations had passed without any return of the pestilence, and till the ghastly spot had long been surrounded with buildings. —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 333.

2822. INFERENCE, Mistakes of. Alexander.

One fact recorded by Strabo affords a very striking proof of the great ignorance of the ancients with respect to the situation even of those kingdoms with which they had intercourse. When Alexander the Great marched along the banks of the Hydaspes and Acesina, two rivers which fall into the Indus, he observed that there were many crocodiles in those rivers, and that the country produced beans of the same species with those which were common in Egypt. From these circumstances he concluded that he had discovered the source of the Nile, and prepared a fleet to sail down the Hydaspes into Egypt. —TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 17, p. 256.

2823. INFIDELITY, Dishonest. Samuel Johnson.

I told him that a foreign friend of his, whom I had met with abroad, was so wretchedly perverted to infidelity that he treated the hopes of immortality with brutal levity, and said, "As man dies like a dog, let him live like a dog." JOHNSON: "If he dies like a dog, let him lie like a dog." I added that this man said to me, "I hate mankind, for I think myself one of the best of them, and I know how bad I am." JOHNSON: "Sir, he must be very singular in his opinion if he thinks himself one of the best of men, for none of his friends think him so." He said, "No honest man could be a Deist, for no man could be so after a fair examination of the proofs of Christianity." I named Hume. JOHNSON: "No, sir; Hume owned to a clergyman in the bishopric of Durham that he had never read the New Testament with attention." —BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 141.

2824. INFIDELITY, Escape from. Benjamin Franklin.

The son of a rigid Calvinist, the grandson of a tolerant Quaker, . . . sceptical of tradition as the basis of faith, he respected reason rather than authority, and after a momentary lapse into fatalism, escaping from the mazes of fixed decrees and free will, he gained with increasing years an increasing trust in the overruling providence of God. Adhering to none "of all the religions" in the colonies, he yet devoutly, though without form, adhered to religion.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 23.

2825. INFIDELITY, Leader in. Voltaire. In an age of scepticism he was the prince of scoffers; when philosophy hovered round saloons, he excelled in reflecting the brilliantly licentious mind of the intelligent aristocracy. His great works were written in retirement, but he was himself the spoiled child of society. He sunned himself in its light, and dazzled it by concentrating its rays. He was its idol, and courted its idolatry. . . . The complacent courtier of sovereigns and ministers, he could even stand and wait for smiles at the toilet of the French king's mistress, or prostrate himself in flattery before the Semiramis of the north; willing to shut his eyes on the sorrows of the masses, if the great would but favor men of letters. . . . He praised George I. of England as a sage and a hero, who ruled the world by his virtues; . . . when the French king took a prostitute for a mistress, . . . extolled the monarch's mistress as an adorable Egeria.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 2.

2826. INFIDELITY, Metaphysical. Unnatural. Atheism is a folly of the metaphysician, not the folly of human nature. Of savage life, Roger Williams declared that he had never found one native American who denied the existence of God; in civilized life, when it was said of the court of Frederick that the place of king's atheist was vacant, the gibe was felt as the most biting sarcasm. Infidelity gains the victory when she wrestles with hypocrisy or with superstition, but never when its antagonist is reason.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

2827. INFIDELITY, Peril of. Samuel Johnson. Hume and other sceptical innovators are vain men, and will gratify themselves at any expense. Truth will not afford sufficient food to their vanity, so they have betaken themselves to error. Truth, sir, is a cow which will yield such people no more milk, and so they are gone to milk the bull. If I could have allowed myself to gratify my vanity at the expense of truth, what fame might I have acquired! Everything which Hume has advanced against Christianity had passed through my mind long before he wrote. Always remember this, that after a system is well settled upon positive evidence, a few partial objections ought not to shake it. The human mind is so limited that it cannot take in all the parts of a subject, so that there may be objections raised against anything. There are objections against a plenum, and objections against a vacuum; yet one of them must certainly be true.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 123.

2828. INFIDELITY, Secret of. Samuel Johnson. [To General Paoli.] The general asked him what he thought of the spirit of infidelity which was so prevalent. JOHNSON: "Sir, this gloom of infidelity, I hope, is only a transient cloud passing through the hemisphere, which will soon be dissipated, and the sun break forth with his usual splendor." "You think, then," said the general, "that they will change their principles like their clothes." JOHNSON: "Why, sir, if they bestow no more thought on principles than on dress, it must be so." The general said that a great part of the fashionable infidelity was owing to a desire of showing courage. Men who have no opportunities of showing it as to things in this life, take death and futurity as objects on which to display it. JOHNSON: "That is mighty foolish affectation. Fear is one of the passions of human nature, of which it is impossible to divest it. You remember that the Emperor Charles V., when he read upon the tombstone of a Spanish nobleman, 'Here lies one who never knew fear,' wittily said, 'Then he never snuffed a candle with his fingers.'"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 163.

2829. INFIDELITY and the State. Ruinous in France. Thus scepticism proceeded unconsciously in the work of destruction, invalidating the past, yet unable to construct the future, for good government is not the creation of scepticism. Her garments are red with blood, and ruins are her delight; her despair may stimulate to voluptuousness and revenge; she never kindled with the disinterested love of man.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 2.

2830. INFIDELITY, Weakness of. Napoleon I. A whole generation had grown up in France without any knowledge of Christianity. Corruption was universal. A new sect sprang up, Theophilanthropists, who gleaned as the basis of their system some of the moral precepts of the gospel, divested of the sublime sanctions of Christianity. [Napoleon said of them:] . . . "They can accomplish nothing; . . . they are mere actors. . . . The gospel alone has exhibited a complete assemblage of the principles of morality divested of all absurdity. . . . Do you wish to see that which is really sublime? Repeat the Lord's Prayer. Such enthusiasts are only to be encountered by the weapons of ridicule."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 9.

2831. INFIDELS, Treatment of. Samuel Johnson. Dr. Adams had distinguished himself by an able answer to David Hume's "Essay on Miracles." He told me he had once dined in company with Hume in London; that Hume shook hands with him, and said, "You have treated me much better than I deserve;" and that they exchanged visits. I took the liberty to object to treating an infidel writer with smooth civility. Where there is a controversy concerning a passage in a classic author, or concerning a question in antiquities, or any other subject in which human happiness is not deeply interested, a man may treat his antagonist with politeness and even respect; but where the controversy is concerning the truth of religion, it is of such vast importance to him who maintains it to obtain the victory, that the person of an opponent ought not to be spared. If a man firmly believes that religion is an invaluable treasure, he will consider a writer who endeavors to deprive mankind of it as a robber; he will look upon him as odious, though the infidel might think himself in the right. . . . An abandoned profligate may think that it is not wrong to debauch my wife; but shall I, therefore, not detest him? and if I catch him in making an attempt, shall I treat him with politeness? No, I will kick him down-stairs, or run him through the body—that is, if I really love my wife, or have a true rational notion of honor. An infidel, then, shall not be treated handsomely by a Christian merely because he endeavors to rob with ingenuity.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 277.

2832. INFLUENCE, Personal. Magnetism. [Charles Edward, grandson of James II., entered Scotland to claim its crown as his legitimate inheritance. He sent a young Highlander to rally all the clans. Cameron of Lochiel was doubtful. He was told:] "If this prince once sets his eyes upon you he will make you do whatever he pleases." The result verified the remark.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 8, p. 123.

2833. ———. Napoleon I. Incredible as it may appear, Napoleon, while thus dethroning them [the sons of Charles IV., King of Spain, and compelling them to accept a residence in exile and income from himself], gained such an ascendancy over their minds, that they became his warm admirers and friends. They exulted in his successive victories, and celebrated them with illuminations and bonfires. Nothing in Napoleon's whole career more strikingly than this exhibits his extraordinary powers.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 1.

2834. ———. Napoleon's Aides. Murat was to Napoleon a body of ten thousand horsemen, ever ready for a resistless charge; Lannes was a phalanx of infantry, bristling with bayonets which neither artillery nor cavalry could batter down; Augereau was an armed column, invincible, black, dense, massy, impetuous, resistless, moving with gigantic tread wherever the finger of the conqueror pointed. These were but the members of Napoleon's body—the limbs obedient to the mighty soul that swayed them.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 14.

2835. ———. William Pitt. A private man in England, in middle life, with no fortune, with no party, with no strong family connections, having few votes under his sway in the House of Commons, and perhaps not one in the House of Lords—a feeble valetudinarian, shunning pleasure and society, haughty and retired, and half his time disabled by the agonies of hereditary gout, was now the hope of the English world [when the Whig aristocracy had failed to conquer Canada].—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 11.

2836. ———. George Washington. So powerful were the President's views in determining the actions of the people, that Jefferson, writing to Monroe at Paris, said: "Congress has adjourned. You will see by their proceedings the truth of what I always told you—namely, that one man outweighs them all in influence over the people, who support his judgment against their own and that of their representatives. Republicanism resigns the vessel to its pilot."—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 46, p. 371.

2837. ———. Julius Cæsar. [His soldiers had been styled "brothers in arms." In consequence of mutinous conduct he called them "quirites"—plain citizens.] The familiar word was now no longer heard from him. "You say well, quirites," he answered; "you have labored hard, and you have suffered much; you desire your discharge—you have it. I discharge you who are present. I discharge all who have served their time. You shall have your recompense. It shall never be said of me that I made use of you when I was in danger, and was ungrateful to you when the peril was past." "Quirites" he had called them; no longer Roman legionaries, proud of their achievements, and glorying in their great commander, but "quirites"—plain citizens. The sight of Cæsar, the familiar form and voice, the words, every sentence of which they knew that he meant, cut them to the heart. They were humbled, they begged to be forgiven. They said they would go with him to Africa, or to the world's end. He did not at once accept their penitence.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 24.

2838. INFLUENCE, Posthumous. Constantine. If Constantine reckoned among the favors of fortune the death of his eldest son, of his nephew, and perhaps of his wife, he enjoyed an uninterrupted flow of private as well as public felicity till the thirtieth year of his reign—a period which none of his predecessors, since Augustus, had been permitted to celebrate. Constantine survived that solemn festival about ten months; and at the mature age of sixty-four, after a short illness, he ended his memorable life . . . in the suburbs of Nicomedia, whither he had retired for the benefit of the air, and with the hope of recruiting his exhausted strength by the use of the warm baths. The excessive demonstrations of grief, or at least of mourning, surpassed whatever had been practised on any former occasion. Notwithstanding the claims of the Senate and people of ancient Rome, the corpse of the deceased emperor, according to his last request, was transported to the city which was destined to preserve the name and memory of its founder. The body of Constantine, adorned with the vain symbols of greatness—the purple and diadem—was deposited on a golden bed in one of the apartments of the palace, which for that purpose had been splendidly furnished and illuminated. The forms of the court were strictly maintained. Every day, at the appointed hours, the principal officers of the state, the army, and the household, approaching the person of their sovereign with bended knees and a composed countenance, offered their respectful homage as seriously as if he had been still alive. From motives of policy this theatrical representation was for some time continued; nor could flattery neglect the opportunity of remarking that Constantine alone, by the peculiar indulgence of Heaven, had reigned after his death.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 18, p. 173.

2840. ———. Noureddin. Some years after the sultan's death an oppressed subject called aloud in the streets of Damascus, "O Noureddin, Noureddin, where art thou now? Arise, arise, to pity and protect us!" A tumult was apprehended, and a living tyrant blushed or trembled at the name of a departed monarch.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 59, p. 17.

2842. INFLUENCE, Strange. Catherine Sedley. [Mistress of James II.] Personal charms she had none, with the exception of two brilliant eyes, the lustre of which, to men of delicate taste, seemed fierce and unfeminine. Her form was lean, her countenance haggard. Charles, though he liked her conversation, laughed at her ugliness, and said that the priest must have recommended her to his brother by way of penance. . . . Catherine herself was astonished at the violence of his passion. "It cannot be my beauty," she said, "for he must see that I have none; and it cannot be my wit, for he has not enough to know that I have any."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 63.

2844. INFORMATION, Pleasing. Abraham Lincoln. When the telegram from Cumberland Gap reached Mr. Lincoln that "firing was heard in the direction of Knoxville," he remarked that he was "glad of it." Some person present . . . could not see why. . . . "Why, you see," responded the President, "it reminds me of Mistress Sallie Ward, a neighbor of mine, who had a very large family. Occasionally one of her numerous progeny would be heard crying in some out-of-the-way place, upon which Mrs. Ward would exclaim, 'There's one of my children that isn't dead!'"—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 756.

pardon to all who had been found in arms against him. He allowed every citizen, provided he spoke only of his own grievances, to have free access to his person, but declared war against that vile race of pensioned informers which had multiplied so exceedingly during the preceding reign.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 491.

2846. INGENUITY vs. Difficulties. Augustus. [Transporting Egyptian obelisks to Rome.] Those immense masses, consisting of one entire block of granite, were hewn in the quarries of Upper Egypt, whence they were conveyed by water to the place where they were to be erected. The contrivance for transporting them is described by Pliny, and is equally simple and ingenious. The Nile runs near to the base of those mountains where the quarries are situated. A canal was cut from the river to the spot where the obelisk lay, and made to pass under it, so as to leave the stone supported by its two extremities resting on either bank of the canal. Two broad boats were then loaded with a great weight of stones, so as to sink them so deep in the water as to allow them to pass freely under the obelisk; when immediately under it, the stones were thrown out; the boats, of consequence [raised and lifted the obelisks].—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4, p. 39.

2847. INGENUITY, Practical. Benj. Franklin. When the scientific world began to investigate the wonders of electricity, Franklin excelled all observers. . . . In the summer of 1752, going out into the fields, with no instrument but a kite, no companion but his son, he established his theory by obtaining a line of connection with a thunder-cloud. Nor did he cease until he had made the lightning a household pastime, taught his family to catch the subtle fluid in its inconceivably rapid leaps between the earth and the sky, and compelled it to give warning of its passage by the harmless ringing of bells.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 23.

2848. INGENUITY of Savages. Hatchets. The North American Indians, having no iron, use stone hatchets in cutting down the largest trees. They found, says Charlevoix, in his "Travels in Canada," a very hard and tough species of flint, which by great labor they sharpened for the head of the instrument. The difficulty lay in fastening it to the handle. They cut off the top of a young tree, and making a transverse slit, insert the stone into the opening. The parts of the tree growing together close so firmly upon the stone that it is impossible to move it. Then they cut the tree of such length as they judge sufficient for the handle.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 7, ch. 3, p. 31.

2849. INGENUITY, Success by. Columbus. On the 13th of September, . . . about two hundred leagues from the island of Ferro, Columbus for the first time noticed the variation of the needle, a phenomenon which had never before been remarked. He perceived about nightfall that the needle, instead of pointing to the north star, varied about half a point, or between five and six degrees, to the north-west, and still more on the following morning. . . . The variation increased as he advanced. [It was feared they were entering another world, and the compass would lose its virtues.] Columbus tasked his science and ingenuity for reasons with which to allay their terror. He observed that the direction of the needle was not to the polar star, but to some fixed and invisible point. The variation, therefore, was not caused by any fallacy in the compass, but by the movement of the north star itself, which, like the other heavenly bodies, had its changes and revolutions, and every day described a circle round the pole. The high opinion which the pilots entertained of Columbus as a profound astronomer gave weight to this theory, and their alarm subsided. — IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, Book 3, ch. 2.

2850. INGRATE, Cowardly. Reign of James II. [James Burton had been engaged in the Rye House Plot, but escaped by the aid of an aged Christian named Elizabeth Gaunt. He had rebelled under the Duke of Monmouth, and fled to the home of a poor barber named John Fernley.] He knew that a reward of £100 had been offered by the government for the apprehension of Burton; but the honest man was incapable of betraying one who, in extreme peril, had come under the shadow of his roof. The anger of James was more strongly excited against those who harbored rebels than against the rebels themselves. He had publicly declared that, of all forms of treason, the hiding of traitors from his vengeance was the most unpardonable. Burton knew this. He delivered himself up to the government, and he gave information against Fernley and Elizabeth Gaunt. They were brought to trial. The villain whose life they had preserved had the heart and the forehead to appear as the principal witness against them. They were convicted. Fernley was sentenced to the gallows, Elizabeth Gaunt to the stake. — MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 615.

2851. INGRATITUDE, Base. Richelieu. Louis XIII. owed all his success for eighteen years to the wonderful genius of Richelieu; when that most noted statesman of his day died, his cold-hearted remark was simply this, "There is a great politician gone!" — STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 19, § 17.

2852. — — — Brutus. What Brutus is chiefly blamed for was his ingratitude to Caesar. He owed his life to his favor, as well as the lives of those prisoners for whom he interceded. He was treated as his friend, and distinguished with particular marks of honor; and yet he imbrued his hands in the blood of his benefactor. — PLUTARCH'S BRUTUS.

2854. INGRATITUDE, Official. James II. [The Roman Catholic king sought to overthrow the Anglican Church by illegal and violent means.] There was no prebendary, no rector, no vicar whose mind was not haunted by the thoughts that, however quiet his temper, however obscure his situation, he might, in a few months, be driven from his dwelling by an arbitrary edict, to beg in a ragged cassock with his wife and children, while his freehold, secured to him by laws of immemorial antiquity and by the royal word, was occupied by some apostate. This, then, was the reward of that heroic loyalty never once found wanting through the vicissitudes of fifty tempestuous years. It was for this that the clergy had endured spoliation and persecution in the cause of Charles I. It was for this that they had supported Charles II. in his hard contest with the Whig opposition. It was for this that they had stood in the front of the battle against those who sought to despoil James of his birthright. To their fidelity alone their oppressor owed the power which he was now employing to their ruin. — MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 281.

2855. INGRATITUDE, Political. Grecian Democracy. Epaminondas and Pelopidas, on their return to Thebes, were accused of having retained their command four months beyond their commissions while engaged in the Peloponnesian expedition. This, on the specious pretext of a strict regard to military duty, was adjudged to be a capital offence, and the people were on the point of condemning to death those men who had not only rescued their country from servitude, but raised the Theban name to the highest pitch of glory. Epaminondas undertook to defend the conduct of Pelopidas by taking the whole blame upon himself. "I was," said he, "the author of those measures for which we stand here accused. I had indulged a hope that the signal success which, under our conduct, has attended the Theban arms would have entitled us to the gratitude and not to the censure of our country. Well! let posterity, then, be informed of our crimes and of our punishment; let it be known that Epaminondas led your troops into the heart of Laconia, which no hostile power till then had ever penetrated; that his crime was that he abused the glory of Sparta, and brought her to the brink of ruin; that he made Thebes the most illustrious of the Grecian States; let it be inscribed on his tomb that death was the reward which his country decreed for these services." The Thebans were ashamed of their own conduct; the judges dismissed the charge, and the people atoned for their ingratitude by the strongest expressions of praise and admiration. — TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3, p. 165.

2856. — — — Athenians. [When Themistocles, the distinguished Athenian general, was young] his father, to dissuade him from accepting any public employment, showed him some old galleys that lay worn out and neglected on the seashore, just as the populace neglect their leaders when they have no further service for them. — PLUTARCH'S THEMISTOCLES.

2857. INGRATITUDE, Shameful. Francis Bacon. [In 1601, on the trial of the Earl of Essex for rebellion, Francis Bacon was one of the queen's counsel employed against him.] He was bound to Essex by no common obligations. The generous earl had given him an estate, because he could not procure for him a lucrative appointment. Essex had struggled against the ill-will of the Cecils to advance Bacon's fortunes, in season and out of season. Yet upon the trial Bacon said stronger things against his friend than were urged by his bitterest adversaries. [He made the severest comparisons, which awakened a general indignation. He afterward wrote an "Apology" of his conduct on this trial.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 18, p. 289.

2858. INHERITANCE, Household-goods. England. Common utensils were transmitted from generation to generation. . . . John Baret, of Bury, in 1463 bequeaths to his niece . . . "a great earthen pot that was my mother's." Wives had a life interest in "stuff of household," which was bequeathed to descend, after the decease of the wife, article by article, to relatives and friends. The riches so handed down are such as pottle pot and a quart pot, a pair of tongs and a pair of bellows. Roger Rokewoode . . . bequeaths to his son Robert . . . a brass pot, two brass pans, six pewter dishes, four saucers, and three platters of pewter, a feather bed, a pair of sheets, and a pair of blankets. . . . The deficiency of household comfort is sufficiently shown by such minute descriptions of old and mean chattels, of little value now, but then estimated in proportion to their scarcity.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 7, p. 120.

2859. INHUMANITY, Commercial. Cato. One of his sayings has exposed him to just censure—"A master of a family should sell off his old oxen, and all his cattle that are of a delicate frame, all his sheep that are not hardy; he should sell his old wagons, and his old implements; he should sell such of his slaves as are old and infirm, and everything else that is old and useless."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 422.

2860. INHUMANITY of Man. English Ancestors. Our English ancestors were less humane than their posterity. The discipline of workshops, of schools, of private families, though not more efficient than at present, was infinitely harsher. Masters well born and bred were in the habit of beating their servants. Pedagogues knew no way of imparting knowledge but by beating their pupils. Husbands of decent station were not ashamed to beat their wives. The un placability of hostile factions was such as we can scarcely conceive. Whigs were disposed to murmur because Strafford was suffered to die without seeing his bowels burned before his face. Tories reviled and insulted Russell as his coach passed from the Tower to the scaffold in Lincoln's Fields. As little mercy was shown by the populace to sufferers of a humbler rank. If an offender was put into the pillory, it was well if he escaped with life from the shower of brickbats and paving-stones. If he was tied to the cart's tail, the crowd pressed round him, imploring the hangman to give it the fellow well, and make him howl. Gentlemen arranged parties of pleasure to Bridewell on court days for the purpose of seeing the wretched women who beat hemp there whipped. A man pressed to death for refusing to plead, a woman burned for coining, excited less sympathy than is now felt for a galled horse or an over-driven ox. Fights, compared with which a boxing-match is a refined and humane spectacle, were among the favorite diversions of a large part of the town. Multitudes assembled to see gladiators hack each other to pieces with deadly weapons, and shouted with delight when one of the combatants lost a finger or an eye.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 394.

2861. ———. Spaniards. The conduct of the Spaniards toward the inhabitants of these new-discovered countries, and the cruelties exercised by them under their first governors, furnish a subject which it were to be wished, for the honor of humanity, could be forever veiled in oblivion. Religion and policy were the pretexts for the most outrageous acts of inhumanity. Avarice, which the more it is fed is still the more insatiable, had suggested to some of these rapacious governors that the inhabitants of the New World had discovered to the Spaniards but a very small proportion of treasures, which were inexhaustible. The missionaries encouraged the idea, and insinuated, at the same time, that the most proper method of obtaining an absolute authority over these new subjects was to convert them to the doctrines of Christianity, for which purpose the priests were to be furnished with every authority sufficient for the extirpation of idolatry. The favorite instruments of conversion employed in these pious purposes were the rack and the scourge. While some, to escape these miseries, put an end to their life with their own hand, others, flying from their inhuman persecutors into the woods, were there hunted down with dogs, and torn to pieces like wild beasts. In a little time Hispaniola, which contained three millions of inhabitants, and Cuba, that had above six hundred thousand, were absolutely depopulated.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 21, p. 309.

2862. INHUMANITY, Professional. Jeffreys. As judge at the city sessions he exhibited the same propensities which afterward, in a higher post, gained for him an unenviable immortality. Already might be remarked in him the most odious vice which is incident to human nature—a delight in misery merely as misery. There was a fiendish exultation in the way in which he pronounced sentence on offenders. Their weeping and imploring seemed to titillate him voluptuously, and he loved to scare them into fits, by dilating with luxuriant amplification on all the details of what they were to suffer. Thus when he had an opportunity of ordering an unlucky adventurer to be whipped at the cart's tail, "Hangman," he would exclaim, "I charge you to pay particular attention to this lady. Scourge her soundly, man! Scourge her till the blood runs down! It is Christmas—a cold time for madam to strip in! See that you warm her shoulders thoroughly!"—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 418.

2863. INHUMANITY, Revenge for. Reign of Charles II. The prisons were hells on earth, seminaries of every crime and of every disease. At the assizes the lean and yellow culprits brought with them from their cells to the dock an atmosphere of stench and pestilence which sometimes avenged them signally on bench, bar, and jury. But on all this misery society looked with profound indifference. Nowhere could be found that sensitive and restless compassion which has, in our time, extended a powerful protection to the factory child.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 395.

2864. INITIATION, Terrible. Roman Emperor Julian. He obtained the privilege of a solemn initiation into the mysteries of Eleusis, which, amid the general decay of the Grecian worship, still retained some vestiges of their primeval sanctity; and such was the zeal of Julian, that he afterward invited the Eleusinian pontiff to the court of Gaul, for the sole purpose of consummating, by mystic rites and sacrifices, the great work of his sanctification. As these ceremonies were performed in the depth of caverns, and in the silence of the night, and as the inviolable secret of the mysteries was preserved by the discretion of the initiated, I shall not presume to describe the horrid sounds and fiery apparitions which were presented to the senses or the imagination of the credulous aspirant, till the visions of comfort and knowledge broke upon him in a blaze of celestial light. . . . From that moment he consecrated his life to the service of the gods.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 23, p. 418.

2865. INJURIES, Forgetful of. Julius Cæsar. Domitius Ahenobarbus, believing that for him at least there could be no forgiveness, tried to escape, and was killed. The rest were pardoned. So ended the battle of Pharsalia. A hundred and eighty standards were taken and all the eagles of Pompey's legions. In Pompey's own tent was found his secret correspondence, implicating persons, perhaps, whom Cæsar had never suspected, revealing the mysteries of the past three years. Curiosity and even prudence might have tempted him to look into it. His only wish was that the past should be forgotten; he burnt the whole mass of papers unread.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 22.

2866. INJURIES, Redressing. Knights. The Gothic kings had the highest pride in redressing wrongs and grievances; but in this honorable employment the wrongs they committed were often greater than those they redressed, and in the vindication of the honor or fame of a mistress a real and most atrocious injury was frequently committed in revenge for one purely ideal. Their religion, too, was of that extraordinary cast, that, though professedly superior to all other duties, it always in reality acted a part subordinate to military fame and the honor of the ladies. It is confessed by one of their greatest encomiasts, M. de St. Palaye, that their devotion consisted chiefly in the observance of some external ceremonies, and that the greatest offences might be easily expiated by a penance or a pilgrimage, which furnished an agreeable opportunity for new adventures.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 10, p. 169.

2867. INJURIES, Reparation of. Laws. A.D. 600. [By the laws of Ethelbert, one of the early British kings,] it was not held that damages, to use a familiar word of explanation, were to be paid without respect of persons, but that a bishop was to be compensated elevenfold, and a clerk threefold of the value of any stolen property. The amends, atonement, or indemnification was called "bōt." The king's "bōt" was always the largest, except in the case of the bishop, who had twofold higher compensation for theft than even the king. If a man slew another in the king's "tun" (dwelling with lands appertaining), he was to pay 50s.; if in that of an "eorl" (jarl, noble), 12s. The slayer of the "hlafsta" (loaf-eater, domestic) of a "ceorl" (churl, freeman, not noble) was to atone for 6s. The mutilation of an "esne" (slave) was to be compensated to the owner at the full worth of the slave. The penalties to personal injuries to freemen are among the most curious of these dooms. It was not "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," but the eye had a pecuniary value, and so had the tooth. The evil consequence of the infliction, and not the motive of the offender, regulated the amount of the amends. Thus if the ear was struck off, the "bōt" was 12s.; but "if the other ear hear not, let the 'bōt' be made with 25s." In all cases of default of payment the remedy was prompt and effective—the offender became a penal slave.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 5, p. 70.

2868. — — — Romans. The rude jurisprudence of the decemvirs had confounded all hasty insults, which did not amount to the fracture of a limb, by condemning the aggressor to the common penalty of twenty-five asses. But the same denomination of money was reduced, in three centuries, from a pound to the weight of a half an ounce; and the insolence of a wealthy Roman indulged himself in the cheap amusement of breaking and satisfying the law of the twelve tables. Veratius ran through the streets striking on the face the inoffensive passengers, and his attendant purse-bearer immediately silenced their clamors by the legal tender of twenty-five pieces of copper, about the value of 1s.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 370.

2869. INJURIES, Sensitiveness to. Voltaire. His fame had raised him up enemies. His sensibility gave them a formidable advantage over him. They were, indeed, contemptible assailants. Of all that they wrote against him, nothing has survived except what he has himself preserved. But the constitution of his mind resembled the constitution of those bodies in which the slightest scratch of bramble or the bite of a gnat never fails to fester.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 58.

2870. INJURY, Mutual. Charles I.—Rupert. Prince Rupert has often been called the evil genius of Charles, but it would perhaps be quite as true, if not more so, to designate Charles as the evil genius of Rupert. There is, no doubt, a not unnatural prejudice against the prince, as a foreigner, commanding the royal army against the arms of the Parliament and the people.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 9, p. 128.

2871. INJUSTICE with Cruelty. Callias. [After the battle of Marathon one] of the barbarians happening to meet [Callias, the torch-bearer,] in a private place, and probably taking him for a king, on account of his long hair and the fillet which he wore, prostrated himself before him, and taking him by the hand, showed him a great quantity of gold that was hid in a well. But Callias, not less cruel than unjust, took away the gold, and then killed the man that had given him information of it, lest he should mention the thing to others.—PLUTARCH'S ARISTIDES.

2872. INJUSTICE reprov'd. Puritans. A.D. 1667. The Mohawks committed ravages near Northampton on the Connecticut River, and the general court of Massachusetts addressed them a letter : " We never yet did any wrong to you or any of yours"—such was the language of the Puritan diplomatists—"neither will we take any from you, but will right our people according to justice."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 14.

2873. INJUSTICE, Stigma of. Cicero. Cicero imagined that the world looked upon him as its saviour. In his own eyes he was another Romulus, a second founder of Rome. The world, unfortunately, had formed an entirely different estimate of him. The prisoners had been killed on the 5th of December. On the last day of the year it was usual for the out-going consuls to review the events of their term of office before the Senate; and Cicero had prepared a speech in which he had gilded his own performances with all his eloquence. Metellus commenced his tribunate with forbidding Cicero to deliver his oration, and forbidding him on the special ground that a man who had put Roman citizens to death without allowing them a hearing did not himself deserve to be heard. In the midst of the confusion and uproar which followed Cicero could only shriek that he had saved his country, a declaration which could have been dispensed with, since he had so often insisted upon it already without producing the assent which he desired.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 12.

2874. INNOCENCE, False. "Bet Flint." Poor Bet [a woman of the town] was taken up on a charge of stealing a counterpane, and tried at the Old Bailey. Chief Justice—, who loved a wench, summed up favorably, and she was acquitted. After which Bet said, with a gay and satisfied air, "Now that the counterpane is my own, I shall make a petticoat of it."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 461.

2875. INNOVATION resented. Peter the Great. Meantime the absence of the Czar had given occasion to some disturbances in the empire. The spirit of innovation which he had already shown, and the further fruits expected from his foreign travels, gave great disgust to a barbarous people wedded to their ancient manners. The ambition of Sophia fomented these disquiets, and the Strelitzes had determined to place that princess upon the throne. At this important juncture Peter returned to Russia; he found it necessary to make a most severe exertion of his power; and he took that opportunity of entirely annihilating that dangerous body of the Strelitzes who by this revolt furnished him with a just pretext. They had marched in arms to Moscow. The regular troops of the Czar, headed by Gordon and another foreign officer, attacked and totally defeated them; a vast number was slain; their leaders who were taken prisoners were broken upon the wheel; two thousand were hanged upon the walls of Moscow and on the side of the high roads, and the rest banished with their wives and children into the wilds of Siberia. Thus the whole of this formidable body was destroyed, and their name abolished forever. The astonished Russians beheld this dreadful example with silent terror, which paved the way for an easy submission to all those innovations which the Czar afterwards made in the constitution, police, laws, and customs of his empire.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 35, p. 476.

2876. INNS, Attractive. England. In the seventeenth century England abounded with excellent inns of every rank. The traveller sometimes, in a small village, lighted on a public house such as Walton has described, where the brick floor was swept clean, where the walls were stuck round with ballads, where the sheets smelt of lavender, and where a blazing fire, a cup of good ale, and a dish of trouts fresh from the neighboring brook were to be procured at small charge. At the larger houses of entertainment were to be found beds hung with silk, choice cookery, and claret equal to the best which was drunk in London. The innkeepers too, it was said, were not like other innkeepers. On the Continent the landlord was the tyrant of those who crossed the threshold. In England he was a servant. Never was an Englishman more at home than when he took his ease in his inn. . . . The liberty and jollity of inns long furnished matter to our novelists and dramatists. Johnson declared that a tavern chair was the throne of human felicity; and Shenstone gently complained that no private roof, however friendly, gave the wanderer so warm a welcome as that which was to be found at an inn.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 359.

2877. INQUISITION, Abominable. In Spain. A wise and vigorous though a severe administration characterized the beginning of the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella. Spain was at this time in great disorder—the whole country was a prey to robbers and outlaws. Even the nobility lived by depredation, and defended themselves in their castles against every legal attempt to restrain their violence. The new monarchs of Castile and Arragon determined to repress these enormities. The castles of the piratical nobles were razed to the ground. The office of the Santa Hermandad, or Holy Brotherhood, was instituted for the detection and punishment of murders, thefts, and all atrocious crimes. But amid these laudable cares, the abominable tribunal of the Inquisition was furnished with such an extent of powers that, under the pretence of extirpating heresy and impiety, the whole kingdom became a scene of blood and horror. The fortunes and the lives of individuals were entirely at the mercy of the grand inquisitor and his associates. It was never allowed to a criminal to be confronted with his accuser, nor even to be informed of his crime; the sole method of trial was by exposing the unhappy wretch to the most extreme tortures, which either ended his life in agony or forced a confession of his guilt, which was expiated by committing him to the flames. It is computed that after the appointment of Torquemada, the inquisitor-general of Spain, there were six thousand persons burnt in the short space of four years.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 15, p. 218.

2878. INQUISITION, Romish. France. With a view to consolidate the conquest, the Inquisition was formally established at Toulouse by a council held there in November, 1229, the office of inquisitors being intrusted to the order of the Dominicans, or Friars Preachers. . . . Its proceedings took place in secret; no advocates were permitted to plead, no witnesses were produced.

The object was to extort the confession of crime through the moral and physical prostration of the miserable victim ; and to this end the most iniquitous and revolting means were employed without scruple ; the most subtle trickery, the most unblushing deceit, the most ruthless torture. On certain occasions, which soon became frequent, the Holy Office published its sentences and inflicted its punishments. Of the latter there were three degrees ; those who had made absolute submission, and were deemed the least criminal, were admitted to penance ; those who had not given complete satisfaction (the most numerous class) were immured for life in prison ; those who stubbornly refused to confess, or who relapsed after confession, were committed to the flames.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 9, § 2.

2879. INSANITY, Capacity with. George III. At the moment of passing the Stamp Act, George III. was crazed. . . . [He had] taught the world that a bit of parchment bearing the sign of his hand, scrawled in the flickering light of clouded reason, could, under the British constitution, do the full legislative office of the king. Had he been a private man, his signature could have given validity to no commission whatever.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 11.

2880. INSANITY feared. Samuel Johnson. To Johnson, whose supreme enjoyment was the exercise of his reason, the disturbance or obscuration of that faculty was the evil most to be dreaded. Insanity, therefore, was the object of his most dismal apprehension ; and he fancied himself seized by it, or approaching to it, at the very time when he was giving proofs of a more than ordinary soundness and vigor of judgment.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 12.

2881. INSANITY, Moral. Cambyses. [The Persian monarch and son of Cyrus.] His conduct was such as to bear every mark of insanity. In an inconsiderate expedition against the Æthiopians, he threw away the greater part of his army. Fifty thousand men, sent into the deserts of Ammon, perished through fatigue and famine. With a deliberate purpose of wantonly exasperating the Egyptians, who were disposed to the most peaceable submission, Cambyses ordered the magnificent temple of Thebes to be pillaged and burnt. At the celebration of the festival of Apis, at Memphis, he stabbed the sacred ox with his poniard, ordered the priests to be scourged, and massacred all the people who assisted at the sacrifice. He put to death his brother Smerdis, because he dreamed that he saw him seated on the throne ; and when his wife and sister, Meroe, lamented the fate of her brother, he killed her with a stroke of his foot. To prove his dexterity in archery, he pierced the son of his favorite Prexaspes though the heart with an arrow.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11, p. 116.

2882. INSANITY, Perils from. Sir Walter Scott. At the age of eighteen-months the boy had a teething-fever, ending in a life-long lameness ; and this was the reason why the child was sent to reside with his grandfather . . . at Sandy-Knowe, near the ruined tower of Smalholm, celebrated afterward in his ballad of "The Eve of St. John," in the neighborhood of some fine crags. To these crags the housemaid sent from Edinburgh to look after him used to carry him up, with a design (which she confessed to the housekeepers)—due, of course, to incipient insanity—of murdering the child there and burying him in the moss. Of course the maid was dismissed.—HUTTON'S LIFE OF SCOTT, ch. 1.

2883. INSANITY, Religious. William Cowper. [His life had become an almost endless round of devotional exercises, without recreation.] His mode of life under [Rev. John] Newton was enough to account for the return of his disease, which in this sense may be fairly laid to the charge of religion. He again went mad, fancied, as before, that he was rejected of Heaven, ceased to pray as one helplessly doomed, and again attempted suicide. Newton and Mrs. Unwin at first treated the disease as a diabolical visitation, and "with deplorable consistency," to borrow the phrase used by one of their friends in the case of Cowper's desperate abstinence from prayer, abstained from calling in a physician. Of this, again, their religion must bear the reproach. In other respects they behaved admirably. Mrs. Unwin, shut up for sixteen months with her unhappy partner, tended him with unfailing love ; alone she did it, for he could bear no one else about him ; though, to make her part more trying, he had conceived the insane idea that she hated him. Seldom has a stronger proof been given of the sustaining power of affection.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 3.

2884. INSANITY, Royal. George III. [He was incapacitated for the duties of his position, at various times, from insanity ; during the last nine years of his life he was in a demented condition.]—KNIGHT'S ENG.

2885. INSENSIBILITY to Suffering. William Penn. William Penn, for whom exhibitions which humane men generally avoid seem to have had a strong attraction, hastened from Cheapside, where he had seen Cornish hanged, to Tyburn, in order to see Elizabeth Gaunt burned. He afterward related that, when she calmly disposed the straw about her in such a manner as to shorten her sufferings, all the bystanders burst into tears. [See more at No. 2850.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 616.

2886. INSINCERITY, Blemish of. Julius Cæsar. So ended Cicero, a tragic combination of magnificent talents, high aspirations, and true desire to do right, with an infirmity of purpose and a latent insincerity of character which neutralized and could almost make us forget his nobler qualities. . . . In Cicero nature half made a great man and left him uncompleted.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 27.

2887. INSINCERITY of Jesuits. Dissembling. [When, in 1580, the Jesuits invaded England, they maintained that Queen Elizabeth was not only a heretic but also a usurper, and that the pope had a right to deprive her of her crown.] Gregory XIII. opened the door for the evasion of this charge by granting to Romanists permission to dissemble, under the color of an explanation, "that the bull should be considered as always in force against Elizabeth and the heretics, but should only be binding on Catholics when due execution of it could be had"—that is, that they should obey till they were strong enough to throw off their allegiance.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 12, p. 180.

2888. INSOLENCE, Consummate. Jeffreys'. The renegade soon found a patron in the obdurate and revengeful James, but was always regarded with scorn and disgust by Charles, whose faults, great as they were, had no affinity with insolence and cruelty. "That man," said the king, "has no learning, no sense, no manners, and more impudence than ten carted street-walkers." Work was to be done, however, which could be trusted to no man who revered law or was sensible of shame; and thus Jeffreys, at an age at which a barrister thinks himself fortunate if he is employed to lead an important cause, was made chief justice of the King's Bench [by James II.].—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 420.

2889. INSOLENCE, Ecclesiastical. Pope Gregory VII. [Being deposed by the pope,] Henry [II.], now reduced to extremity, was forced to deprecate the wrath of that power which he had formerly so much despised. Attended by a few domestics, he passed the Alps, and finding the pope at Canosa, he presented himself at his holiness' gate, without either guards or attendants. This insolent man ordered him to be stripped of his clothes, which were exchanged for a hair-cloth; and after making him fast for three days, condescended to allow him to kiss his feet, where he obtained absolution, on condition of awaiting and conforming himself to the sentence of the diet of Augsburg.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 7, p. 128.

2890. INSOLENCE, Official. James II. [See more at No. 1842.] On the day after his arrival the fellows of Magdalen College were ordered to attend him. [They had voted against his wishes for a Protestant President.] He treated them with an insolence such as had never been shown to their predecessors by the Puritan visitors. "You have not dealt with me like gentlemen," he exclaimed. "You have been unmannerly as well as undutiful." They fell on their knees and tendered their petition. He would not look at it. "Is this your Church of England loyalty? I could not have believed that so many men of the Church of England would have been concerned in this business. Go home. Get your gone. I am king. I will be obeyed. Go to your chapel this instant and admit the Bishop of Oxford [the king's Roman Catholic nominee for president]. Let those who refuse look to it. They shall feel the whole weight of my hand. They shall know what it is to incur the displeasure of their sovereign." . . . [They retired to their chapel, and] declared that in all things lawful they were ready to obey their king, but that they would not violate their statutes and their oaths.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 273.

2892. INSOLVENCY, Governmental. Reign of Charles II. Ashley and Clifford [members of his cabinet] proposed a flagitious breach of public faith. The goldsmiths of London were then not only dealers in the precious metals, but also bankers, and were in the habit of advancing large sums of money to the government. In return for these advances they received assignments on the revenue, and were repaid with interest as the taxes came in. About £1,300,000 had been in this way intrusted to the honor of the State. On a sudden it was announced that it was not convenient to pay the principal, and that the lenders must content themselves with interest. They were consequently unable to meet their own engagements. The Exchange was in an uproar; several great mercantile houses broke; and dismay and distress spread through all society.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 200.

2893. INSPIRATION, Claim of. King of the Goths. An Italian hermit, whose zeal and sanctity were respected by the barbarians themselves, encountered the victorious monarch, and boldly denounced the indignation of Heaven against the oppressors of the earth; but the saint himself was confounded by the solemn asseveration of Alaric, that he felt a secret and preternatural impulse, which directed and even compelled his march to the gates of Rome.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 249.

2894. INSPIRATION, Professed. Joan of Arc. The sorceress was eighteen years of age; she was a beautiful and most desirable girl, of good height, and with a sweet and heart-touching voice. She entered the splendid circle with all humility, "like a poor little shepherdess," distinguished at the first glance the king, who had purposely kept himself amid the crowd of courtiers; and although at first he maintained that he was not the king, she fell down and embraced his knees. But as he had not been crowned, she only styled him dauphin. "Gentle dauphin," she addressed him, "my name is Jehanne la Pucelle. The King of Heaven sends you word by me that you shall be consecrated and crowned in the city of Rheims, and shall be lieutenant of the King of Heaven, who is King of France."—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 9.

2895. INSPIRATION, Proof of. Joan of Arc. Charles designedly dressed himself far less richly than many of his courtiers were apparelled, and mingled with them when Joan was introduced, in order to see if the Holy Maid would address her exhortations to the wrong person. But she instantly singled him out, and kneeling before him, said: "Most noble dauphin, the King of Heaven announces to you by me that you shall be anointed and crowned king in the city of Rheims, and that you shall be His vicegerent in France." His features may probably have been seen by her previously in portraits, or have been described to her by others; but she herself believed that her Voices inspired her when she addressed the king; and the report soon spread abroad that the Holy Maid had found the king by a miracle.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 374.

2896. INSULT more than Injury. Arabs. The nice sense of honor which weighs the insult rather than the injury sheds its deadly venom on the quarrels of the Arabs; the honor of their women and their beards is most easily wounded; an indecent action, a contemptuous word, can be expiated only by the blood of the offender; and such is their patient inveteracy, that they expect whole months and years the opportunity of revenge. A fine or compensation for murder is familiar to the barbarians of every age; but in Arabia the kinsmen of the dead are at liberty to accept the atonement, or to exercise with their own hands the law of toleration. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 88.

2897. INSULT to Jealousy. Flogging. [The aristocracy were mad at Cæsar.] Como, one of the most thriving towns in the north of Italy, had been enfranchised by Cæsar. An eminent citizen from Como happening to be at Rome, Marcellus publicly flogged him, and bade him go back and tell his fellow-townsmen the value of Cæsar's gift to them. — FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 20.

2898. INSULT, The last. Crusaders. A single knight could impart, according to his judgment, the character which he received; and the warlike sovereigns of Europe derived more glory from this personal distinction than from the lustre of their diadem. This ceremony, of which some traces may be found in Tacitus and the woods of Germany, was in its origin simple and profane: the candidate, after some previous trial, was invested with the sword and spurs; and his cheek or shoulder was touched with a slight blow, as an emblem of the last affront which it was lawful for him to endure. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58, p. 562.

2899. INSULT, Political. To William Pitt, Prime Minister. Pitt, on the 27th of July, went to pay Rockingham [ex-prime-minister and leader of the aristocracy] a visit of respect, and had passed the threshold, when the young chief of the great Whig families, refusing to receive him, turned the venerable man of the people from his door. But he was never afterward able to resume office, except with the friends of the minister he now insulted. — BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 26.

2900. INSULT, Rebellion from. Persians. [The Persian Emperor Hormouz was jealous of his successful and loyal General Bahram after his great victory over the Turks. And] no sooner had Bahram collected and reviewed his forces, than he received from a royal messenger the insulting gift of a distaff, a spinning-wheel, and a complete suit of female apparel. Obedient to the will of his sovereign, he showed himself to the soldiers in this unworthy disguise; they resented his ignominy and their own; a shout of rebellion ran through the ranks; and the general accepted their oath of fidelity and vows of revenge. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 46, p. 434.

2901. INSULT, Remembrance of. Darius. The Ionians, with their Athenian allies, ravaged and burnt the city of Sardis, destroying the magnificent temple of Cybele, the tutelary goddess of the country; but the Persians defeated them with great slaughter, and compelled the Athenians hastily to re-embark their troops at Ephesus, glad to make the best of their way to Greece. This insult, however, sunk deep into the mind of Darius, and from that moment he vowed the destruction of Greece. That his resolution might suffer no delay or abatement, he caused a crier to proclaim every day when he sat down to table, "Great sovereign, remember the Athenians." — TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 1, p. 128.

2902. INSULT, Stinging. Colonel Tarleton. Tarleton [a captured British officer of Cornwallis' army] was speaking sarcastically of Colonel [William] Washington in the presence of Mrs. Ashe. "I would be happy to see Colonel Washington," he said, with a sneer. Mrs. Ashe instantly replied, "If you had looked behind you at the battle of Cowpens you would have enjoyed that pleasure." — CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 6.

2903. INSULT, An unconscious. James II. [The young grandsons of William Kiffin had been legally murdered by the monster Jeffreys, because of their religious faith. The king wished to gain the Dissenters, to use them against the Established Church.] The heartless and venal sycophants of Whitehall, judging by themselves, thought that the old man would be easily propitiated by an alderman's gown, and by some compensation in money for the property which his grandsons had forfeited. . . . Kiffin was ordered to attend at the palace. He found a brilliant circle of noblemen and gentlemen assembled. James immediately came to him, spoke to him very graciously, and concluded by saying, "I have put you down, Mr. Kiffin, for an alderman of London." The old man looked fixedly at the king, burst into tears, and made answer, "Sir, I am worn out; I am unfit to serve your Majesty or the city. And, sir, the death of my poor boys broke my heart. That wound is as fresh as ever. I shall carry it to my grave." The king stood silent for a minute in some confusion, and then said, "Mr. Kiffin, I will find a balsam for that sore." Assuredly James did not mean to say anything cruel or insolent. . . . They are the words of a hard-hearted and low-minded man, unable to conceive any laceration of the affections for which a place or a pension would not be a full compensation. — MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 212.

2904. INSULTS, Argument by. Samuel Johnson's. The great lexicographer, spoiled by the homage of society, was still more prone than Goldsmith to lose temper when the argument went against him. He could not brook appearing to be worsted, but would attempt to bear down his adversary by the rolling thunder of his periods; and when that failed, would become downright insulting. Boswell called it "having recourse to some sudden mode of robust sophistry;" but Goldsmith designated it much more happily. "There is no arguing with Johnson," said he, "for when his pistol misses fire, he knocks you down with the butt end of it." — IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 19, p. 127.

2905. INSULTS with Misfortunes. James II. [When his perversity had ruined all his prospects, he called a council of eminent men. England was now invaded by William of Orange.] Then Clarendon rose, and, to the astonishment of all who remembered his loud professions of loyalty and the agony of shame and sorrow into which he had been thrown, only a few days before, by the news of his son's defection, broke forth into a vehement invective against tyranny and popery. "Even now," he said, "his Majesty is raising in London a regiment into which no Protestant is admitted." "That is not true," cried James, in great agitation, from the head of the board. Clarendon persisted, and left this offensive topic only to pass to a topic still more offensive. He accused the unfortunate king of pusillanimity. Why retreat from Salisbury? Why not try the event of a battle? Could people be blamed for submitting to the invader when they saw their sovereign run away at the head of his army? James felt these insults keenly, and remembered them long.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 482.

2906. INTELLECT clouded. Jeffreys. His legal knowledge, indeed, was merely such as he had picked up in practice of no very high kind; but he had one of those happily-constituted intellects which, across labyrinths of sophistry and through masses of immaterial facts, go straight to the true point. Of his intellect, however, he seldom had the full use. Even in civil causes his malevolent and despotic temper perpetually disordered his judgment. . . . His looks and tones had inspired terror when he was merely a young advocate struggling into practice. Now that he was at the head of the most formidable tribunal in the realm, there were few indeed who did not tremble before him. Even when he was sober, his violence was sufficiently frightful; but in general his reason was overclouded and his evil passions stimulated by the fumes of intoxication. His evenings were ordinarily given to revelry. People who saw him only over his bottle would have supposed him to be a man gross indeed, sottish.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 418.

2907. INTELLECT, Dullness of. John Howard. John Howard, therefore, was a decidedly illiterate man. He spelled very incorrectly, and expressed himself on paper in the most awkward and ungrammatical manner. He was probably a dull boy, as he was rather a dull man. There is no question that, in point of mere intellect, he was not much above the average of English tradesmen.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 32.

2908. INTELLECT, Parsimonious. Later Greeks. The Greeks of Constantinople, after purging away the impurities of their vulgar speech, acquired the free use of their ancient language, the most happy composition of human art, and a familiar knowledge of the sublime masters who had pleased or instructed the first of nations. But these advantages only tend to aggravate the reproach and shame of a degenerate people. They held in their lifeless hands the riches of their fathers, without inheriting the spirit which had created and improved that sacred patrimony; they read, they praised, they compiled, but their languid souls seemed alike incapable of thought and action. In the revolution of ten centuries, not a single discovery was made to exalt the dignity or promote the happiness of mankind. Not a single idea has been added to the speculative systems of antiquity, and a succession of patient disciples became in their turn the dogmatic teachers of the next servile generation. Not a single composition of history, philosophy, or literature has been saved from oblivion by the intrinsic beauties of style or sentiment, of original fancy, or even of successful imitation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53, p. 381.

2909. INTELLECT, Uncultivated. American Indians. The red man has aptitude at imitation rather than invention; he learns easily; his natural logic is correct and discriminating, and he seizes on the nicest distinctions in comparing objects. But he is deficient in the power of imagination to combine and bring unity into his floating fancies, and in the faculty of abstraction to lift himself out of the dominion of his immediate experience. He is nearly destitute of abstract moral truth—of general principles; and as a consequence equalling the white man in the sagacity of the senses, and in judgments resting on them, he is inferior in reason and the moral qualities.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

2910. INTELLIGENCE, Poverty of. Samuel Johnson. Speaking of a dull, tiresome fellow, whom he chanced to meet, he said, "That fellow seems to me to possess but one idea, and that is a wrong one."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 177.

2911. INTEMPERANCE, Ancient. "Norman Gentlemen." [In 1090] the "wealthy curled darlings" passed their time in banqueting and drunkenness, in idle talk and gambling.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 16, p. 221.

2912. — — — Alexander. Alexander, as soon as he retired from the funeral pile [where an Indian prince named Calanus had been consumed], invited his friends and officers to supper, and, to give life to the carousal, promised that the man who drank most should be crowned for his victory. Promachus drank four measures of wine (about fourteen quarts), and carried off the crown, which was worth a talent, but survived it only three days. The rest of the guests, as Charles tells us, drank to such a degree that forty-one of them lost their lives, the weather coming upon them extremely cold during their intoxication.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

2913. INTEMPERANCE a fine Art. Cyrus. [Cyrus wrote the Lacedæmonians for assistance. In his letter he] spoke in very high terms of himself, telling them he had a greater and more princely heart than his brother; that he was the better philosopher, being instructed in the doctrines of the Magi, and that he could drink and bear more wine than his brother.—PLUTARCH'S ARTAXERXES.

2914. INTEMPERANCE, Blight of. Edgar Allan Poe. [He was engaged to marry one of the most brilliant young women of New England. After the bans were published he was seen] reeling through the streets of the city which was the lady's home; and in the evening that should have been the evening before the bridal, in his drunkenness he committed at her house such outrages as made necessary a summons of the police. [He was afterward found in the streets of Baltimore drunk and dying, and closed his life in the hospital.]—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 341.

2915. INTEMPERANCE, Burdens of. Benjamin Franklin. [He took a young Boston friend with him on his return to Philadelphia.] On the journey [young] Franklin discovered that his friend had become a slave to drink. He was sorely plagued and disgraced by him, and at last the young drunkard had spent all his money, and had no way of getting on but by Franklin's aid. . . . He shared his purse with him till it was empty, and then began on some money which he had been intrusted with for another, and so got him to Philadelphia, where he still assisted him. It was seven years before Franklin could pay off all the debt.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 130.

2916. INTEMPERANCE destroys Character. Do-nothing Kings. The title of "Rois fainéants"—"do-nothing kings"—expresses very aptly the character of the last descendants of the house of Clovis. At the moment when circumstances demanded from the occupants of the Frankish throne a more than ordinary share of talent and force of character, they lapsed into a state of imbecility and insignificance, both bodily and mental. Intemperance and debauchery entailed on them premature decrepitude; few attained the mature age of manhood; they rarely appeared in public, except at the annual pageant of the Champ de Mars.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 4, § 8.

2917. INTEMPERANCE, Churchly. "Whitsun-ales." [In the latter part of the sixteenth century,] at the season of Whitsuntide, when the spring was calling up "a spirit of life in everything," there was a parish feast, which the church-wardens had prepared for by an ale-brewing [called Church-ale]; and the profit that was made by filling the black-jacks of the jovial countrymen was applied to the repairs of the church. Fancy-fairs have superseded Whitsun-ales.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 254.

2918. INTEMPERANCE common. England, 1593. [Stubbes says] every country, city, town, village, and other places hath abundance of alehouses, taverns, and inns, which are so fraught with malt-worms night and day that you would wonder to see them. [Knight says] there were punishments for low debauchery, such as the drunkard's cloak. Against this growing sin, which was creeping up from the peasant and mechanic to the yeoman and the courtier, the preachers lifted up their voices in the pulpit, and not always in vain.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 242.

2919. INTEMPERANCE in Court. Trial of Strafford. [On the trial of Strafford by Parliament it is said that] after ten o'clock bottles of beer and wine were going from mouth to mouth without cups.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 28, p. 450.

2920. INTEMPERANCE, Crime by. England, 1750. [In 1750 Henry Fielding gives] his experience as a magistrate: "Wretches are often brought before me charged with theft or robbery, whom I am forced to confine before they are in a condition to be examined; and when they have afterward become sober, I have plainly perceived, from the state of the case, that the gin alone was the cause of the transgression." . . . In 1751 Mr. Potter, a rising member of Parliament, "produced several physicians, and masters of workhouses, to prove the fatal consequences of spirituous liquors, which laid waste the meaner parts of the town, and were now spreading into the country."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 12, p. 191.

2921. INTEMPERANCE, Crimes of. Working Classes. The awful misuse of the labor of children and women [in the British collieries] proceeded, not from the necessities of the collier's family, but from his own gross and sensual indulgences. It was in evidence that many of the miners worked only eight or nine days in a fortnight, and then spent the large earnings of two thirds of their working-time in drinking and gambling.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 22, p. 396.

2922. INTEMPERANCE, Custom of. England, 1742. The Duke of Newcastle gave a great dinner at Claremont to his colleagues. The servants, as was customary at this period, all got drunk.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 7, p. 108.

2923. ———. Lords of Manors. [Reign of Charles II.] His table was loaded with coarse plenty, and guests were cordially welcomed to it; but, as the habit of drinking to excess was general in the class to which he belonged, and as his fortune did not enable him to intoxicate large assemblies daily with claret or canary, strong beer was the ordinary beverage. The quantity of beer consumed in those days was indeed enormous; for beer then was to the middle and lower classes not only all that beer now is, but all that wine, tea, and ardent spirits now are. It was only at great houses or on great occasions that foreign drink was placed on the board. The ladies of the house, whose business it had commonly been to cook the repast, retired as soon as the dishes had been devoured, and left the gentlemen to their ale and tobacco. The coarse jollity of the afternoon was often prolonged till the revellers were laid under the table.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 299.

2924. INTEMPERANCE, Debased by. Napoleon I. "The English," said he, "appear to prefer the bottle to the society of their ladies, as is exemplified by dismissing the ladies from the table, and remaining for hours to drink and intoxicate themselves. Were I in England, I should certainly leave the table with the ladies."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 7.

2925. INTEMPERANCE, Diseased by. Augustus Galerius. His death was occasioned by a very painful and lingering disorder. His body, swelled by an intemperate course of life to an unwieldy corpulence, was covered with ulcers, and devoured by innumerable swarms of those insects which have given their name to a most loathsome disease.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 14, p. 470.

2926. INTEMPERANCE in Eating. Soliman. Soliman [the Mohammedan caliph] died of an indigestion in his camp near Kinnisrin or Chalcis in Syria, as he was preparing to lead against Constantinople the remaining forces of the East. NOTE.—The caliph had emptied two baskets of eggs and of figs, which he swallowed alternately, and the repast was concluded with marrow and sugar. In one of his pilgrimages to Mecca, Soliman ate, at a single meal, seventy pomegranates, a kid, six fowls, and a huge quantity of the grapes of Tayef. If the bill of fare be correct, we must admire the appetite rather than the luxury of the sovereign of Asia.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 52, p. 280.

2927. ———. Samuel Johnson. It must be owned that Johnson, though he could be rigidly abstemious, was not a temperate man either in eating or drinking. He could refrain, but he could not use moderately. He told me that he had fasted two days without inconvenience, and that he had never been hungry but once. They who beheld with wonder how much he eat upon all occasions when his dinner was to his taste, could not easily conceive what he must have meant by hunger; and not only was he remarkable for the extraordinary quantity which he ate, but he was, or affected to be, a man of a very nice discernment in the science of cookery.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 130.

2928. INTEMPERANCE, Example of. For the Young. [The Spartans had many slaves called Helotes. Sometimes they] made them drink until they were intoxicated, and in that condition led them into the public halls, to show the young men what drunkenness was. They ordered them to sing mean songs and to dance ridiculous dances, but not to meddle with any that were genteel and graceful.—PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

2929. INTEMPERANCE, Fatal. Louis X. He expired at Vincennes of a disorder occasioned by drinking wine immoderately when overheated by a game at ball.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 9, § 21, p. 190.

2930. ——. Athalaric. [Athalaric, the young Gothic King of Italy, was abandoned to wine, and at the age of sixteen was consumed by premature intemperance.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 149.

2931. ——. Alexander the Great. One day after he had given Nearchus [one of his commanders] a sumptuous treat, he went, according to custom, to refresh himself in the bath in order to retire to rest. But in the mean time Medius came and invited him to take part in a carousal, and he could not deny him. There he drank all that night and the next day, until at last he found a fever coming upon him. It did not, however, seize him as he was drinking the cup of Hercules, nor did he find a sudden pain in his back, as if it had been pierced with a spear. These are circumstances invented by writers, who thought the catastrophe of so noble a tragedy should be something affecting and extraordinary. Aristobulus tells us that in the rage of his fever and the violence of his thirst he took a draught of wine, which threw him into a frenzy, and that he died the thirtieth of the month Dæsius (June).—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

2932. INTEMPERANCE of Females. Nobility. A.D. 1606. [James I., having received a liberal subsidy from Parliament,] indulged in every species of disgusting excess, in which the royal example was so encouraging that . . . the ladies abandoned their sobriety, and were seen to roll about in intoxication.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 22, p. 339.

2933. INTEMPERANCE fostered. Hugh Miller. "The drinking usages of the [stone masons'] profession in which I labored were at this time many; when a foundation was laid, the workmen were treated to drink; . . . when the walls were levelled for laying the joists; . . . when the building was finished; . . . when an apprentice joined the squad; . . . when his 'apron was washed;' . . . when his time was out, and occasionally they learned to treat one another. [Miller soon became a teetotaler.]—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 94.

2934. INTEMPERANCE and Genius. Addison. Hear Swift: "I dined with Mr. Addison and Dick Stuart. They were half fuddled, but not I; for I mixed water with my wine, and left them together between nine and ten." [October 31, 1710.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 27, p. 426.

2935. INTEMPERANCE, Governmental. Drunken Parliament. The Parliament which met at Edinburgh on the 1st of January, 1661, has been honored with the name of "the drunken Parliament." [Bishop] Burnet says: "It was a mad, roaring time, full of extravagance; and no wonder it was so, when the men of affairs were almost perpetually drunk."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 16, p. 258.

2936. INTEMPERANCE through Hospitality. Treating. [At the commencement of the eighteenth century] the barbarous hospitality that induced "gentlemen to think it was one of the honors of their houses that none must go out of them sober," was a little wearing away.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 4, p. 54.

2937. INTEMPERANCE, Loss by. Stephen A. Douglas. On the breaking out of the rebellion, in 1861, he gave his hand to Abraham Lincoln, and engaged to stand by him in his efforts to save the country; all his errors were instantly forgiven. But his days were numbered. During his herculean labors of the previous year he had sustained himself by deep draughts of whiskey; and his constitution gave way at the very time when a new and nobler career opened up before him. . . . When I saw him last he was standing on the balcony of the Metropolitan Hotel in New York, . . . his large face as red as fire.—PARTON'S CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 203.

2938. INTEMPERANCE manifested. Offensive. I heard him [Johnson] once give a very judicious practical advice upon this subject: "A man who has been drinking wine at all freely should never go into a new company. With those who have partaken wine with him he may be pretty well in unison; but he will, probably, be offensive, or appear ridiculous, to other people."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 276.

2939. INTEMPERANCE, Perils of. Retreat from Moscow. On the 9th of November Napoleon reached Smolensk. He had hoped to find shelter, clothing, and provisions. He found only rain and famine. There was brandy in abundance. The soldiers in despair drank to utter stupefaction, and during the night perished miserably in the icy streets. In the morning the pavement was covered with the frozen bodies of the dead.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 14.

2940. ——. Indians. [After the surrender of Fort William Henry, at Lake George, to the French,] a safe escort was promised to Fort Edward. . . . Unfortunately the Indians procured a quantity of whiskey from the English camp. Maddened with intoxication, and in spite of the utmost exertions of Montcalm and his officers, the savages fell upon the prisoners, and began a massacre. Thirty of the English were tomahawked. . . . The retirement . . . became a panic and a rout.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 34, p. 270.

2941. INTEMPERANCE, Power of. War. The intemperate thirst of strong liquors often urged the barbarians to invade the provinces on which art or nature had bestowed those much-envied presents. The Tuscan who betrayed his country to the Celtic nations attracted them into Italy by the prospect of the rich fruits and delicious wines, the productions of a happier climate. And in the same manner the German auxiliaries, invited into France during the civil wars of the sixteenth century, were allured by the promise of plenteous quarters in the provinces of Champagne and Burgundy. Drunkenness, the most illiberal, but not the most dangerous of our vices, was sometimes capable, in a less civilized state of mankind, of occasioning a battle, a war, or a revolution.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 262.

2942. INTEMPERANCE prolonged. Dionysius. The reins of that monarchy which Dionysius vainly called adamantine fell gradually from the loose and dissolute hand that held them. This young prince, it is said, would continue the scene of intoxication for ninety days without intermission, during which time no sober person was admitted to his court, where all was drunkenness and buffoonery, revelry and riot.—PLUTARCH.

2943. INTEMPERANCE—PROPERTY. Con-sumption. [Cato the Censor was one day] pointing to a man who had sold a paternal estate near the seaside; he pretended to admire him as one that was stronger than the sea itself; "For," said he, "what the sea could not have swallowed without difficulty, this man has taken down with all the ease imaginable."—PLUTARCH'S CATO.

2944. INTEMPERANCE, Religion against. Puritans. [In 1653 Colonel Hutchinson, M.P., in the part of the country where he lived] procured unnecessary ale-houses to be put down in all the towns; and if any one that he heard of suffered any disorder or debauchery in his house, he would not suffer him to brew any more. He was a little severe against drunkenness, for which the drunkards would sometimes rail at him.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 11, p. 172.

2945. INTEMPERANCE renounced. Normans. They renounced that brutal intemperance to which all the other branches of the great German family were too much inclined. The polite luxury of the Norman presented a striking contrast to the coarse voracity and drunkenness of his Saxon and Danish neighbors. He loved to display his magnificence, not in huge piles of food and hogsheds of strong drink, but in large and stately edifices, rich armor, gallant horses, choice falcons, well-ordered tournaments, banquets delicate rather than abundant, and wines remarkable rather for their exquisite flavor than for their intoxicating power.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 11.

2946. INTEMPERANCE, Revenue from. State. [The national debt of Great Britain was begun by borrowing ten millions of money to carry on the war of William III. against Louis XIV. The loan was secured by] "An Act for granting to their majesties certain rates and duties of excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 10, p. 156.

2947. INTEMPERANCE, Shameful. Reign of James II. There were two Protestant members of the cabinet who took no decided part in the struggle. Jeffreys was at that time tortured by a cruel internal malady which had been aggravated by intemperance. At a dinner which a wealthy alderman gave to some of the leading members of the government, the lord treasurer and the lord chancellor were so drunk that they stripped themselves almost stark naked, and were with difficulty prevented from climbing up a sign-post to drink his Majesty's health.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 61.

2948. INTEMPERANCE, Shameless. English. Noble Britons, up to the end of the eighteenth century, thought it no disgrace to a gentleman to be led reeling home by the watchman, or to fall under the table, whilst roaring out the bacchanalian songs which were the most precious gifts of the English muse. . . . The president who is concocting a fresh bowl of punch is a rubicund divine, whose calling, according to the theory of that age, is as much devoted to the corkscrew hanging from his finger as by the band and cassock which he wears.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 30, p. 468.

2949. INTEMPERANCE endangers the State. Battle of Germantown. The delay in the arrival of the ammunition wagons was productive of the most serious consequences in the action of the succeeding day [to the Americans]. The general officer to whom the blame of this delay was attached was afterward discovered in a state of intoxication, lying in the corner of a fence. [In the midst of the battle the ammunition failed.] He was brought to a court-martial and cashiered.—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 4.

2950. INTEMPERANCE, Strange. Tartars. The wines of a happier climate are the most grateful present, or the most valuable commodity, that can be offered to the Tartars; and the only example of their industry seems to consist in the art of extracting from mare's milk a fermented liquor, which possesses a very strong power of intoxication.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26, p. 6.

2952. INTEMPERANCE, Victim of. Sheridan. The same night in which Sheridan had electrified Parliament with his eloquence he might have been picked up drunk in the streets.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 22, p. 402.

2953. ———. Robert Burns, having gone from his plough to become the spoiled child of Edinburgh society, fell into habits of intemperance.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 7, p. 116.

2954. ———. Robert Burns. Early in the month of January, when his health was in the course of improvement, Burns tarried to a late hour at a jovial party in the Globe tavern. Before returning home, he unluckily remained for some time in the open air, and overpowered by the effects of the liquor he had drunk, fell asleep. . . . A fatal chill penetrated his bones; he reached home with the seeds of a rheumatic fever already in possession of his weakened frame. In this little accident, and not in the pressure of poverty or disrepute, or wounded feelings or a broken heart, truly lay the determining cause of the sadly shortened days of our national poet.—SHAIRP'S BURNS, ch. 7.

2955. ———. Edgar Allan Poe. Edgar Allan Poe, like Byron and many others, appears to have been a man whose brain was permanently injured by alcohol, and so injured that there was no safety for him except in total and eternal abstinence from every intoxicating drink. I have often heard the late N. P. Willis speak of Poe's conduct when he was sub-editor of the Evening Mirror, of which Mr. Willis was one of the editors. Poe, he would say, was usually one of the most quiet, regular, and gentlemanlike of men, remarkably neat in his person, elegant and orderly about his work, and wholly unexceptionable in conduct and demeanor. But in a weak moment, tempted, perhaps, by a friend or by the devil Opportunity, he would take one glass of wine or liquor. From that moment he was another being. His self-control was gone. An irresistible thirst for strong drink possessed him, and he would drink and drink and drink, as long as he could lift a glass to his lips. If he could not get good liquor, he would drink bad; all he desired was something fiercely stimulating. He would frequently keep this up for several days and nights, until, in fact, his system was perfectly exhausted, and he had been taken helpless and unresisting to bed.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 736.

2956. INTEMPERANCE, Wages and. "Cider Wages." [About the close of the seventeenth century began a custom which has continued until the present time. It was] "the payment, by the farmer, of a portion of his laborers' wages in cider."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 15, p. 15.

2957. INTERCOURSE, Unity by. United States. The third cause of the civil war was the want of intercourse between the people of the North and the South. The great railroads and thoroughfares ran East and West. Emigration flowed from the East to the West. Between the North and South there was little travel or interchange of opinion. From want of acquaintance the people, without intending it, became estranged, jealous, suspicious. They misjudged each other's motives; they misrepresented each other's beliefs and purposes: they suspected each other of dishonesty and ill-will. Before the outbreak of the war the people of the two sections looked upon each other almost in the light of different nationalities.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 62, p. 489.

2958. INTEREST prohibited. Reign of Henry VIII. It is worthy of notice that in this reign, likewise, the interest of money was first fixed by law in England. While this continued an arbitrary matter—that is to say, while the prohibitions of the canon law were in full force, which, as we formerly remarked, condemned all interest as illegal and contrary to the express command of Scripture—its exaction, being kept secret, was beyond measure exorbitant. Twenty and thirty per cent were, in the fourteenth century, accounted a moderate rate of usance. Henry VIII., by a statute passed in the year 1546, for the punishment of usury, limited the legal interest to ten per cent, at which rate it continued till after the reign of Queen Elizabeth.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 18, p. 274.

2959. INTERPRETATION unrestricted. Mythology. As the traditions of pagan mythology were variously related, the sacred interpreters were at liberty to select the most convenient circumstances; and as they translated an arbitrary cipher, they could extract from any fable any sense which was adapted to their favorite system of religion and philosophy. The lascivious form of a naked Venus was tortured into the discovery of some moral precept or some physical truth; and the castration of Atys explained the revolution of the sun between the tropics, or the separation of the human soul from vice and error. [Time of Julian.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 23, p. 415.

2960. INTERVIEW, Formal. Grant—McMahon. [A French inquirer asked General Grant, when in Paris,] "How did you find our President?" "We were unable to comprehend each other." "How was that?" I said, with astonishment. "Simple enough; I didn't understand a word of French; the marshal doesn't know a word of English. He bowed to me; I bowed to him. He extended his hand to me; I extended mine to him. Then all was over."—TRAVELS OF GENERAL GRANT, p. 88.

2961. INTIMIDATION successful. Captain John Smith. Smith's first and chief care was to make a proper impression upon the minds of the savages. . . . He ordered the two cannon which he had promised to give to [King] Powhatan to be brought out and loaded to the muzzle with stones. Then, under the pretence of teaching the Indians gunnery, he had the pieces discharged among the tree-tops, which were bristling with icicles. There was a terrible crash, and the savages, cowering with fear and amazement, could not be induced to touch the fearful engines.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 9, p. 101.

2963. INTOLERANCE, Protestant. To Romanists. [In 1698 was passed] the "Act for the further preventing the growth of Popery;" it recites that there has been a greater resort into this kingdom than formerly of popish priests, bishops, and Jesuits. Any person apprehending and prosecuting to conviction any bishop, priest, or Jesuit, for saying mass or exercising any priestly function, is to receive a reward of £100. The punishment of such convicted persons, or for a papist keeping a school, is to be perpetual imprisonment. Every person educated in the popish religion upon attaining the age of eighteen, to take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, and subscribe the declaration against transubstantiation and the worship of saints, and in default of such oath and subscription is declared incapable of purchasing lands, or of inheriting lands under any devise or limitation, the next of kin being a Protestant, to enjoy such devised lands during life.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 15, p. 235.

2964. INTOLERANCE, Religious. Tender Consciences. [In 1670 Parker, afterward Bishop of Oxford, was intolerant toward Nonconformists, and proclaimed] tender consciences, instead of being complied with, must be restrained with more peremptory and unyielding rigor than naked and unsanctified villainy.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 19, p. 311.

2965. INTOXICATION, Responsibility for. Murder. [Belisarius, the great Roman general, was distinguished by his firmness and severity.] Two of the Huns, who in a drunken quarrel had slain one of their fellow-soldiers, were instantly shown to the army suspended on a lofty gibbet. The national dignity was resented by their countrymen, who disclaimed the servile laws of the empire, and asserted the free privilege of Scythia, where a small fine was allowed to expiate the hasty sallies of intemperance and anger. Their complaints were specious, their clamors were loud, and the Romans were not averse to the example of disorder and impunity. But the rising sedition was appeased by the authority and eloquence of the general; and he represented to the assembled troops the obligation of justice, the importance of discipline, the rewards of piety and virtue, and the unpardonable guilt of murder, which, in his apprehension, was aggravated rather than excused by the vice of intoxication.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 121.

2966. INTRIGUE, Genius for. Caron de Beaumarchais. A.D. 1774. "Is there," said he through De Sartines, the head of the police [to Louis XVI., twenty years of age, and absolute monarch of France], "anything which the king wishes to know alone and at once—anything which he wishes done quickly and secretly, here am I, who have at his service a head, a heart, arms, and no tongue."—BANCROFT'S U.S., vol. 7, ch. 1.

2967. INTRIGUER, Successful. Sunderland. [Secretary of State under Charles II.] Like many other accomplished flatterers and negotiators, he was far more skilful in the art of reading the characters and practising on the weaknesses of individuals than in the art of discerning the feelings of great masses and of foreseeing the approach of great revolutions. He was adroit in intrigue; and it was difficult even for shrewd and experienced men, who had been amply forewarned of his perfidy, to withstand the fascination of his manner, and to refuse credit to his professions of attachment; but he was so intent on observing and courting particular persons, that he forgot to study the temper of the nation. He therefore miscalculated grossly with respect to all the most momentous events of his time. Every important movement and rebound of the public mind took him by surprise; and the world, unable to understand how so clever a man could be blind to what was clearly discerned by the politicians of the coffee-houses, sometimes attributed to deep design what were, in truth, mere blunders.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 231.

2968. INVENTION by Accident. Spinning-jenny. In 1767 James Hargreaves completed his

"spinning-jenny." The spinster's machine in Hargreaves' cottage being accidentally overturned, it was observed that the wheel and the spindle continued to revolve. In the position of the wheel on its side the spindle became perpendicular. The ingenious man caught the idea, and forthwith constructed a multiplying wheel, with eight rovings and eight upright spindles. His jealous neighbors broke into his house, destroyed his invention, and compelled him to fly for his life to Nottingham. [He took out a patent, but his invention soon became common property.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 3, p. 46.

2969. ———. Chauncey Jerome. He began, ere long, to send consignments of wooden clocks to the Southern cities, and this it was that led to the discarding of wood for the works of Yankee clocks. On the voyage the wood would swell sometimes, and spoil them. One night, when Jerome was depressed from a temporary lull in the business, and much troubled with this new difficulty, the idea darted into his mind that possibly a clock could be made of brass as cheaply as of wood. He sprang out of bed and fell to ciphering. He found it could be done. He did it.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 213.

2970. INVENTION, Aid of. Julius Cæsar. The Veneti had collected every ship that they or their allies possessed to defend themselves. They had two hundred and twenty sail in all—a force, considering its character, extremely formidable. Their vessels were too strong to be run down. The galleys carried turrets; but the bows and sterns of the Veneti were still too lofty to be reached effectively by the Roman javelins. The Romans had the advantage in speed; but that was all. They too, however, had their ingenuities. They had studied the construction of the Breton ships. They had provided sickles with long handles, with which they proposed to catch the halyards which held the weight of the heavy leather sails. It was not difficult to do, if, as is probable, the halyards were made fast, not to the mast, but to the gunwale. Sweeping rapidly alongside they could easily cut them; the sails would fall, and the vessels would be unmanageable.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 15.

2971. INVENTION appreciated. Power-loom. [Dr. Edmund Cartwright, a clergyman, invented the power-loom in 1784; and in 1807 Parliament granted him £10,000] for the good service he had rendered the public by his invention of weaving.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 3, p. 54.

2972. INVENTION, Benefit of. Cannon. In the battle of Angora the main body itself was supported on the flanks and in the rear by the bravest squadrons of the reserve, commanded by the sons and grandsons of Timour. The conqueror of Hindostan ostentatiously showed a line of elephants, the trophies rather than the instruments of victory; the use of the Greek fire was familiar to the Moguls and Ottomans; but had they borrowed from Europe the recent invention of gunpowder and cannon, the artificial thunder, in the hands of either nation, must have turned the fortune of the day.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65, p. 265.

2973. INVENTION, Comfort by. Earthen-ware. [In 1763 Josiah Wedgwood, a mechanic, discovered a process of manufacturing a cheap and excellent earthenware, which removed] the pewter dishes from the dingy rows in the tradesman's kitchen, and superseded the wooden platter and the brown dish of the poor man's cottage.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 3, p. 57.

2974. INVENTION, Crisis of. Elias Howe. One day, in 1844, the thought flashed upon him, Is it necessary that a machine should imitate the performance of the hand? May there not be another stitch? This was the crisis of the invention. The idea of using two threads, and forming a stitch by the aid of a shuttle and a curved needle, with the eye near the point, soon occurred to him, and he felt that he had invented a sewing-machine. It was in the month of October, 1844, that he was able to convince himself, by a rough model of wood and wire, that such a machine as he had projected would sew.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 680.

2975. INVENTION, Discouragement in. James Watt. I have now brought the engine near a conclusion, yet I am not an idea nearer that rest I wish for than I was four years ago. However, I am resolved to do all I can to carry on this business, and if it does not thrive with me I will lay aside the burden I cannot carry. Of all things in life there is nothing more foolish than inventing.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 30.

2976. INVENTION, Failure of. George Washington. We find in his diary many such entries as these: "Spent the greater part of the day in making a new plough of my own invention." "Peter (my smith) and I, after several efforts to make a plough after a new model, partly of my own contriving, were fain to give it over, at least for the present."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 12.

2977. INVENTION, Genius for. Abraham Lincoln. It is an attempt to make it an easy matter to transport vessels over shoals and snags and sawyers. The main idea is that of an apparatus resembling a noiseless bellows, placed on each side of the hull of the craft, just below the water-line, and worked by an odd but not complicated system of ropes, valves, and pulleys. When the keel of the vessel grates . . . these bellows are to be filled with air; and thus buoyed up, the ship is expected to float. . . . The model is [at the Patent Office] about eighteen or twenty inches long, . . . whittled with a knife out of a shingle and a cigar-box.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 1, p. 42.

2978. — — — Chinese. The Chinese have had a manufacture of glass for two thousand years; they have made paper of the bamboo from time immemorial; and they invented the art of printing in the time of Julius Cæsar. The use of gunpowder they have possessed beyond all memory, but they employed it only in ornamental fireworks. They have been great observers of the heavens, and proficient in astronomy, from time immemorial. They were acquainted with the compass, but only as a matter of curiosity, not applying it to navigation.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 24, p. 340.

2979. — — — James Watt. A Masons' lodge in Glasgow desired to have an organ, and he was asked to build it. He was totally destitute of a musical ear, and could not distinguish one note from another. But he accepted the offer. He studied the philosophical theory of music, and found that science would be a substitute for his want of an ear.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 14.

2980. INVENTION, Great. Spinning Machine. [Richard Arkwright, born in Preston, England, a barber by trade, invented the spinning-machine in 1768.] Ten years after the date of his first patent his enterprise was regarded by many as a doubtful novelty. [His right to his inventions was contested, and his monopoly invaded on every side.] In October, 1779, a mill which he had erected in the neighborhood of Chorley was burned by a mob, who in a similar manner destroyed the cotton-spinning machines at Manchester, Wigan, Blackburn, Bolton, and Preston.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 3, p. 49.

2981. INVENTION, Growth of. Samuel F. B. Morse. There is no instance on record, I believe, of a great invention completed by . . . one man. Usually an invention of first-rate importance is originated in one age, and brought to perfection in another; and we can sometimes trace its progress for thousands of years. Probably so simple a matter as a pair of scissors—one of the oldest of inventions—was the result of the cogitations of many ingenious minds, and has undergone improvements from the days of Pharaoh to those of Rogers & Sons. The most remarkable case of rapid invention with which I am acquainted is that of the sewing-machine, which, in twenty-five years, has been brought to a point not distant from perfection. But, then, thousands of ingenious minds have exerted themselves upon it. In the Patent Office at Washington not less than thirteen hundred devices and improvements have been patented relating to this beautiful contrivance.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 604.

2982. INVENTION, Preservation by. Greek Fire. The invention of the Greek fire did not, like that of gunpowder, produce a total revolution in the art of war. To these liquid combustibles the city and empire of Constantine owed their deliverance; and they were employed in sieges and sea-fights with terrible effect.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53, p. 367.

2983. INVENTION, Saved by. The State. The only hope of salvation for the Greek Empire and the adjacent kingdoms would have been some more powerful weapon, some discovery in the art of war, that should give them a decisive superiority over their Turkish foes. Such a weapon was in their hands; such a discovery had been made in the critical moment of their fate. The chemists of China or Europe had found, by casual or elaborate experiments, that a mixture of saltpetre, sulphur, and charcoal produces, with a spark of fire, a tremendous explosion. It was soon observed that if the expansive force were compressed in a strong tube, a ball of stone or iron might be expelled with irresistible and destructive velocity. The precise era of the invention and application of gunpowder is involved in doubtful traditions and equivocal language; yet we may clearly discern that it was known before the middle of the fourteenth century; and that before the end of the same the use of artillery in battles and sieges, by sea and land, was familiar to the states of Germany, Italy, Spain

France, and England.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65, p. 239.

2984. INVENTION, Useful. Charvancey Jerome. He invented the cheap brass clock, as now made. He it was who invented the ingenious machinery by the use of which those clocks can be manufactured for a tenth of the sum for which they could be produced by hand. He it was who first sent Yankee clocks to foreign countries. He it was who first made these clocks at anything like the present rate of speed or on anything like the present scale. During the fifty years that he has been in the business, he has superintended the manufacture of perhaps ten millions of clocks, and he has brought the machinery for making them to such a point that six men can make the wheels for one thousand clocks in ten hours.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 210.

2985. INVENTION, Useful. Pit-iron. [Dr. John Roebuck, a physician at Birmingham, was the first to smelt iron by pit-coal. He also invented the process for converting cast-iron into malleable iron.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 3, p. 55.

2986. INVENTION in Youth. The "Mule." [Samuel Crompton was sixteen years old when, in 1769, he invented the "mule," which changed the whole course of cotton-spinning.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 3, p. 46.

2987. INVENTIONS, Co-operative. Arkwright — Watt. The patent for the spinning-frame was taken out in 1769, the very year in which James Watt patented his improved steam-engine, which was to keep this spinning-frame in motion.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 711.

2988. INVENTIONS and Politics. Cotton Gin. [One of the subordinate causes of the civil war] was the invention of the cotton gin by . . . Eli Whitney, in 1793, . . . of Massachusetts. . . . The industry of the cotton-growing States was paralyzed by the tediousness of preparing the staple for market. Mr. Whitney undertook to remove the difficulty, and succeeded in inventing a gin which astonished the beholder by the rapidity and excellence of its work. From being profitless, cotton became the most profitable of all the staples. . . . Whitney's gin added a thousand million dollars to the revenues of the Southern States. . . . Just in proportion to the increased profitableness of cotton, slave-labor became important, slaves valuable, and the system of slavery a fixed and deep-rooted institution.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 62, p. 487.

2989. INVENTOR by Accident. Samuel F. B. Morse. During the voyage of the packet ship Sully, from Havre to New York, in October, 1832, a conversation arose one day in the cabin upon electricity and magnetism. Dr. Charles S. Jackson, of Boston, described an experiment recently made in Paris with an electro-magnet, by means of which electricity had been transmitted through a great length of wire, arranged in circles around the walls of a large apartment. The transmission had been instantaneous, and it seemed as though the flight of electricity was too rapid to be measured. Among the group of passengers, no one listened more attentively to Dr. Jackson's recital than a New York artist, named Samuel Finley Breese Morse, who was returning from a three years' residence in Europe, whither he had gone for improvement in his art. "Why," said he, when the doctor had finished, "if that is so, and the presence of electricity could be made visible in any desired part of the circuit, I see no reason why intelligence might not be transmitted instantaneously by electricity." "How convenient it would be," added one of the passengers, "if we could send news in that manner!" "Why can't we?" asked Morse, fascinated by the idea. From that hour the subject occupied his thoughts; and he began forthwith to exercise his Yankee ingenuity in devising the requisite apparatus.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 602.

2990. INVENTOR, Trials of the. John Fitch. In all the records of invention there is no story more sad and affecting than his. Poor he was in many senses—poor in purse, poor in appearance, poor in spirit. He was born poor, lived poor, died poor. . . . If there ever was a true inventor, this man was one. He was one of those eager souls who would, literally, coin their own flesh to carry their point. He only uttered the obvious truth when he said, one day, in a crisis of his invention, that if he could get £100 by cutting off one of his legs, he would gladly give it to the knife. . . . In 1790 he had the first steam-boat ever constructed that answered the purpose of one.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 147.

2991. INVENTOR wronged. Eli Whitney. [The cotton gin added a thousand million dollars to the revenue of the Southern States.—RIDPATH.] How much did the inventor gain by it? Not one dollar! Associating himself with a man of capital, he went to Connecticut to set up a manufactory of cotton gins. But the simplicity of the machine was such that any good mechanic who saw it could make one; and long before Whitney was ready to supply machines of his own making there were great numbers in operation all over the cotton States. His patent proved to be no protection to him. If he brought a suit for its infringement, no Southern jury would give him a verdict. He struggled on against adverse influences for fifteen years. In 1808, when his patent expired, he gave up the contest, and withdrew from the business a poorer man than he was on the day when he went, with his handful of cotton-pods, into Mrs. Greene's basement. [See Nos. 3113, 3115.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 161.

2992. — — —. John Kay. [John Kay is supposed to have invented the first spinning-machine, about 1760, in Yorkshire, England. He invented the "fly-shuttle," by which a weaver could weave twice as fast as before.] He was mobbed out of the country, and died in a foreign land.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 3, p. 44.

2993. INVENTORS remunerated. Slowly. It was ten years before Boulton and Watt derived any profit from the discovery [of the steam-engine made by the latter. They had to struggle against common prejudice].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 3.

2994. INVESTIGATION opposed. Financial. [During the reign of Charles II.] Pepys records that in the lord treasurer's accounts there was a sum unaccounted for of over two millions; and that it was thought that over £400,000 of the money voted for the war had gone into the privy purse. He then says that a notion of a commission to inspect the accounts "makes the king and court mad, the king having given order to my lord chamberlain to send to the playhouses and brothels, to bid all the Parliament men that were there to go to the Parliament presently." The times were altered since they were to be sought for in churches and conventicles. — KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 15, p. 224.

2995. INVESTIGATION resented. Lord Clarendon. [Reign of Charles II.] The government engaged with the United Provinces. The House of Commons readily voted sums unexampled in our history—sums exceeding those which had supported the armies and fleets of Cromwell at the time when his power was the terror of all the world. But such was the extravagance, dishonesty, and incapacity of those who had succeeded to his authority, that this liberality proved worse than useless. The sycophants of the court, ill-qualified to contend against the great men who then directed the arms of Holland—against such a statesman as De Witt, and such a commander as De Ruyter—made fortunes rapidly, while the sailors mutinied from very hunger, while the dockyards were unguarded, while the ships were leaky and without rigging. It was at length determined to abandon all schemes of offensive war; and it soon appeared that even a defensive war was a task too hard for that administration. . . . But when the Commons began to inquire in what manner the money voted for the war had been wasted, and to examine into the maladministration of the navy, he flamed with indignation. Such inquiry, according to him, was out of their province. — MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 179.

2996. INVESTIGATION, Startling. Credit Mobilier. The Credit Mobilier of America was a joint-stock company, organized in 1863 for the purpose of facilitating the construction of public works. In 1867 another company which had undertaken to build the Pacific Railroad purchased the charter of the Credit Mobilier, and the capital was increased to $3,750,000. [It was very profitable; . . . the stock rose rapidly in value.] In 1872 a lawsuit in Pennsylvania developed the startling fact that much of the stock . . . was owned by members of Congress. A suspicion that those members had voted corruptly on the legislation affecting the Pacific Railroad at once seized the public mind, and led to a congressional investigation, in the course of which many scandalous transactions were brought to light. — RUPPAT'S U. S., ch. 68, p. 560.

2997. INVESTMENT, Timely. New York, A.D. 1626. Hitherto the Dutch had no title to ownership of the land. [Peter] Minuit [the leader of the Dutch colonists] succeeded at once in purchasing the island of Manhattan from its native proprietors. The price paid was 60 guilders—about $25—for more than twenty thousand acres. — BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

2998. IRON, Importance of. England. What mighty efforts of invention and energy between England depending upon foreign countries for iron, and England supplying the whole world with iron! England without iron to hold together "its wooden walls," and England building iron ships—using iron as the great material of the grandest as well as the humblest purposes of constructive art—covering the whole island with iron roads for vehicles drawn by iron engines, connecting opposite hills by iron viaducts, and carrying iron bridges over the narrowest river and the broadest estuary—the England of every tool and every machine produced from iron, and the England with scarcely iron enough to make its ploughshares. — KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 1, p. 11.

3000. ISOLATION, Safety by. German States. [In their early history] the most formidable States of Germany affected to encompass their territories with a wide frontier of solitude and devastation. The awful distance preserved by their neighbors attested the terror of their arms, and in some measure defended them from the danger of unexpected incursions. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 275.

3001. ITINERACY, Ministerial. Methodist. [The first Methodist preachers in America changed their circuits every six months.] In 1804 the General Conference limited the period of pastoral service to two successive years to the same charge; hitherto there had been no restriction, and some had been three years in one appointment. In 1864 the limitation was extended to three years. — STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 4, p. 179.

3002. JEALOUSY, Appeal to. Voltaire's. [He was invited to reside at Frederick's court. His avarice occasioned hesitation.] Frederick, with great dexterity, affected indifference, and seemed inclined to transfer his idolatry to Baculard d'Arnaud. His Majesty even wrote some bad verses, of which the sense was, that Voltaire was a setting sun, and that Arnaud was rising. Good-natured friends soon carried the lines to Voltaire. He was in his bed. He jumped out in his shirt, danced about the room with rage, and sent for his passport and his post-horses [and went to Prussia]. — MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 62.

3003. JEALOUSY, Cruelty of. Commodus. One evening, as the emperor was returning to the palace through a dark and narrow portico in the amphitheatre, an assassin, who waited his passage, rushed upon him with a drawn sword, loudly exclaiming, "The Senate sends you this." The menace prevented the deed; the assassin was seized by the guards, and immediately revealed the authors of the conspiracy. It had been formed, not in the State, but within the walls of the palace. Lucilla, the emperor's sister, and widow of Lucius Verus, impatient of the second rank, and jealous of the reigning empress, had armed the murderer against her brother's life. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4, p. 104.

3004. JEALOUSY, Extensive. Fatal. Abdallah was the most beautiful and modest of the Arabian youth ; and in the first night, when he consummated his marriage with Anima, of the noble race of the Zahrites, two hundred virgins are said to have expired of jealousy and despair.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 100.

3005. JEALOUSY, National. English. [In 1780 the people of England were generally united with the government in the prosecution of the war against the American colonies. France had come to their aid, and prejudice in England was very strong against that country.] Hartley writes to Franklin : " I verily believe, so great is the jealousy between England and France, that this country would fight for a straw to the last man and the last shilling rather than be dictated to by France."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 28, p. 428.

3006. JESTING, Danger of. Demoralizing. Thespis began to change the form of tragedy, and the novelty of the thing attracted many spectators ; for this was before any prize was proposed for those that excelled in this respect. Solon, who was always willing to hear and to learn, and in his old age more inclined to anything that might divert and entertain, particularly to music and good-fellowship, went to see Thespis himself exhibit, as the custom of the ancient poets was. When the play was done, he called to Thespis, and asked him if he was not ashamed to tell so many lies before so great an assembly. Thespis answered it was no great matter, if he spoke or acted so in jest. To which Solon replied, striking the ground violently with his staff, " If we encourage such jesting as this, we shall quickly find it in our contracts and agreements."—PLUTARCH'S OLON.

3007. JESUITS abolished. Eighteenth Century. Books were written without number to expose their artifice and ambition. Their frauds, their vices, and even atrocious crimes were loudly proclaimed ; and it was urged, with great reason, that the doctrines which they taught and the maxims they inculcated were equally pernicious to religion, to civil government, and to all the interests of society. The sovereigns of the different Catholic kingdoms, by degrees, began to perceive that their power and even personal security was in danger, and the Jesuits were successively expelled from France, from Spain, from Portugal, and from Sicily ; and such at length was the influence of the house of Bourbon with the Holy See, that the order was entirely suppressed and abolished in 1773.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 19, p. 285.

3008. JESUITS, Achievements by. Distinguished. Before the order had existed a hundred years, it had filled the whole world with memorials of great things done and suffered for the faith. No religious community could produce a list of men so variously distinguished ; none had extended its operations over so vast a space ; yet in none had there ever been such perfect unity of feeling and action. There was no region of the globe, no walk of speculative or of active life, in which Jesuits were not to be found. They guided the counsels of kings. They deciphered Latin inscriptions. They observed the motions of Jupiter's satellites. They published whole libraries, controversy, casuistry, history, treatises on optics, Alcaic odes, editions of the fathers, madrigals, catechisms, and lampoons.

The liberal education of youth passed almost entirely into their hands, and was conducted by them with conspicuous ability. They appear to have discovered the precise point to which intellectual culture can be carried without risk of intellectual emancipation.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 50.

3009. JESUITS, Assassination by. Henry IV. A daring attempt [was] made upon his life by a young Jesuit named Chastel, who wounded him in the mouth with a dagger as he re-entered Paris from Amiens. This crime was imputed, with or without reason, to the instigation of the King of Spain ; it furnished ground for an exemplary chastisement of the order of the Jesuits, who were sentenced to banishment from the kingdom within fifteen days by a decree of the Parliament of Paris. [He was killed by a monk.]—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 18, § 7.

3010. ———. William of Orange. William, Prince of Orange, had fallen beneath the blow of an assassin, hired, it is more than suspected, by the King of Spain, and directed by the Jesuits.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 17, § 7.

3011. JESUITS estranged. Reign of James II. Louis XIV. was now their chief support. His conscience had, from boyhood, been in their keeping ; and he had learned from them to abhor Jansenism quite as much as he abhorred Protestantism, and very much more than he abhorred atheism. Innocent XI., on the other hand, leaned to the Jansenist opinions. The consequence was, that the society found itself in a situation never contemplated by its founder. The Jesuits were estranged from the supreme pontiff, and they were closely allied with a prince who proclaimed himself the champion of the Gallican liberties and the enemy of Ultramontane pretensions.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 57.

3012. JESUITS, Mission of. Cosmopolitan. They glided from one Protestant country to another under innumerable disguises, as gay cavaliers, as simple rustics, as Puritan preachers. They wandered to countries which neither mercantile avidity nor liberal curiosity had ever impelled any stranger to explore. They were to be found in the garb of Mandarins, superintending the observatory at Peking. They were to be found, spade in hand, teaching the rudiments of agriculture to the savages of Paraguay. Yet, whatever might be their residence, whatever might be their employment, their spirit was the same—entire devotion to the common cause, implicit obedience to the central authority.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 51.

3013. JESUITS, Plotting of. Gunpowder Plot. [When Guido Fawkes was examined after his arrest, the king asked,] " Why would you have killed me ? " " Because you are excommunicated by the pope," was the reply. " How so ? " said James. " Every Maundy Thursday the pope doth excommunicate all heretics who are not of the Church of Rome," is the explanation. [Various bodies of Roman Catholics were moving on that perilous 5th of November to Dunchurch, which was the place of rendezvous, by arrangement.] They were all followers of the Jesuits. There were none of the conspirators who belonged to the more loyal body of Catholies, who were guided by the secular priesthood.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 21, p. 326.

3014. JESUITS, Popularity of. Eighteenth Century. It was not strange that people of all ranks, and especially people of the highest ranks, crowded to the confessionals in the Jesuit temples, for from those confessionals none went discontented away. There the priest was all things to all men. He showed just so much rigor as might not drive those who knelt at his spiritual tribunal to the Dominican or the Franciscan Church. If he had to deal with a mind truly devout, he spoke in the saintly tone of the primitive fathers; but with that very large part of mankind who have religion enough to make them uneasy when they do wrong, and not religion enough to keep them from doing wrong, he followed a very different system. Since he could not reclaim them from guilt, it was his business to save them from remorse. He had at his command an immense dispensary of anodynes for wounded consciences.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 52.

3015. JESUITS, Power of. Eighteenth Century. Strangely were good and evil intermixed in the character of these celebrated brethren; and the intermixture was the secret of their gigantic power. That power could never have belonged to mere hypocrites. It could never have belonged to rigid moralists. It was to be attained only by men sincerely enthusiastic in the pursuit of a great end, and at the same time unscrupulous as to the choice of means.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 53.

3016. JESUITS, Purpose of. Eighteenth Century. The Jesuits, therefore, to the three vows of poverty, chastity, and monastic obedience added a fourth, which was implicit devotion to the pope. The manifest utility of this institution to the support of the holy see procured them from Pope Paul III. an apostolic bull, granting them the most ample privileges. It was soon perceived that, if confined to their cloisters, their utility would be too much circumscribed. They were allowed to mingle in the world, and to take a share in all the active concerns of public life, which it was their duty to influence and direct assiduously toward the great end of establishing the power and authority of the popedom; and this end, it must be owned, they most zealously promoted. Under the command of a superior, or general of the order, whose instructions they were bound to receive with implicit submission, they dispersed themselves over the greatest part of the globe. By the most insinuating arts they courted the favor and wrought themselves into the confidence of statesmen, of civil and ecclesiastical governors, and of sovereign princes; and operating on all to the same purpose, and regularly communicating their intelligence to their head, from whom they received their instructions, the whole Catholic world was in a manner directed by one great and pervading system of policy, which centred in the establishment of the pope's supreme temporal and spiritual jurisdiction.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 19, p. 285.

3017. JESUITS, Rescued by. Papacy. In the sixteenth century the pontificate, exposed to new dangers more formidable than had ever before threatened it, was saved by a new religious order, which was animated by intense enthusiasm and organized with exquisite skill. When the Jesuits came to the rescue of the papacy, they found it in extreme peril; but from that moment the tide of battle turned. Protestantism, which had, during a whole generation, carried all before it, was stopped in its progress, and rapidly beaten back from the foot of the Alps to the shores of the Baltic.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 50.

3018. JESUITS, Self-sacrifice of. Benevolence. When in our time a new and terrible pestilence passed round the globe; when in some great cities fear had dissolved all the ties which hold society together; when the secular clergy had deserted their flocks; when medical succor was not to be purchased by gold; when the strongest natural affections had yielded to the love of life, even then the Jesuit was found by the pallet which bishop and curate, physician and nurse, father and mother, had deserted, bending over infected lips to catch the faint accents of confession, and holding up to the last, before the expiring penitent, the image of the expiring Redeemer.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 51.

3019. JESUITS vs. the State. In England. [The Jesuits invaded England in 1580, for the purpose of restoring it to the Roman faith. It was a principle with them that the pope had a right to deprive kings of their crowns, which could not be doubted. They were severely punished when they obstinately maintained the pope's bull depriving the queen of the crown.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 12, p. 180.

3020. JESUITS suppressed. By Government. They had been expelled from Portugal, in 1759, with many odious circumstances of severity. In 1764 their society was suppressed in France, and their property confiscated. In 1767 the members of the order were driven out of Spain. On the 31st of July, 1773, the society was abolished by Pope Clement XIV. [Their functions, houses, and institutions were abolished.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 21, p. 327.

3021. JESUITS, Vices of. Insincerity. It was alleged, and not without foundation, that the ardent public spirit which made the Jesuit regardless of his ease, of his liberty, and of his life made him also regardless of truth and of mercy; that no means which could promote the interest of his religion seemed to him unlawful, and that by the interest of his religion he too often meant the interest of his society. It was alleged that, in the most atrocious plots recorded in history, his agency could be distinctly traced; that, constant only in attachment to the fraternity to which he belonged, he was in some countries the most dangerous enemy of freedom, and in others the most dangerous enemy of order.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 52.

3022. JESUITS, Victories of. Fictitious. The mighty victories which he [the Jesuit] boasted that he had achieved in the cause of the Church were, in the judgment of many illustrious members of that Church, rather apparent than real. He had, indeed, labored with a wonderful show of success to reduce the world under her laws, but he had done so by relaxing her laws to suit the temper of the world. Instead of toiling to elevate human nature to the noble standard fixed by divine precept and example, he had lowered the standard till it was beneath the average level of human nature. He gloried in multitudes of converts who had been baptized in the remote regions of the East; but it was reported that from some of these converts the facts on which the whole theology of the Gospel depends had been cunningly concealed, and that others were permitted to avoid persecution by bowing down before the images of false gods, while internally repeating Paters and Aves.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 53.

3023. JEWELRY, Passion for. Henry VII. [It is said] his desire for the acquirement of jewels scarcely knew any bounds; and on them alone he spent £110,000. It appears . . . that this investment of money in jewels was a part of the habitual prudence of the king.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 236.

3024. JOKE accepted. Lacedæmonians. [At the public tables, where all the people ate in common,] they were allowed to jest without scurrility, and were not to take it ill when the raillery was returned. For it was reckoned worthy of a Lacedæmonian to bear a jest; but if any one's patience failed, he had only to desire them to be quiet, and they left off immediately.—PLUTARCH'S LIVES.

3025. JOKES, Practical. Frederick the Great. He had one taste which may be pardoned in a boy, but which, when habitually and deliberately indulged in by a man of mature age and strong understanding, is almost invariably the sign of a bad heart—a taste for severe practical jokes. If a friend of the king was fond of dress, oil was flung over his richest suit. If he was fond of money, some prank was invented to make him disburse more than he could spare. If he was hypochondriacal, he was made to believe he had the dropsy. If he particularly set his heart on visiting a place, a letter was forged to frighten him from going thither.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 57.

3026. JOURNEY, Bridal. Thomas Jefferson. At sunset they reached the seat of one of their neighbors, which was eight miles from Monticello—the road to which was a rough mountain track, upon which the snow lay to the depth of two feet. Late at night, exhausted with their long journey, and penetrated with the cold, they reached the house, to find the fires all out, and the servants all gone to their own cabins for the night. Not a light was burning; not a spark of fire was left; not a morsel of food could be found; and not a creature was in the house. This was a sorry welcome to a bride and bridegroom; but they were young and merry, and made a jest of it.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 121.

3027. JOURNEY, Tireless. Tenth Century. A matron of Peloponnesus, who had cherished the infant fortunes of Basil the Macedonian, was excited by tenderness or vanity to visit the greatness of her adopted son. In a journey of five hundred miles from Patras to Constantinople, her age or indolence declined the fatigue of a horse or carriage; the soft litter or bed of Danielis was transported on the shoulders of ten robust slaves; and as they were relieved at easy distances, a band of three hundred were selected for the performance of this service. She was entertained in the Byzantine palace with filial reverence, and the honors of a queen.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53, p. 352.

3028. JOY of Discovery. Galileo. He invented the thermometer and improved the compass. Hearing one day, by chance, that some one in Holland had invented a contrivance by which distant objects could be seen as though they were near, he entered upon a course of experiments which, in a few days, resulted in the construction of a telescope. At once he began to use the new instrument in the study of the heavens. To his boundless wonder and delight, he discovered that the moon, like the earth, had her mountains and her valleys; that the planet Jupiter went his round accompanied by four moons; that the Milky Way was composed of innumerable stars; and that there were spots upon the sun.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 262.

3029. JOY, Fatal. Explorers. Dias had stationed a small store-ship in one of the bays on the coast of Guinea, which he left in charge of a purser and a small crew. During his long absence disease had reduced the number of this little band, until none remained but the purser and two or three sick, despairing sailors. When at last the purser saw in the distance the well-known vessel of his commander, such was the shock of his joy that he fell dead upon the deck of his vessel.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 286.

3030. JOY intoxicating. Wellington. [When Wellington was pursuing the routed French from Waterloo, he rode with the advanced guard.] Colonel Hervey, who was with him, advised him to desist, as the country was growing less open, and he might be fired at by some stragglers from behind the hedges. "Let them fire away," he replied; "the battle is won, and my life is of no value now."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 2, p. 36.

3031. JOY, Public. Reign of James II. [Acquittal of the seven bishops who refused to join the king in overthrowing the Protestant faith.] The jury appeared in their box, and there was a breathless stillness. Sir Samuel Astley spoke. "Do you find the defendants, or any of them, guilty of the misdemeanor whereof they are impeached, or not guilty?" Sir Roger Langley answered, "Not guilty." As the words passed his lips, Halifax sprang up and waved his hat. At that signal benches and galleries raised a shout. In a moment ten thousand persons, who crowded the great hall, replied with a still louder shout, which made the old oaken roof crack; and in another moment the innumerable throng without set up a third huzza, which was heard at Temple Bar. The boats which covered the Thames gave an answering cheer. A peal of gunpowder was heard on the water, and another, and another; and so, in a few moments, the glad tidings went flying past the Savoy and the Friars to London Bridge, and to the forest of masts below. As the news spread, streets and squares, market-places and coffee-houses, broke forth into acclamations. Yet were the acclamations less strange than the weeping; for the feelings of men had been wound up to such a point, that at length the stern English nature, so little used to outward signs of emotion, gave way, and thousands sobbed aloud for very joy.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 355.

3032. JUBILEE, National. British. [The 25th of October, 1809,] was celebrated throughout the kingdom [of Great Britain] as "the Jubilee"—the fiftieth anniversary of the accession to the throne of George III.—KNIGHT'S Eng., vol. 7, ch. 20, p. 526.

3033. JUDGE, Dishonorable. Reign of James II. It was, indeed, necessary to go very low down in the legal profession before men could be found willing to render such services as were now required. The new chief justice, Sir Robert Wright, was ignorant to a proverb; yet ignorance was not his worst fault. His vices had ruined him. He had resorted to infamous ways of raising money, and had, on one occasion, made a false affidavit in order to obtain possession of £500. Poor, dissolute, and shameless, he had become one of the parasites of Jeffreys, who promoted him and insulted him. Such was the man who was now selected by James to be lord chief justice of England.—MACAULAY'S Eng., ch. 8, p. 253.

3034. JUDGES despised. Athenians. Anacharsis having seen an assembly of the people at Athens, said he was surprised at this, that in Greece wise men pleaded causes, and fools determined them.—PLUTARCH.

3035. JUDGES, Impartial. Early Greeks. They were chosen from among the wisest and most respectable of the citizens, and in the latter times consisted principally of such as had enjoyed the dignity of archons or chief magistrates. They held their meetings in the open air, upon an eminence in the middle of the city, and determined all causes during the night; for these two reasons, as Athenæus informs us, that neither the number nor the faces of the judges being known, there might be no attempts to corrupt them; and that, as they neither saw the plaintiff nor defendant, their decisions might be quite impartial.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 6, p. 55.

3036. JUDGES, Justice by. Ancient Persians. The sovereign, in certain causes of importance, sat himself in judgment; though in the ordinary administration of justice there were a certain number of judges chosen, on account of their acknowledged wisdom and probity, who made regular circuits through the provinces, and attended the sovereign in his stated visitations of his dominions. These held their offices for life, but were removable in cases of malversation. The story is well known of the judge who, being guilty of corruption in his high function, was by Cambyes condemned to be flayed alive, and his skin hung over the seat of judgment.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11, p. 121.

3037. JUDGES, Partisan. Reign of James II. Vast numbers of those unhappy prisoners who were taken after the defeat of Monmouth were hanged without any form of trial; and the execrable Judge Jeffreys filled the kingdom with daily executions under the sanction of justice. Many of these trials were attended with the most iniquitous procedure; but all applications to the king for pardon were checked by a declaration that he had promised to forgive none who should be legally condemned. "When the bench is under the direction of the cabinet, trials are conspiracies, and executions are murders."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 30, p. 425.

3038. JUDGES, Reputable. Athenian. The judges of the Areopagus were chosen from among the most respectable of the citizens, and were generally such as had discharged the office of archon. The most scrupulous attention was paid to character in the election of these judges. The slightest imputation of immorality, a single act of indecency, or even of unbecoming levity, was sufficient to disqualify from obtaining a seat in that tribunal, or to forfeit a place after it had been conferred. To be found in a tavern was such a stain on the character of a judge that it was deemed a sufficient reason of exclusion from that office. "Let no Areopagite," says the Athenian laws, "compose a comedy." That judge was justly thought to have prostituted his character who had stooped to employ his talents in furnishing a frivolous amusement for the people.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 10, p. 102.

3039. JUDGMENT, Dishonest. James II. [James wished a justification for appointing Catholics to office contrary to law.] Jones, the chief justice of the Common Pleas, a man who had never before shrunk from any drudgery, however cruel or servile, now held in the royal closet language which might have become the lips of the purest magistrates in our history. He was plainly told that he must give up either his opinion or his place. "For my place," he answered, "I care little. I am old, and worn out in the service of the crown; but I am mortified to find that your Majesty thinks me capable of giving a judgment which none but an ignorant or a dishonest man could give." "I am determined," said the king, "to have twelve judges who will be all of my mind as to this matter." "Your Majesty," answered Jones, "may find twelve judges of your mind, but hardly twelve lawyers." He was dismissed.—MACAULAY'S Eng., ch. 6, p. 76.

3040. JUDGMENT, Duplicity in. Francis North. [Lord Guildford.] He had sense enough to perceive from the first that Oates and Bedloe were impostors; but the Parliament and the country were greatly excited; the government had yielded to the pressure; and North was a man not to risk a good place for the sake of justice and humanity. Accordingly, while he was in secret drawing up a refutation of the whole romance of the Popish Plot, he declared in public that the truth of the story was as plain as the sun in heaven, and was not ashamed to brow-beat, from the seat of judgment, the unfortunate Roman Catholics who were arraigned before him for their lives.—MACAULAY'S Eng., ch. 3, p. 257.

3041. JUDGMENT by Experts. Frederick the Great. It never occurred to him that a body of men whose lives were passed in adjudicating on questions of civil right were more likely to form correct opinions on such questions than a prince whose attention was divided between a thousand objects, and who had probably never read a law-book through. The resistance opposed to him by the tribunals inflamed him to fury. He reviled his chancellor. He kicked the shins of his judges. He did not, it is true, intend to act unjustly. He firmly believed that he was doing right and defending the cause of the poor against the wealthy. Yet this well-meant meddling probably did far more harm than all the explosions of his evil passions during the whole of his long reign.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 51.

3042. JUDGMENT, Mistake of. George III. [George III. informed his secretary, Lord North, immediately after "the Boston tea party," that General Gage was willing to return to Boston and quell the disturbance.] Four regiments sent to Boston will, he thinks, be sufficient to prevent any disturbance.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 22, p. 339.

3043. JUDGMENT, Partiality in. Reign of James II. None of the English nobles enjoyed a larger measure of public favor than Charles Sackville, Earl of Dorset. He was, indeed, a remarkable man. In his youth he had been one of the most notorious libertines of the wild time which followed the Restoration. He had been the terror of the city watch, had passed many nights in the round-house, and had at least once occupied a cell in Newgate. His passion for Betty Morrice and for Nell Gwynn, who always called him her Charles the First, had given no small amusement and scandal to the town. Yet, in the midst of follies and vices, his courageous spirit, his fine understanding, and his natural goodness of heart had been conspicuous. Men said that the excesses in which he indulged were common between him and the whole race of gay young cavaliers, but that his sympathy with human suffering and the generosity with which he made reparation to those whom his freaks had injured were all his own. His associates were astonished by the distinction which the public made between him and them. "He may do what he chooses," said Wilmot; "he is never in the wrong." The judgment of the world became still more favorable to Dorset when he had been sobered by time and marriage. His graceful manners, his brilliant conversation, his soft heart, his open hand, were universally praised. No day passed, it was said, in which some distressed family had not reason to bless his name.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 297.

3044. JUDGMENT, An unfortunate. Louis XVI. Louis XVI. was full of excellent intentions, pure in morals, not deficient in natural good sense, and sincerely anxious for the welfare of his subjects; but he was diffident and timid to a fault, lamentably wanting in strength and energy of character, and, by an unfortunate fatality, always disposed both to be firm and to give way at the wrong moment.—STUDENTS' FRANCE.

3045. JUDGMENT-DAY anticipated. Mahomet. His mortal disease was a fever of fourteen days, which deprived him by intervals of the use of reason. As soon as he was conscious of his danger, he edified his brethren by the humility of his virtue or penitence. "If there be any man," said the apostle from the pulpit, "whom I have unjustly scourged, I submit my own back to the lash of retaliation. Have I aspersed the reputation of a Mussulman? let him proclaim my faults in the face of the congregation. Has any one been despoiled of his goods? the little that I possess shall compensate the principal and the interest of the debt." "Yes," replied a voice from the crowd, "I am entitled to three drachms of silver." Mahomet heard the complaint, satisfied the demand, and thanked his creditor for accusing him in this world rather than at the day of judgment.—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 49.

3046. JUDGMENT-DAY, Fear of. Samuel Johnson. BOSWELL: "But may not a man attain to such a degree of hope as not to be uneasy from the fear of death?" JOHNSON: "A man may have such a degree of hope as to keep him quiet. You see I am not quiet, from the vehemence with which I talk; but I do not despair." MRS. ADAMS: "You seem, sir, to forget the merits of our Redeemer." JOHNSON: "Madam, I do not forget the merits of my Redeemer; but my Redeemer has said that He will set some on His right hand and some on His left." He was in gloomy agitation, and said, "I'll have no more on't."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 524.

3047. JURISPRUDENCE, Origin of. Roman. Romulus, Numa, and Servius Tullius are celebrated as the most ancient legislators; and each of them claims his peculiar part in the threefold division of jurisprudence. The laws of marriage, the education of children, and the authority of parents, which may seem to draw their origin from nature itself, are ascribed to the untutored wisdom of Romulus. The law of nations and of religious worship, which Numa introduced, was derived from his nocturnal converse with the nymph Egeria. The civil law is attributed to the experience of Servius; he balanced the rights and fortunes of the seven classes of citizens, and guarded, by fifty new regulations, the observance of contracts and the punishment of crimes.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 301.

3048. JURY coerced. Reign of James II. [Alice Lisle was accused of high treason for sheltering rebels defeated with the Duke of Monmouth.] The jury retired, and remained long in consultation. The judge grew impatient. [It was Jeffreys.] He could not conceive, he said, how, in so plain a case, they should ever have left the box. He sent a messenger to tell them that, if they did not instantly return, he would adjourn the court and lock them up all night. Thus put to the torture, they came, but came to say that they doubted whether the charge had been made out. Jeffreys expostulated with them vehemently, and after another consultation, they gave a reluctant verdict of guilty. On the following morning sentence was pronounced. Jeffreys gave directions that Alice Lisle should be burned alive that very afternoon. This excess of barbarity moved the pity and indignation even of that class which was most devoted to the crown.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 595.

3049. JURY, A determined. Reign of James II. [Trial of the seven bishops of the Church of England who refused to aid the king in the overthrow of the Protestant faith.] It was absolutely necessary to watch the officers who watched the doors, for those officers were supposed to be in the interest of the crown, and might, if not carefully observed, have furnished a courtly juryman with food, which would have enabled him to starve out the other eleven. Strict guard was therefore kept. Not even a candle to light a pipe was permitted to enter. Some basins of water for washing were suffered to pass at about four in the morning. The jurymen, raging with thirst, soon lapped up the whole. Great numbers of people walked the neighboring streets till dawn. . . . At first nine were for acquitting and three for convicting. Two of the minority soon gave way; but Arnold was obstinate. Thomas Austin, a country gentleman of great estate, who had paid close attention to the evidence and speeches, and had taken full notes, wished to argue the question. Arnold declined. He was not used, he doggedly said, to reasoning and debating. His conscience was not satisfied; and he should not acquit the bishops. "If you come to that," said Austin, "look at me. I am the largest and strongest of the twelve; and before I find such a petition as this a libel, here will I stay till I am no bigger than a tobacco pipe." It was six in the morning before Arnold yielded. [See more at No. 3031.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 353.

3050. JURY imprisoned. For Verdict. [In 1554, on the trial of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, the judges and counsel heaped accusation upon accusation, perplexed him with questions, and urgently exhorted him to confess his guilt. They read over garbled evidence not taken in open court, and required him to answer each separate charge as produced. The talent and energy of Throckmorton produced a surprising result. He was acquitted.] The court immediately after the trial committed the jury to prison. Four made a submission, and were released. Eight remained in confinement for many months; and when brought before the council in the Star Chamber were sentenced to the payment of enormous fines. It was more than a century before the infamous system was discontinued of punishing juries for verdicts in State prosecutions that were not agreeable to the crown.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 4, p. 67.

3051. JURY limited. "Three Days." [During the "Reign of Terror"] a resolution was . . . passed in the Convention authorizing the jury, when three days had been spent in the investigation of a case, to declare themselves satisfied, without waiting for further pleadings; this infamous justification was at once acted upon, and the Girondists were sentenced to death.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 27, § 4.

3052. JURY perverted. By Clergy. In 1683 . . . the sheriffs could pack the jurymen upon State trials; the jurymen would be exhorted from every pulpit to believe, upon authority of the Scriptures, that, as all resistance to authority was a sin, the support of authority in all its desires was a virtue. When a subject stood at the bar, indicted for treason or misdemeanor of the king's command, it was necessary for the country's peace that the crown should have its wished-for verdict.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 23, p. 369.

3053. JURY, Unterrified. Trial of William Penn. A.D. 1670. He was arraigned for having spoken at a Quaker meeting. . . . Amid angry exclamations and menaces, he proceeded to plead earnestly for the fundamental laws of England; and as he was hurried out of court, still reminded the jury that "they were his judges." Dissatisfied with the first verdict returned, the recorder heaped upon the jury every opprobrious epithet.—"We will have a verdict by the help of God, or you shall starve for it." "You are Englishmen," said Penn, who had again been brought to the bar; "mind your privilege, give not away your right." . . . At last the jury, who had received no refreshments for two days and two nights, on the third day gave their verdict, "Not guilty." The recorder fined them forty marks apiece for their independence.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 16.

3054. JUSTICE by Combat. Gaul. The trials by single combat gradually obtained superior credit and authority among a warlike people who could not believe that a brave man deserved to suffer, or that a coward deserved to live. Both in civil and criminal proceedings the plaintiff or accuser, the defendant, or even the witness, were exposed to mortal challenge from the antagonist who was destitute of legal proofs; and it was incumbent on them either to desert their cause or publicly to maintain their honor in the lists of battle. They fought either on foot or horseback, according to the custom of their nation; and the decision of the sword or lance was ratified by the sanction of Heaven, of the judge, and of the people.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 38, p. 596.

3055. JUSTICE, Even. Aristides. He was carrying on a prosecution against his enemy, and after he had brought his charge, the judges were going to pass sentence; without hearing the person accused, he rose up to his assistance, entreating that he might be heard, and have the privilege which the laws allowed.—PLUTARCH'S ARISTIDES.

3056. JUSTICE exceeded. Bajazet. [French princes who had been taken captive by the Ottoman Bajazet I. were the witnesses of his zeal for justice.] In their presence, and at his command, the belly of one of his chamberlains was cut open, on a complaint against him for drinking the goat's milk of a poor woman. The strangers were astonished by this act of justice, but it was the justice of a sultan who disdains to balance the weight of evidence or to measure the degrees of guilt.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 64, p. 241.

3057. — — —. Theophilus. [The Roman emperor.] A poor woman threw herself at the emperor's feet to complain of a powerful neighbor, the brother of the empress, who had raised his palace-wall to such an inconvenient height, that her humble dwelling was excluded from light and air! On the proof of the fact, instead of granting, like an ordinary judge, sufficient or ample damages to the plaintiff, the sovereign adjudged to her use and benefit the palace and the ground. Nor was Theophilus content with this extravagant satisfaction; his zeal converted a civil trespass into a criminal act; and the unfortunate patrician was stripped and scourged in the public place of Constantinople.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 68, p. 593.

3058. — — —. Emperor Julian. [The Emperor Julian was superior] to the last temptation of virtuous minds, an indiscreet and intemperate zeal for justice; he restrained, with calmness and dignity, the warmth of an advocate who prosecuted, for extortion, the president of the Narbonne province. "Who will ever be found guilty," exclaimed the vehement Delphidius, "if it be enough to deny?" "And who," replied Julian, "will ever be innocent, if it be sufficient to affirm?"—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 19, p. 244.

3059. JUSTICE by Force. Sir Francis Drake. [While engaged in the slave-trade, the Spaniards attacked the fleet with which he sailed.] Captain Drake succeeded in rescuing his ship from the foe; but he reached England a ruined man. Although the King of Spain was already meditating the conquest of England, the two nations were still at peace, and Captain Drake therefore applied to the Spanish Government for the restoration of the property unlawfully seized. His demands being disregarded, he swore to take by force what had been denied to his solicitations. Never was an oath better kept. In 1772 he contrived to equip and arm two small vessels, and obtained from the queen a commission such as was requisite for his purpose. Joined by a third vessel in the South American waters, he suddenly descended upon the coasts of New Granada, plundered the settlements, burnt the Spanish shipping, and held the whole region at his mercy. He returned to England laden with a prodigious booty—enough to make him one of the richest private persons in Europe.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 358.

3060. JUSTICE, Governmental. Roman. [Early in the sixth century the Jews were insulted in person, their effects were pillaged, and their synagogues were burnt by the mad populace of Ravenna and Rome, inflamed, as it should seem, by the most frivolous or extravagant pretences. The government which could neglect, would have deserved such an outrage. A legal inquiry was instantly directed; and as the authors of the tumult had escaped in the crowd, the whole community was condemned to repair the damage; and the obstinate bigots, who refused their contributions, were whipped through the streets by the hand of the executioner. This simple act of justice exasperated the discontent of the Catholics, who applauded the merit and patience of these holy confessors.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39, p. 81.

3061. JUSTICE honored. Canute the Great. [Canute, . . . the first Danish king of England, in his letter to] "all the nations of the English," . . . has one passage which may make us believe that power and prosperity are not always corrupting—"And now be it known unto you all that I have dedicated my life to God, to govern my kingdoms with justice, and to observe the right in all things. If in the time that is past, and in the violence and carelessness of my youth, I have violated justice, it is my intention, by the help of God, to make full compensation. Therefore I beg and command those to whom I have intrusted the government, as they wish to preserve my good-will, and save their own souls, to do no injustice either to poor or rich. Let those who are noble, and those who are not, equally obtain their rights, according to the laws, from which no deviation shall be allowed, either from fear of me, or through favor to the powerful, or for the purpose of supplying my treasury. I want no money raised by injustice." [A.D. 1035.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 11, p. 158.

3062. JUSTICE, Impartiality of. Roman. Tarquin was at this time in Etruria, where he prevailed on two of the most powerful cities, Veii and Tarquinii, to espouse his cause. These States sent ambassadors to Rome with a formal requisition that the exiled prince might be allowed to return. . . . This purpose they gained by a liberal employment of bribes and promises. The conspiracy, however, was detected; and it was found that among the chief persons concerned were the two sons of Brutus and the nephews of Collatinus. An example was now exhibited, severely virtuous indeed, but which the necessity of circumstances required and justified. Brutus himself sat in judgment upon his two sons, and condemned them to be beheaded, himself witnessing their execution.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 3, p. 309.

3063. ——. A Turk's. [As Mahmud the Gaznevide] sat in the Divan, an unhappy subject bowed before the throne to accuse the insolence of a Turkish soldier who had driven him from his house and bed. "Suspend your clamors," said Mahmud; "inform me of his next visit, and ourself in person will judge and punish the offender." The sultan followed his guide, invested the house with his guards, and extinguishing the torches, pronounced the death of the criminal, who had been seized in the act of rapine and adultery. After the execution of his sentence the lights were rekindled, Mahmud fell prostrate in prayer, and rising from the ground, demanded some homely fare, which he devoured with the voraciousness of hunger. The poor man, whose injury he had avenged, was unable to suppress his astonishment and curiosity; and the courteous monarch condescended to explain the motives of this singular behavior. "I had reason to suspect that none, except one of my sons, could dare to perpetrate such an outrage; and I extinguished the lights, that my justice might be blind and inexorable. My prayer was a thanksgiving on the discovery of the offender; and so painful was my anxiety, that I had passed three days without food since the first moment of your complaint."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 57, p. 503.

3064. ——. Alexander. It is said that in the first years of his reign, when capital causes were brought before him, he used to stop one of his ears with his hand, while the plaintiff was opening the indictment, that he might reserve it perfectly unprejudiced for hearing the defendant.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

3065. JUSTICE, Mockery of. Papal. [In 1556, when Archbishop Cranmer] came before the commissioners, he was cited to appear at Rome within eighty days, there to answer the charges against him. This was one of the mockeries of the Papal rule in England. There were prison-walls between the archbishop and Rome, and at the end of the time he was declared contumacious.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 6.

3066. JUSTICE for Money. Egyptians. A hundred of the principal Alexandrians came to Italy with a remonstrance [against the appointment of Ptolemy to the Egyptian throne]; and had they brought money with them they might have had a respectful hearing. But they had brought none or not enough, and Ptolemy, secure of his patron's support, hired a party of banditti, who set on the deputation when it landed, and killed the greater part of its members.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 15.

3067. JUSTICE outraged. Jeffreys. The chief-justice was fast accumulating a fortune out of the plunder of a higher class of Whigs. He treated largely in pardons. His most lucrative transaction of this kind was with a gentleman named Edmund Prideaux. . . . It is probable that his only crime was the wealth which he had inherited from his father, an eminent lawyer, who had been in high office under the Protector. No exertions were spared to make out a case [of disloyalty] by the crown. Mercy was offered to some prisoners on condition that they would bear evidence against Prideaux. The unfortunate man lay long in jail, and at length, overcome by fear of the gallows, consented to pay £15,000.-000 for his liberation. This great sum was received by Jeffreys. He bought with it an estate, to which the people gave the name Aeldama, from that accursed field which was purchased with the price of innocent blood.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 604.

3068. ———. Jeffreys. [Trial of rebels under the Duke of Monmouth.] Jeffreys reached Dorchester, the principal town of the county in which Monmouth had landed, and the judicial massacre began. The court was hung, by order of the chief-justice, with scarlet; and this innovation seemed to the multitude to indicate a bloody purpose. It was also rumored that, when the clergyman who preached the assize sermon enforced the duty of mercy, the ferocious mouth of the judge was distorted by an ominous grin. These things made men augur ill of what was to follow.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 596.

3069. JUSTICE, Partiality of. Professed. The mistocles, who was an agreeable companion, gained many friends, and became respectable in the strength of his popularity. Thus when he was told that he would govern the Athenians extremely well, if he would but do it without respect of persons, he said, "May I never sit on a tribunal where my friends shall not find more favor from me than strangers."—PLUTARCH'S ARISTIDES.

3070. JUSTICE, Partiality in. Agésilas. Agésilas, indeed, in other respects was strictly and inflexibly just; but where a man's friends are concerned, he thought a rigid regard to justice a mere pretence. There is still extant a short letter of his to Hydrieus the Carian, which is a proof of what we have said: "If Nicias is innocent, acquit him; if he is not innocent, acquit him on my account; however, be sure to acquit him."—PLUTARCH'S AGESILAS.

3071. JUSTICE, Poetic. Cardinal Wolsey. Under Cromwell the coercion of juries and the management of judges rendered the courts mere mouthpieces of the royal will; and where even the shadow of justice proved an obstacle to bloodshed, Parliament was brought into play to pass bill after bill of attainder. "He shall be judged by the bloody laws he has himself made," was the cry of the council at the moment of his fall, and by a singular retribution the crowning injustice which he sought to introduce even into the practice of attainder—the condemnation of a man without hearing his defence—was only practised on himself.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 577.

3072. JUSTICE, Public. Origin. Among the English, as among all the races of mankind, justice had originally sprung from each man's personal action. There had been a time when every freeman was his own avenger. But even in the earliest forms of English society of which we find traces this right of self-defence was being modified and restricted by a growing sense of public justice. The "blood-wite," or compensation in money for personal wrong, was the first effort of the tribe as a whole to regulate private revenge. The freeman's life and the freeman's limb had each on this system its legal price. "Eye for eye" ran the rough code, and "life for life," or for each fair damages. We see a further step toward the modern recognition of a wrong as done, not to the individual man, but to the people at large, in another custom of early date. The price of life or limb was paid, not by the wrong-doer to the man he wronged, but by the family or house of the wrong-doer to the family or house of the wronged. Order and law were thus made to rest in each little group of people upon the blood-bond which knit its families together.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 12.

3073. JUSTICE, Satisfaction of. Mahomet. [When near his end, Mahomet] made an effort to obtain himself the peace and pardon of the living before presenting himself before his Judge. Sustained beneath the arms by his two cherished disciples, Abubeker and Ali, he trailed himself along to the pulpit of the mosque, and said, with a feeble voice: "Mussulmans! if I have ever maltreated any among you, let him now come and strike me in turn. If I have offended any of you by word, let him return insult for insult. If I have taken from any his property, let him take all that I possess upon the earth. And these are not vain words; let no one, in doing himself justice, apprehend my resentment. Resentment and anger are not in my character." A man dared to step from the crowd and claim of him a concealed debt. "Help thyself," said the prophet; "it is better to blush in this life before men, for one's injustice, than to blush in the other world before God."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 148.

3074. JUSTICE, Systematized. Charlemagne. Still further to harmonize the discordant parts of his empire, Charlemagne divided the provinces into different districts, each of which contained several counties. He abolished the ancient custom of governing them by dukes; and in their place he appointed three or four royal envoys, called Missi Dominici, to govern each province or Missaticum, obliging them to an exact visitation of it every three months. These envoys held four courts in the year for the administration of justice; and the arrangement in which the business of these courts was conducted reflects the highest honor on the character of Charlemagne. The causes of the poor were first heard, next those of the king, then the causes of the clergy, and lastly those of the people at large.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 3, p. 71.

3075. JUSTICE, Tardy. Cromwell. His government was strong. Charles II. followed, and his government was cowardly, contemptible, and weak. Then, at length, tardy justice was done to the memory of Oliver. Everywhere men magnified his valor, genius, and patriotism. Everywhere it was remembered how, when he ruled, all foreign powers had trembled at the name of England; how the States-General, now so haughty, had crouched at his feet; and how, when it was known that he was no more, Amsterdam was lighted up as for a great deliverance, and children ran along the canals shouting for joy that the devil was dead. Even Royalists exclaimed that the State could be saved only by calling the old soldiers of the Commonwealth to arms. Soon the capital begun to feel the miseries of a blockade.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 179.

3076. KIDNAPPING by Government. Reign of James II. [The exiled Bishop Burnet was a powerful antagonist of James in the Roman Catholic controversy.] Proceedings were accordingly instituted against him at Edinburgh; but he had been naturalized in Holland; he had married a woman of fortune who was a native of that province; and it was certain that his adopted country would not deliver him up. It was therefore determined to kidnap him. Ruffians were hired with great sums of money for this perilous and infamous service. An order for £3000 on this account was actually drawn up for signature in the office of the secretary of State.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 225.

3077. KINDNESS, Religion of. Rev. John Newton. Nevertheless there were in him not only force, courage, burning zeal for doing good, but great kindness, and even tenderness of heart. "I see in this world," he said, "two heaps of human happiness and misery; now, if I can take but the smallest bit from one heap and add it to the other, I carry a point; if, as I go home, a child has dropped a half-penny, and by giving it another I can wipe away its tears, I feel I have done something."—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 3.

3078. KING of Fanatics. John Boccold. [The Anabaptists.] They surprised and took possession of the city of Munster, where they preached their doctrines with such effect that the people, inspired with frenzy, expelled their bishop, and declared that they would have no other governor than God Almighty. Matthias, who was their chief prophet, having been killed in a sally from the town upon the troops of the bishop who had laid siege of it, John Boccold, a journeyman tailor, who had been distinguished by the name of Jack of Leyden, caused himself, with great ceremony, to be anointed king, and appointed twelve apostles to proclaim his sovereign authority over all the lower Germany. One of his favorite tenets was polygamy; and he set a most illustrious example himself by marrying fourteen wives. One of his wives having expressed some doubt as to his divine mission, Boccold immediately cut off her head, and the thirteen others danced round her body with transports of joy. Munster being closely besieged, this fanatic defended the city obstinately for twelve months; but he fell at length a victim to the treachery of some of his own followers, and his enemies . . . put him to death with . . . cruelty.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 20, p. 298.

3079. KING, An infant. James. [When Mary abdicated the throne of Scotland, James, her infant son, was borne to the High Church of Stirling; the abdication of his mother was read; Knox preached; the child was crowned; the lords took the oaths of allegiance; and the infant of thirteen months was carried back to his cradle.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 10, p. 152.

3080. ———. Of France and England. Henry V. . . died in the thirty-fourth year of his age, one of the most heroic princes that ever swayed the sceptre of England. The Duke of Bedford, brother of Henry V., was declared regent of France, and Henry VI., a child of nine months old, was proclaimed king at Paris and London.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 13, p. 205.

3081. KING, Odd. George Washington. [In Siam there is a first and second king.] A first king, who does everything, whose power is absolute; and a second king, who does nothing but draw a large income. This second king, oddly enough, is named George Washington, having been so named by his father, who greatly admired Americans.—GENERAL GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 268.

3082. KING, An unkingly. James II. He was of middle stature, more corpulent through his clothes than in his body, yet fat enough; his eye large, ever rolling after any stranger that came in his presence, insomuch as many, for shame, left the room as being out of countenance; his tongue was too large for his mouth, and made him drink very uncomely, as if eating his drink, which came out into his cup at each side of his mouth; his skin was as soft as taffeta sarsenet, which felt so because he never washed his hands, but rubbed his fingers' ends quite slightly with the wet end of a napkin; his legs were very weak, some have thought through some foul play in his youth, and the weakness made him ever leaning on other people's shoulders, and his walk was ever circular.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 37.

3083. KINGS unhappy. William III. He . . . told the Duke of Hamilton "he wished he were a thousand miles from England, and that he had never been king of it." [He was annoyed by the unpatriotic bickerings in Parliament.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 7, p. 99.

3084. KISSING Husbands. Origin of. When Troy was taken, some of the Trojans, having escaped and gained their ships, put to sea, and being driven by the winds upon the coast of Tuscany, came to an anchor in the river Tiber; . . . here their wives being much fatigued, and no longer able to bear the hardships of the sea, one of them, superior to the rest in birth and prudence, named Roma, proposed that they should burn the fleet; . . . this being effected, the men at first were much exasperated, but afterward, through necessity, fixed their seat on the Palatine Hill, and in a short time things succeeded beyond their expectation; for the country was good, and the people hospitable; . . . therefore, beside other honors paid to Roma, they called their city, as she was the cause of its being built, after her name. Hence too, we are informed, the custom arose for the women to salute their relations and husbands with a kiss, because those women, when they had burned the ships, used such kind of endearments to appease the resentment of their husbands.—PLUTARCH'S ROMULUS.

3085. KNEELING to God only. Alexander Murray. [In 1751 Hon. Alexander Murray was accused "of having illegally interfered to obstruct the proceedings on the scrutiny, and to influence] the high bailiff in certain returns of the inhabitants of Westminster. When he was brought to the bar to receive his sentence of close committal to Newgate he refused to kneel, as commanded by the Speaker. The Speaker called out, "Your obeisances! sir, your obeisances!" and then, "Sir, you must kneel." He replied, "Sir, I beg to be excused; I never kneel but to God." The Speaker repeated the command with great warmth. Murray answered, "Sir, I am sorry I cannot comply with your request; I would in anything else." The Speaker cried, "I call upon you again to consider it." Murray answered, "Sir, when I have committed a crime I kneel to God for pardon; but I know my own innocence, and cannot kneel to anybody else." The Speaker ordered the sergeant to take him away and secure him.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 12, p. 186.

3086. KNIGHTHOOD, Ceremony of. Chivalry. The candidate for that honor was previously prepared for it by the most austere fasts. He was obliged to spend a whole night in a church in prayer, to make a solemn and full confession of his sins, to receive the holy eucharist, and to have his body purified by bathing; then he was again introduced into the church, where he presented to the priest a sword, who, giving it his benediction, hung it round the neck of the novice; he again, taking it off, presented it to the knight, or chief, who was to confer the honor upon him; and falling down on his knees, and joining his hands, after solemnly swearing to maintain the cause of religion and chivalry, he received from him the spurs, the halberd, the coat-of-mail, and the sword. Then the chief, embracing him round the neck, and gently striking him three times with the flat part of his sword upon the shoulder, finished the ceremony by pronouncing these words, "In the name of God, St. Michael, and St. George, I make thee a knight. Be valiant, hardy, and loyal."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 10, p. 167.

3087. KNOWLEDGE desired. Samuel Johnson. He observed, "All knowledge is of itself of some value. There is nothing so minute or inconsiderable that I would not rather know it than not. In the same manner, all power, of whatever sort, is of itself desirable. A man would not submit to learn to hem a ruffle of his wife, or his wife's maid; but if a mere wish could attain it, he would rather wish to be able to hem a ruffle."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 250.

3088. KNOWLEDGE, Eagerness for. The Poet Shelley. No student ever read more assiduously. He was to be found, book in hand, at all hours; reading in season and out of season; at table, in bed, and especially during a walk; not only in the quiet country, and in retired paths; not only at Oxford, in the public walks, and High Street, but in the most crowded thoroughfares of London. Nor was he less absorbed by the volume that was open before him in Cheap-side, in Cranbourne Alley, or in Bond Street, than in a lonely lane or a secluded library.—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 2.

3089. KNOWLEDGE, Happiness by. Socrates. With regard to the pursuit of knowledge, Socrates held that all science was contemptible which did not tend to the happiness of man, by the regulation of his conduct in society; that the most beneficial wisdom is to be intimately acquainted with ourselves, to see our errors and defects, that we may be enabled to amend them.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 268.

3090. KNOWLEDGE, Humility for. Divine. [Rev. Thomas Coke, LL.D., a graduate of Oxford,] found in Devonshire an untutored but intelligent Methodist, a class leader of the rustics in the neighborhood. The nature of faith, justification, regeneration, and the evidences which attend them—the "unsearchable riches of Christ"—were themes upon which the clergyman found he could be instructed by the unlettered peasant. He acknowledged that he owed to him greater obligations "with respect to the means of finding peace with God and tranquillity of mind than to any other person."—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 2, p. 152.

3091. KNOWLEDGE without Learning. Peter Cooper, LL.D. With no proclivity to classical or philosophical learning, he was through life a diligent student of human affairs, and nothing that concerned the well-being of his fellow-men escaped his notice, from his nearest neighbors to the mightiest changes in the conditions of nations. So that, while he could not be called a man of learning, he was pre-eminently a man of knowledge. He was an untiring student of nature and art; the mingling of those two made up his whole life; they culminated at last in the Institute, which represents their blending.—LIFE OF PETER COOPER, by LESTER, p. 12.

3092. KNOWLEDGE, Limitations of. Aristotle. A great body of his writings is yet preserved, and is sufficient to warrant our estimation of Aristotle as one of the most vigorous and comprehensive geniuses that ever the world has produced. . . . The vanity of Aristotle prompted him to aim at universal knowledge; and professing to embrace the whole circle of the sciences, he only manifests the more signally his superficial knowledge in many departments, and his presumptuous rashness in deciding questions beyond the reach of human intellect. These palpable defects have injured his legitimate reputation in those branches of science in which he is truly excellent.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 275.

3093. KNOWLEDGE, Progress of. Aristotle. Mr. Lewes makes a remark concerning Aristotle: "It is the glory of science to be constantly progressive. After the lapse of a century, the greatest teacher, on reappearing among men, would have to assume the attitude of a learner. The very seed sown by himself would have sprung up into a forest to obscure the view. But he who rejoices in the grandeur of the forest must not forget by whom the seeds were sown. His heritors, we are richer, but not greater than he." This is a just and beautiful passage. There is not an intelligent boy or girl in a well-conducted school who could not set Aristotle right on a thousand points of science, who could not laugh at many of his mistakes; and yet it is not less true that he was one of the greatest intellects that has ever appeared among men.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 553.

3094. KNOWLEDGE, Promotion of. Jared Sparks. [Dr. Jared Sparks went from the carpenter's bench to the Presidency of Harvard College.] He was a Connecticut boy, born as long ago as 1789, and as poor as any boy that reads this book. He earned his living as soon as he was strong enough to wield a hoe or drive a plough-horse, by working on a rough, stony Connecticut farm; and when he had grown to be a pretty stout lad, he was occasionally employed in a saw-mill of the neighborhood. When the time came for him to learn a business he apprenticed himself to a carpenter, and he worked diligently at this trade for two years. When he was twenty years of age he was still hammering, planing, and mortising as a carpenter's apprentice. But during all this time, whether working on a farm, or in the saw-mill, or in the carpenter's shop, he spent his leisure hours in reading and study. He had a most extraordinary thirst for knowledge.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 619.

3095. KNOWLEDGE, Sacrifices for. Benjamin Franklin. Benjamin being a printer's apprentice, he was more and more puzzled to gratify his love of knowledge. But one day he hit upon an expedient that brought in a little cash. By reading a vegetarian book, this hard, calculating Yankee lad had been led to think that people could live better without meat than with it, and that killing innocent animals for food was cruel and wicked. So he abstained from meat altogether for about two years. As this led to some inconvenience at his boarding-house, he made this cunning proposition to his master: "Give me one half the money you pay for my board, and I will board myself." The master consenting, the apprentice lived entirely upon such things as hominy, bread, rice, and potatoes, and found that he could actually live upon half of the half. What did the calculating wretch do with the money? Put it into his money-box? No; he laid it all out in the improvement of his mind.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 129.

3096. ———. John Fitch. [The inventor.] Finding an old arithmetic in his father's house, he studied it in the evenings till he had mastered it. He heard one day, when he was eleven years old, of a wonderful book called Salmon's Geography, which, he was told, would give him information about the whole world. But, alas! the price was ten shillings. After vainly entreating his father to buy it for him, he hit upon a plan for raising that enormous sum himself. There were some lands upon his father's farm, too high to be reached by the plough, which were not cultivated. His father consented to let him plant potatoes there, and to have the produce himself, provided he worked the land only on holidays, or after his regular work was done. [The produce came to ten shillings, the book cost twelve shillings, and his father made him pay for the seed potatoes. So he incurred a debt.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 148.

3097. KNOWLEDGE, Theft of. Stilpo. Demetrius [the Macedonian general, having taken the city of Megara, was] satisfied with expelling the garrison, and declared the city free. Amid these transactions, he bethought himself of Stilpo, a philosopher of great reputation, who sought only the retirement and tranquillity of a studious life. He sent for him, and asked him whether they had taken anything from him. "No," said Stilpo, "I found none that wanted to steal any knowledge."—PLUTARCH'S DEMETRIUS.

3098. LABOR vs. Capital. England. The common people of that age were not in the habit of meeting for public discussion, of haranguing, or of petitioning Parliament. No newspaper pleaded their cause. It was in rude rhyme that their love and hatred, their exultation and their distress, found utterance. A great part of their history is to be learned only from their ballads. One of the most remarkable of the popular lays chanted about the streets of Norwich and Leeds in the time of Charles II. may still be read on the original broadside. It is the vehement and bitter cry of labor against capital. It describes the good old times when every artisan employed in the woollen manufacture lived as well as a farmer. But those times were past. Sixpence a day now was all that could be earned by hard labor at the loom. If the poor complained that they could not live on such a pittance, they were told that they were free to take it or leave it. For so miserable a recompense were the producers of wealth compelled to toil, rising early and laying down late, while the master clothier, eating, sleeping, and idling, became rich by their exertions. A shilling a day, the poet declares, is what the weaver would have, if justice were done.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 389.

3099. LABOR degraded. By Charity. [In 1831 the laborers of England] believed, as they had long been encouraged by the magistrates to believe, that the parish was bound to find work and pay wherever there was no profitable work to be done. [In England was the parish gravel-pit.] The gravel-pit lowered the wages of all agricultural labor, by confounding the distinctions between industry and idleness, between strength and weakness, between dexterity and clumsiness. All the moral qualifications that made one laborer more valuable than another were broken down. And so when the weekly pittance for unprofitable labor was doled out by the overseer of the poor—when the farmer equalized the rate of wages by reducing his ploughman and carter almost to the level of the gravel-diggers, and sent their wives to the overseer to make up by allowance the just payment of which they were defrauded—the peasantry took to burning ricks and breaking machines.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 16, p. 287.

3100. LABOR, Deliverance by. "Apron." The Saracens confess a loss of 7500 men; and the battle of Cadesia is justly described by the epithets of obstinate and atrocious. The standard of the monarchy was overthrown and captured in the field—a leathern apron of a blacksmith, who in ancient times had arisen the deliverer of Persia; but this badge of heroic poverty was disguised, and almost concealed, by a profusion of precious gems.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 179.

3101. LABOR, Evening. English—Irish. The Irish laborers close the day with a game on greasy cards, or lying stretched before the fire. In England, when the labor of the day is over, it is usual for men to betake themselves to some other labor of a different kind. In the northern parts of that industrious land the inhabitants meet, a jolly crew, at one another's houses, where they merrily and frugally pass the long dark winter evenings, several families by the same light and by the same fire working at their different manufactures of wool, flax, or hemp, company meanwhile mutually cheering and provoking to labor. In certain other parts you may see, on a summer's evening, the common laborers sitting along the streets of a town or village, each at his own door, with a cushion before him, making bone-lace, and earning more in an evening's pastime than an Irish family would in a whole day. Alas! for the bone-lace makers. Their industry was almost extinguished by the inexorable machine (the bobbin-net-frame) in 1809.—BERKELEY, IN KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 2, p. 19.

3102. LABOR, Expensive. George Washington. He owned one hundred and one cows, and yet had to buy butter sometimes for the use of his family. Would the reader like to know the reason? General Washington himself tells us. He mentions in his diary that one morning in February, 1760, he went out to where "my carpenters" were hewing—the said carpenters being black slaves. "I found," he wrote, "that four of them—namely, George, Tom, Mike, and young Billy—had only hewed one hundred and twenty feet since yesterday at ten o'clock." Surprised at this meagre result of a day's labor of four men, he sat down to see how they managed. Under the spell of the master's eye they worked faster, but still in a wonderfully bungling and dawdling manner. He records that, after they had prepared a log for cutting into lengths, "they spent twenty-five minutes more in getting the cross-cut saw, standing to consider what to do, sawing the stock in two places," etc. He found that the four men had done exactly one man's work the day before, supposing they could work no faster than they had done while he watched them, and that one intelligent, active laborer could do about as much hewing in two days as they would in a week. Here we have the reason why a man possessing one hundred and one cows had to buy butter.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 13.

3103. LABOR, Forced. Defence. [In anticipation of a French descent upon the coasts of England,] there is a statute of 1512 for the special erection of bulwarks from Plymouth to Land's End, and in all other landing-places. . . . To assist their country against invasion necessarily demands some personal privation from the high and the lowly. But the government which enacted that all the inhabitants of the maritime districts should be compelled to work at such bulwarks, with their own instruments, and to receive no compensation for their toil, was a government that hesitated not to rob the poor of their only capital, their power of labor, to spare the rich, whose property was chiefly imperilled by the probable assaults of a hostile force. Those who came not to work and to starve, at the summons of the mayors and constables, were to be committed to prison. The builders of the pyramids, with their scanty fare of onions and garlic, were in a happier condition than the free English under Henry VIII.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 16, p. 267.

3104. LABOR honored. Abraham Lincoln. [In 1830 Thomas Lincoln moved to Macon Co., Ill.] He immediately erected a log-cabin, and with the aid of his son, who was now twenty-one, proceeded to fence in his new farm. Abraham had little idea while . . . mauling the rails . . . he was writing a page in his life which would be read by the whole nation years afterward. . . . During the sitting of the Republican State Convention, at Decatur, a banner attached to two of these rails . . . was brought into the assemblage, and formally presented to that body, amid a scene of unparalleled enthusiasm. . . . They were in demand in every State of the Union.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 1, p. 22.

3105. LABOR by Impressment. Edward III. In 1349 his letters-patent went forth to press hewers of stone, carpenters, and other artificers; and the same principle of impressing workmen was put in force twenty years.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 30, p. 469.

3106. LABOR lost. Audubon. After fifteen years of such a life as this [forest life] he paid a visit to his relations in Philadelphia, carrying with him two hundred of his designs, the result of his laborious and perilous wanderings. Being obliged to leave Philadelphia for some weeks, he left these in a box at the house of one of his relations. On his return, what were his horror and despair to discover that they were totally destroyed by mice! "A poignant flame," he relates, "pierced my brain like an arrow of fire, and for several weeks I was prostrated with fever. At length physical and moral strength awoke within me. Again I took my gun, my game-bag, and portfolio, and my pencils, and plunged once more into the depths of my forests."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 164.

3107. LABOR, Machinery relieves. Changes. [The Yorkshire clothier, about the close of the seventeenth century, kept] his one horse to fetch home his wool and his provisions from the market, to carry his yarn to the spinners, his manufactures to the fulling-mill, and, when finished, to the market to be sold.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 2, p. 27.

3108. ———. Mining. De Foe says: "We saw the poor wretch [a lead miner in Derbyshire] working and heaving himself up with difficulty. . . . He was clothed all in leather; had a cap of the same without brims, and some tools in a little basket, which he drew up with him. . . . Beside his basket of tools he brought up with him about three quarters of a hundred weight of ore." [He worked sixty fathoms deep. He ascended by an arrow, square opening, in the angles of which pieces of wood were inserted.] Such was mining in the days before the steam-engine.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 2, p. 21.

3109. LABOR misapplied. Great Wall of China. [General Grant visited it, and said:] "I believe that the labor expended on this wall could have built every railroad in the United States, every canal and highway, and most if not all our cities."—GENERAL GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 464.

3110. LABOR oppressed by Law. England. A.D. 1388. [In 1388 it was] enacted "that he or she which use to labor at the plough and cart, or other labor or service of husbandry, till they be of the age of twelve years, from thenceforth shall abide at the same labor, without being put to any mystery or handicraft; and if any covenant or bond of apprentice be from henceforth made to the contrary, the same shall be holden for none." Another enactment of the same Parliament is to the effect that artificers and men of craft, servants and apprentices, shall be compelled to serve in the harvest, to cut, gather, and bring in the corn. . . . Male and female servants and laborers are not to depart at the end of their term, to go to another place, without letters testimonial under the king's seal, intrusted for that purpose to some good man of the hundred, rape, wapentake, city, or borough; wandering without such letters they were put in the stocks.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 1, p. 13.

3111. LABOR oppressed. By Law. [In 1349] the Statute of Laborers was passed. Its preamble read: "Because a great part of the people, and especially of workmen and servants, late died of the pestilence, many, seeing the necessity of masters and great scarcity of servants, will not serve unless they may receive excessive wages." . . . It was enacted "That every able-bodied man and woman, not being a merchant or exercising any craft, or having estate or land, should be bounden to serve, whenever required so to do, at the wages accustomed to be given in the twentieth year of the king, and in five or six years next before. If any man or woman, free or bond, . . . would not, he or she should be committed to the next jail." It also enacted that laborers departing from their service should be imprisoned, and that those masters who consented to give the higher wages should be liable to be mulcted in double the amount paid or promised. The statute then goes on to apply the same regulations to all artificers—saddlers, skimmers, . . . cordwainers, tailors, smiths, carpenters, masons, tylers, shipwrights, carters. . . . No person should give alms to such as might be able to labor, . . . under pain of imprisonment. But the laws of nature were too strong for the laws of policy. Two years later we have another statute. . . . A scale of wages is then set for laborers in husbandry; and the wages of carpenters, masons, tylers, and others concerned in building are also fixed. The principle of confining the laborer to one locality is established by enacting, with the exception of the inhabitants of Stafford, Lancashire, Derby, Craven, and of the Welsh and Scotch marches, who may come and go to other places in harvest time—"that none of them goeth out of the town where he dwelleth in the winter, to serve the summer, if he may serve in the same town."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 30, p. 471.

3112. ———. Fixed Wages. [About 1597 Parliament enacted that rates of wages were to be settled annually by the justices in sessions assembled. The rate so settled having been approved by the Privy Council, was to be proclaimed by the sheriff; and the payer and receiver of higher wages were subjected to fine and imprisonment. All able-bodied laborers wandering through refusal to work for such wages were styled "rogues and vagabonds," and subject to cruel punishments.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 17, p. 271.

3113. LABOR, Profitless. Cotton. This pod, which is about as large as a hen's egg, bursts when it is ripe, and the cotton gushes out at the top in a beautiful white flock. If you examine this flock closely, you discover that it contains eight or ten large seeds, much resembling, in size and shape, the seeds of a lemon. The fibres of the cotton adhere so tightly to the seeds, that to get one pound of clean cotton, without wasting any, used to require a whole day's labor. It was this fact that rendered the raising of cotton so little profitable, and kept the Southern States from sharing in the prosperity enjoyed by the States of the North, after the close of the Revolutionary War. When the gentlemen [who were visiting Mrs. Green] had been conversing for some time, the idea was started that perhaps this work could be done by a machine. Mrs. Greene then remarked: "Gentlemen, apply to my young friend, Mr. Whitney; he can make anything." Few words have ever been spoken on this globe that have had such important and memorable consequences as this simple observation of Mrs. Nathaniel Greene. [See No. 2991.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 159.

3114. LABOR prolonged. Fourteen Hours. [By a statute of 1495 it was required that] from the middle of March to the middle of September every laborer and artificer was to be at his work before five o'clock in the morning, and he was to depart not till between seven and eight in the evening. In this season he was to have half an hour for breakfast, an hour for dinner, and half an hour for his "nonemete;" and from the middle of May to the middle of August he was to have half an hour for sleep in the day. From September to March he was to be at his work "in the springing of the day, and depart not till night of the same day."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 7, p. 113.

3115. LABOR reduced. By Machinery. [Eli Whitney invented the cotton gin, and invited inspection.] The gentlemen saw, with unbounded wonder and delight, that one man, with this young Yankee's engine, could clean as much cotton in one day as a man could clean by hand in a whole winter. The cotton grown on a large plantation could be separated from the seed in a few days, which before required the constant labor of a hundred hands for several months.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 161.

3116. LABOR, Remarkable. John Wesley. He preached 42,400 sermons after his return from Georgia—more than fifteen a week. [He died in the eighty-eighth year of his age, after preaching the gospel for sixty-four years.] His public life . . . stands out in the history of the world unquestionably pre-eminent in religious labors above that of any other man since the apostolic age.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 2, p. 290.

3117. Labor respected. Napoleon I. [At St. Helena.] Some slaves, with heavy burdens on their shoulders, came toiling up the narrow path. Mrs. Balcombe, who was on her voyage to England from Bombay, . . . in rather an angry tone ordered them to keep back. But the emperor, making room for the slaves, turned to Mrs. Balcombe, and said, mildly, "Respect the burden, madame."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 30.

3118. LABOR, Success by. Jamestown Colony. Many circumstances impeded the progress of the oldest Virginia colony. The first settlers at Jamestown were idle, improvident, and dissolute. Of the one hundred and five men who came . . . in the spring of 1607, only twelve were common laborers. There were four carpenters and six or eight masons and blacksmiths, but the lack of mechanics was compensated by a long list of forty-eight gentlemen. . . . The prospect of planting an American State on the James River was not at all encouraging.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 9, p. 95. [Bancroft adds: "One half of the colony perished before autumn." Vol. 1, ch. 4.]

3119. LABOR, Wages of. Small. [In the beginning of the eighteenth century, the average wage paid to a farm-laborer was 5s., without food. Fifteen pounds was the average yearly income of the laboring man's family. Some consider 1s. to have had a purchasing power equal to 2s. at the present time.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 4, p. 50.

3120. ———. Samuel Johnson. Raising the wages of day-laborers is wrong; for it does not make them live better, but only makes them idler, and idleness is a very bad thing for human nature.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 485.

3121. LABOR, Youthful. Thurlo w Weed. My first employment, when about eight years old, was in blowing a blacksmith's bellows for a Mr. Reeves, who gave me six cents a day, which contributed so much toward the support of the family. I stood upon a box to enable me to reach the handle of the bellows. . . . I got a situation as cabin-boy on board the sloop Ranger . . . in my ninth year.—LIFE OF THURLOW WEED, vol. 1, ch. 1.

3122. LABORER honored, The. Abdolonymus. The Phœnicians had suffered much oppression under the Persian yoke, and were thus glad to be emancipated from its tyranny. Strato, the king or governor of Sidon, attempted in vain to maintain his province in its allegiance; he was deposed, and Alexander having allowed his favorite Hephæstion to dispose of the crown, he conferred it on Abdolonymus, a man of great worth and virtue, and of illustrious and even royal descent, but whom misfortunes had reduced to seek a subsistence by manual labor.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4, p. 184.

3123. LABORER impoverished. English. The laborer of the eighteenth century never ate wheat bread. . . . Tea and sugar, the comforts of the modern cottage, were wholly for the rich. Fresh meat was eaten only twice a week by half the working people, and never tasted at all by the other half. The salt to cure the flesh of his hog was very dear and frightfully unwholesome. . . . Woolen clothing of every sort was far dearer than. Linen was almost beyond the reach of his wife and children. There were no cheap calicoes for their shirts, no smart prints equally cheap for their frocks. His hovel, with "one chimney," was unglazed, and its thatched roof and battered walls offered the most miserable shelter. Furniture he had none beyond a bench and a plank on trestles, an iron pot, and a basin or two. He had the ague, and his children died of the small-pox without medical aid. . . . He had not the slightest chance of going out of his condition through education. . . . His children were shut out of any broader view of life than that of their native hamlet; for charity schools, few and mean as they were, . . . were only established in some favored towns. The farmers and the small freeholders were, with the exception of their greater command over the necessaries and comforts of life, at no great elevation above the husbandman, who worked for wages.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 4.

3124. LABORERS despised. By Normans. The Normans brought into England a contempt for the laboring people, the serfs, the villein, . . . which did not exist in any such degree before the Norman conquest. The peasant was . . . in every respect in bondage. His foreign master plundered him and held him in contempt. . . . The humblest cabin and the coarsest fare were thought almost too good for the villein. "Why should villeins eat beef or any dainty food?" asks one of the Norman jongleurs.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 22, p. 325.

3126. LAND, Division of. Beneficial. One certain effect of the crusades must have been great changes in territorial property throughout the kingdoms of Europe. The nobility and barons who went on those expeditions were obliged to sell their lands to defray their charges. The lands passed into the hands of other proprietors, and their former masters, such of them as ever returned to their country, had expended the whole of their fortunes. This fluctuation of property diminished the weight and influence of the greater barons, and weakened the aristocratical spirit of the feudal system. The lands of a single lord were likewise divided among a number of smaller proprietors, for few individuals were then opulent enough to have purchased entire lordships. This would necessarily diffuse a spirit of independence, and bring men nearer to an equality of property.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 10, p. 165.

3127. LAND, Ownership of. England. A landed proprietor who held an estate under the crown by knight service—and it was thus that most of the soil of England was held—had to pay a large fine on coming to his property. He could not alienate one acre without purchasing a license. When he died, if his domains descended to an infant, the sovereign was guardian, and was not only entitled to great part of the rents during the minority, but could require the ward, under heavy penalties, to marry any person of suitable rank. The chief bait which attracted a needy sycophant to the court was the hope of obtaining, as the reward of servility and flattery, a royal letter to an heiress. These abuses had perished with the monarchy.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 143.

3128. LAND, Unimproved. Reign of Charles II. The arable land and pasture land were not supposed by the best political arithmeticians of that age to amount to much more than half the area of the kingdom. The remainder was believed to consist of moor, forest, and fen. These computations are strongly confirmed by the road-books and maps of the seventeenth century. From those books and maps it is clear that many routes which now pass through an endless succession of orchards, hay-fields, and bean-fields, then ran through nothing but heath, swamp and warren.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 290.

3129. LANDS, Hereditary. Granted. To conciliate the affections of the soldiery was a very material object with the first emperors; and for this purpose no policy seemed more proper than to assign to them gifts of portions of land in the provinces where they were stationed. This, we find, was the case even in Italy, as we may learn from the first and ninth eclogues of Virgil. Of these distributions of land we find frequent mention among the ancient Roman lawyers. They became more frequent among the latter emperors, who found it necessary to court the favor and support of the army, now become the disposers of the imperial diadem. These distributions of land were at first only for life. The first who allowed them to descend to the heirs of the grantees was Alexander Severus, who, as Lampridius informs us, permitted the heirs of the grantees to enjoy their possessions, on the express condition of their following the profession of arms. Constantine the Great in like manner made gifts of land to his principal officers, perpetual and hereditary.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 2, p. 65.

3130. LANGUAGE, Adaptation of. Greek and Roman. The two languages exercised at the same time their separate jurisdiction throughout the empire; the former as the natural idiom of science; the latter as the legal dialect of public transactions. Those who united letters with business were equally conversant with both; and it was almost impossible, in any province, to find a Roman subject, of a liberal education, who was at once a stranger to the Greek and to the Latin language.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 47.

3131. LANGUAGE, Contempt for. Battle of Hastings. When the English fall the Normans shout. Each side taunts and defies the other, yet neither knoweth what the other saith; and the Normans say the English bark, because they understand not their speech.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 327.

3132. LANGUAGE and Manners. Romans. So sensible were the Romans of the influence of language over national manners, that it was their most serious care to extend, with the progress of their arms, the use of the Latin tongue.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 44.

3133. ———. Early. Language, in the early periods of every nation, is in a very rude condition, and it is in this imperfection and apparent barrenness of the language that we shall find one cause for the lofty tone assumed by the poetry. The words are few, but they are invariably expressive. They are descriptive of the strongest passions, of the deepest feelings of the human heart—of patriotism and valor, of grief and joy, of triumph and despair, of love and hatred; of such feelings as are to be found among every uncultivated people—when nature is certainly comparatively in a savage state; when none of those fantastic and artificial ideas, and therefore none of those low and insipid expressions have been introduced, which invariably accompany the process of luxury and refinement. In the ancient languages of a rude people we find no redundancy of expletives, no unnecessary words, no unmeaning synonymes, because language is formed to describe what passes in the minds or before the eyes of those who use it. Even in their common discourse, and still more in their war-songs, or their solemn harangues, the speakers were actually compelled to be nervous, concise, and frequently metaphorical. The high-flown and figurative style must have then become as much a matter of necessity, owing to the barrenness of the language, as the effect of taste or imagination. When man first found himself in society, the Almighty, in the language which He created for him, did not furnish him with what was calculated to delineate the minuter feelings of the heart, or the more detailed and delicate scenery of nature, but with that broad and bolder pencil which could describe those conflicting passions which then tore his mind, or those awful solitudes with which he was then surrounded.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 3, p. 426.

3134. LANGUAGE, Origin of. Samuel Johnson. Talking of the origin of language. JOHNSON: "It must have come by inspiration. A thousand—nay, a million of children could not invent a language. While the organs are pliable, there is not understanding enough to form a language; by the time that there is understanding enough, the organs are become stiff. We know that after a certain age we cannot learn to pronounce a new language. No foreigner who comes to England when advanced in life ever pronounces English tolerably well; at least, such instances are very rare. When I maintain that language must have come by inspiration, I do not mean that inspiration is required for rhetoric, and all the beauties of language; for when once man has language, we can conceive that he may gradually form modifications of it. I mean only that inspiration seems to me to be necessary to give man the faculty of speech; to inform him that he may have speech; which I think he could no more find out without inspiration than crows or hogs would think of such a faculty."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 495.

3135. LANGUAGE, Paradisaic. Persian. [Mahomet recommended the Persian language to the use of paradise, it being a smooth and elegant idiom.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 42, p. 216.

3136. LANGUAGE, Training in. Romans. Next to this care of the mother, or the female tutor, in instilling the rigid principle of patriotic virtue, a very remarkable degree of attention appears to have been bestowed by the Romans in accustoming their children to correctness of language and purity of expression. Cicero informs us that the Gracchi were educated non tam in gremio quam in sermone matris. And in speaking of Curio, who was one of the best orators of his time, he adds, that without possessing the rules of his art, and without any knowledge of the laws, he had attained to eminence merely from the elegance and purity of his diction. This attention to the language of children may appear, in these modern days, an absurd and useless refinement. Among the Romans it was not thought so. They were well aware how much the man is influenced by the earliest impressions and habits of infancy. They suspected, and not without just grounds, that they who became familiar with the language and expressions of their slaves were likely to be initiated also in their vices, and to become reconciled to their ideas of servility and dependence. That urbanity upon which this people so much prided themselves in the more advanced periods of the commonwealth was nothing else than a certain manly elegance, which distinguished the Roman citizens from those nations whom they accounted barbarous.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 3, p. 423.

3137. LAUGHTER, Importance of. Lycurgus. Lycurgus [the lawgiver] . . . dedicated a little statue to the god of laughter in each hall. He considered facetiousness as a seasoning of the hard exercise and diet, and therefore ordered it to take place on all proper occasions, in their common entertainments and parties of pleasure.—PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

3138. LAW, Above. James II. It was determined that the nuncio should go to court in solemn procession. Some persons on whose obedience the king had counted showed, on this occasion, for the first time, signs of a mutinous spirit. Among these the most conspicuous was the second temporal peer of the realm, Charles Seymour, commonly called the proud Duke of Somerset. He was, in truth, a man in whom the pride of birth and rank amounted almost to a disease. . . . Some members of his family implored him not to draw on himself the royal displeasure, but their entreaties produced no effect. The king himself expostulated. "I thought, my lord," said he, "that I was doing you a great honor in appointing you to escort the minister of the first of all crowned heads." "Sir," said the duke, "I am advised that I cannot obey your Majesty without breaking the law." "I will make you fear me as well as the law," answered the king, insolently. "Do you not know that I am above the law?" "Your Majesty may be above the law," replied Somerset, "but I am not; and while I obey the law I fear nothing." The king turned away in high displeasure, and Somerset was instantly dismissed from his posts in the household and in the army. [James soon after was a fugitive and an exile.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 250.

3139. LAW, Delay of the. John Hampden. [In 1636 "John Hampden, Esq.," refused to pay an illegal tax of 3*1s. 6d.* "There were six weeks of solemn pleading in the Exchequer Chamber before all the judges—the greatest cause that ever was tried in Westminster Hall—followed by many months of judicial deliberation, before the king's right to enforce the tax of ship-money was adjudged to be lawful. Hampden refused to pay 20*s.* assessed upon his lands. The formal pleadings upon the writ occupied five months before the question came to be argued. The speeches of the crown lawyers and of Hampden's counsel occupy one hundred and seventeen pages in Rushworth's folio volume. After these protracted arguments before the judges, three terms were occupied by them in giving their opinions. They were not agreed in their judgment. It was finally decided that the tax was lawful.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 26, p. 422.

3140. LAW, Ignorance of. Romans. It was reckoned dishonorable for any person of the patrician rank not to have thoroughly studied the laws and the constitution of his country. In one of the laws of the Roman pandects an anecdote is recorded of Sulpitius, a gentleman of the patrician order, who had occasion to resort for advice to Quintus Mucius Scaevola, then the most eminent lawyer in Rome.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 3, p. 425.

3141. LAW levels all. Emperor Julian. During the games of the circus he had, imprudently or designedly, performed the manumission of a slave in the presence of the consul. The moment he was reminded that he had trespassed on the jurisdiction of another magistrate, he condemned himself to pay a fine of ten pounds of gold; and embraced this public occasion of declaring to the world that he was subject, like the rest of his fellow-citizens, to the laws, and even to the forms, of the republic.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 22, p. 403.

3142. LAW, Majesty of. Protection. The poorest man in his cottage may bid defiance to all the forces of the crown. It may be frail; its roof may shake; the storm may enter it; but the King of England cannot enter it. All his power dares not cross the threshold of that ruined tenement. [Speech of Chatham.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 12, p. 166.

3143. LAW, Mockery of. Romans. The governors of the provinces being chosen from those who have been consuls or prætors, were necessarily members of the Senate. Peculation and extortion in these high functions were offences in the theory of gravest kind; but the offender could only be tried before a limited number of his peers, and a governor who had plundered a subject State, sold justice, pillaged temples, and stolen all that he could lay hands on, was safe from punishment if he returned to Rome a millionaire and would admit others to a share in his spoils. The provincials might send deputations to complain, but these complaints came before men who had themselves governed provinces or else aspired to govern them. It had been proved in too many instances that the law which professed to protect them was a mere mockery.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 3.

3144. LAW, Novice in. Patrick Henry. He married at eighteen; attempted trade; toiled successfully as a farmer; then with buoyant mind resolved on becoming a lawyer; and answering questions successfully by the aid of six weeks' study of Coke upon Littleton and the statutes of Virginia, he gained a license as a barrister. For three years the novice dwelt under the roof of his father-in-law, an innkeeper, . . . ignorant of the science of law, and slowly learning its forms.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 9.

3145. LAW overturned. Charles II. Meanwhile, rapid strides were made toward despotism. Proclamations, dispensing with acts of Parliament, or enjoining what only Parliament could lawfully enjoin, appeared in rapid succession.

Of these edicts, the most important was the Declaration of Indulgence. By this instrument the penal laws against Roman Catholics were at once set aside by royal authority; and, that the real object of the measure might not be perceived, the laws against Protestant Nonconformists were also suspended.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 202.

3146. LAW, Partiality of the. England. [In the middle of the eighteenth century Parson Adams is taken before a fox-hunting justice, who] will not at once condemn him to the hangman. "No, no; you will be asked what you have to say for yourself when you come on your trial; we are not trying you now; I shall only commit you to gaol." In vain the poor curate asked, "Is it no punishment, sir, for an innocent man to be several months in gaol?" His mittimus would have been signed had not a bystander affirmed that Mr. Adams was a clergyman and a gentleman of good character. "Then," said the justice, "I know how to behave myself to a gentleman as well as another. Nobody can say I have committed a gentleman since I have been in the commission."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 108.

3147. LAW, Sacredness of. Socrates. He was sentenced, after an imprisonment of thirty days, to drink the juice of hemlock. That time he spent as became the hero and the philosopher. His friends had prepared the means of his escape, and earnestly endeavored to persuade him to attempt it; but he convinced them that it is a crime to violate the law, even where its sentence is unjust.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 2, p. 156.

3148. LAW, Supremacy of. Necessary. [Charles II., in 1673, in defiance of law, made the "Declaration of Indulgence."] Mr. Alderman Love, one of the members [of Parliament] for the city of London, opposed the declaration. A member said to him, "Why, Mr. Love, you are a Dissenter yourself; it is very ungrateful that you who receive the benefit should object against the manner." He replied: "I am a Dissenter, and therefore happily obnoxious to the law. The law against the Dissenters I should be glad to see repealed by the same authority that made it; but while it is a law the king cannot repeal it by proclamation; and I had much rather see the Dissenters suffer from the rigor of the law, though I suffer with them, than see all the laws of England trampled under the foot of the prerogative, as in this example."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 19, p. 320.

3149. LAW suspended. Rome. It had long been the rule at Rome that no officer of justice or finance could enter the dwelling inhabited by the minister who represented a Catholic State. In process of time, not only the dwelling, but a large precinct round it, was held inviolable. . . . At length half the city consisted of privileged districts, within which the papal government had no more power than within the Louvre or the Escorial. Every asylum was thronged with contraband traders, fraudulent bankrupts, thieves, and assassins. In every asylum were collected magazines of stolen or smuggled goods. From every asylum ruffians sallied forth nightly to plunder and stab. In no town of Christendom, consequently, was law so impotent and wickedness so audacious as in the ancient capital of religion and civilization. On this subject Innocent felt as became a priest and a prince. He declared that he would receive no ambassador who insisted on a right so destructive of order and morality.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 402.

3150. LAW, Technicalities of the. Pilgrim Fathers. [Long sought a patent of the London Company for a home in the American wilderness.] At last, in 1619, its members, in their open court, writes one of the Pilgrims, "demanded our ends of going; which being related, they said the thing was of God, and granted a large patent." Being taken in the name of one who failed to accompany the expedition, the patent was never of the least service.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 8.

3151. LAW, Unprotected by. Reign of James II. [Protestantism had been suppressed and Catholicism promoted in Ireland.] Those who had lately been the lords of the island now cried out, in the bitterness of their souls, that they had become a prey and a laughing-stock to their own serfs and menials; that houses were burned and cattle stolen with impunity; that the new [Catholic] soldiers roamed the country, pillaging, insulting, ravaging, maiming, tossing one Protestant in a blanket, tying up another by the hair, and scourging him; that to appeal to the law was vain; that Irish judges, sheriffs, juries, and witnesses were all in league to save Irish criminals, . . . the whole soil would soon change hands . . . In every action of ejectment under the administration of [lord-lieutenant] Tyrconnel, judgment had been given for the native against the Englishman.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 16, p. 147.

3152. LAW, Without. English Cabinet. Few things in our history are more curious than the origin and growth of the power now possessed by the cabinet. . . . During many years old-fashioned politicians continued to regard the cabinet as an unconstitutional and dangerous board. Nevertheless, it constantly became more and more important. It at length drew to itself the chief executive power, and has now been regarded, during several generations, as an essential part of our polity. Yet, strange to say, it still continues to be altogether unknown to the law.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 197.

3153. LAWS, Broken. The Roman Consul. Tarquinius Superbus had trampled on all the constitutional restraints and on all the regulations of the preceding sovereigns. He had never assembled the senate, nor called together the people in the Comitia. He is even said to have destroyed or broken the tablets on which the laws were written, in order to efface all remembrance of them. It was necessary, therefore, after his expulsion, that new tablets should be framed.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 3, p. 309.

3154. LAWS disregarded. American Colonies. [The Importation Act of Parliament was passed in 1733.] Exorbitant duties were laid on all the sugar, molasses, and rum imported into the colonies. At first the payment of these unreasonable customs was evaded by the merchants, and then the statute was openly set at naught. In 1750 it was further enacted that iron-works should not be erected in America. The manufacture of steel was specially forbidden, and the felling of pinea [useful for English ship-masts] outside of enclosures was interdicted. All these laws were disregarded and denounced by the people of the colonies as being unjust and tyrannical.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 37, p. 287.

3155. LAWS, Enforcement of. Good. When Anacharsis knew what Solon was about, he laughed . . . at the absurdity of imagining he could restrain the avarice and injustice of his citizens by written laws, which in all respects resembled spiders' webs, and would, like them, only entangle and hold the poor and weak, while the rich and powerful easily broke through them. To this Solon replied: "Men keep their agreements when it is an advantage to both parties not to break them;" and he would so frame his laws as to make it evident to the Athenians that it would be more for their interest to observe than to transgress them.—PLUTARCH'S SOLON.

3156. LAWS, Obsolete. Enforced. Henry VII. enforced obsolete laws, in order to obtain money from the wealthy London merchants, in which false witnesses, called promoters, were systematically employed.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 241.

3157. LAWS, First printed. England. [In 1484,] for the first time, the laws to be obeyed by the English people are enacted in the English tongue. But beyond this, they are the first laws in our land which were ever printed.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 12, p. 200.

3158. LAWS, Proposal of. Athenians. It was a singular peculiarity of the constitution of Athens, and, as Plutarch informs us, likewise of Thebes, that after a law was voted and passed in the assembly of the people, the proposer of the law might have been cited in the ordinary civil courts, tried, and brought to punishment, if the court was of opinion that the law was prejudicial to the public. This peculiarity is noticed in one of Mr. Hume's political essays ("Of Some Remarkable Customs"), and that author mentions several examples in the Grecian history, among the rest the trial of Ctesiphon, for that law which he had proposed and carried, for rewarding the services of Demosthenes with a crown of gold—a trial which gave occasion to two of the most splendid and animated orations that remain to us of the composition of the ancients—the orations of Æschines and Demosthenes.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 10, p. 106.

3159. LAWS, Severe. Solon. Solon repealed the laws of Draco, except those concerning murder, because of the severity of the punishments they appointed, which for almost all offences were capital; even those that were convicted of idleness were to suffer death, and such as stole only a few apples or potherbs were to be punished in the same manner as sacrilegious persons and murderers. Hence a saying of Demades, who lived long after, was much admired, that Draco wrote his laws not with ink, but with blood. And he himself being asked why he made death the punishment for most offences, answered, "Small ones deserve it, and I can find no greater for the most heinous."—PLUTARCH'S SOLON.

3160. ———. Egyptian. The penal laws of Egypt were remarkably severe. Whoever had it in his power to save the life of a citizen and neglected that duty, was punished as his murderer—a law which we must presume admitted of much limitation, according to circumstances. It appears to have been from the same motive of preserving the lives of the citizens, that if a person was found murdered, the city within whose bounds the murder had been committed was obliged to embalm the body in the most costly manner, and bestow on it the most sumptuous funeral. Perjury was justly held a capital crime; for there is no offence productive of more pernicious consequences to society. Calumniators were condemned to the same punishment which the calumniated person either had or might have suffered, had the calumny been believed. The citizen who was so base as to disclose the secrets of the State to its enemies was punished by the cutting out of his tongue; and the forger of public instruments or private deeds, the counterfeiter of the current coin, and the user of false weights and measures, were condemned to have both their hands cut off. The laws for the preservation of the chastity of women were extremely rigid: emasculation was the punishment of him who violated a free woman, and burning to death was the punishment of an adulterer.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4, p. 37.

3161. LAWS, Sumptuary. Romans. In order, if possible, to restrain such extreme luxury, a variety of sumptuary laws were promulgated from time to time, some of them limiting the number of dishes, others the number of guests, and others the expense to be bestowed on an entertainment; but all these attempts were completely unsuccessful. How, in effect, could it have been possible to bring back ancient simplicity unless they could have also recalled ancient poverty? When a state has once become generally opulent, the expenses of the rich must keep pace with their fortunes, otherwise the poor would want employment and subsistence. It is luxury that is silently levelling that inequality, or at least keeping fortunes in a constant fluctuation. . . . We may wish that Rome had remained poor and virtuous; but, being once great and opulent, it was to have required an impossibility that she should not have been luxurious.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 5, p. 451.

3162. ———. Roman. Cæsar made an effort, in which Augustus afterward imitated him, to check the luxury which was eating into the Roman character. He forbade the idle young patricians to be carried about by slaves in litters. The markets of the world had been ransacked to provide dainties for these gentlemen. He appointed inspectors to survey the dealers' stalls, and occasionally prohibited dishes were carried off from the dinner-table under the eyes of the disappointed guests. Enemies enough Cæsar made by these measures; but it could not be said of him that he allowed indulgences to himself which he interdicted to others. His domestic economy was strict and simple, the accounts being kept to a sesterce. His frugality was hospitable. He had two tables always—one for his civilian friends, another for his officers, who dined in uniform. The food was plain, but the best of its kind; and he was not to be played with in such matters. An unlucky baker who supplied his guests with bread of worse quality than he furnished for himself was put in chains.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 26.

3163. LAWS, Suspension of. Lacedæmonians. [When the Lacedæmonians had been defeated at Leuctra they were too greatly reduced in strength and numbers to enforce the laws against those who had fled in battle.] In this perplexity they had recourse to Agesilaus, and invested him with new powers of legislation. But he, without making any addition, retrenchment, or change, went into the assembly, and told the Lacedæmonians the laws should sleep that day, and resume their authority the day following, and retain it forever. By this means he preserved to the State its laws entire, as well as the obnoxious persons from infamy.—PLUTARCH'S AGESILAUS.

3164. LAWS, Unwritten. Spartan. Lycurgus did not permit his laws to be written. They were few and simple, and were impressed on the memory of the youth by their parents and masters, continually renewed in their minds by the conversation of their elders, and most effectually enforced by the daily practice of their lives.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9.

3165. LAWYER, An ignorant. Publius Cotta. Publius Cotta, who affected to be thought an able lawyer, though he had neither learning nor capacity, being called in as a witness in a certain cause, declared he knew nothing of the matter. "Perhaps," said Cicero, "you think I am asking you some question in law."—PLUTARCH.

3166. LAWYERS, Arts of. Roman. In the decline of Roman jurisprudence, the ordinary promotion of lawyers was pregnant with mischief and disgrace. The noble art, which had once been preserved as the sacred inheritance of the patricians, was fallen into the hands of freedmen and plebeians, who, with cunning rather than with skill, exercised a sordid and pernicious trade. Some of them procured admittance into families for the purpose of fomenting differences, of encouraging suits, and of preparing a harvest of gain for themselves or their brethren. Others, recluse in their chambers, maintained the dignity of legal professors by furnishing a rich client with subtleties to confound the plainest truths, and with arguments to color the most unjustifiable pretensions. The splendid and popular class was composed of the advocates, who filled the Forum with the sound of their turgid and loquacious rhetoric. Careless of fame and of justice, they are described, for the most part, as ignorant and rapacious guides, who conducted their clients through a maze of expense, of delay, and of disappointment; from whence, after a tedious series of years, they were at length dismissed, when their patience and fortune were almost exhausted.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17, p. 123.

3167. LAWYERS, Hatred of. By Germans. The Germans, who exterminated Varus and his legions, had been particularly offended with the Roman laws and lawyers. One of the barbarians, after the effectual precautions of cutting out the tongue of an advocate, and sewing up his mouth, observed, with much satisfaction, that the viper could no longer hiss.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 33, p. 399.

3168. LAWYERS imprisoned. For Deceit. [The statute of 1275] provided that no sergeant or pleader should use deceit to beguile the court, under pain of imprisonment.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 25, p. 385.

3169. LAWYERS, Patriotic. New York. A.D. 1765. [The Stamp Act was everywhere resisted. Governor Colden yielded to the people reluctantly, and no stamps were issued.] "The lawyers," he wrote, . . . "of this place are the authors and conductors of the present sedition. If judges be sent from England, with an able attorney-general and solicitor-general, to make examples of some very few, this colony will remain quiet."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 19.

3170. LAWYERS, Special. Reign of James II. Sawyer had been suffered to retain his situation more than a year and a half after he had declared against the dispensing power. This extraordinary indulgence he owed to the extreme difficulty which the government found in supplying his place. It was necessary, for the protection of the pecuniary interests of the crown, that at least one of the two chief law officers should be a man of ability and knowledge. . . . It had been impossible to provide a better solicitor-general than Powis, a man who indeed stuck at nothing, but who was incompetent to perform the ordinary duties of his post. In these circumstances, it was thought desirable that there should be a division of labor. An attorney, the value of whose professional talents was much diminished by his conscientious scruples, was coupled with a solicitor whose want of scruples made some amends for his want of talents. When the government wished to enforce the law, recourse was had to Sawyer. When the government wished to break the law, recourse was had to Powis. This arrangement lasted till the king obtained the services of an advocate who was at once baser than Powis and abler than Sawyer.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 315.

3171. LAYMEN ignored. Ninth Century. It is curious to remark that while the clergy were steadily aiming at temporal power, secular princes, as if interchanging character with them, seem to have fixed their chief attention on spiritual concerns. The monastic life was now universally in the highest esteem, and nothing could equal the veneration that was paid to such as devoted themselves to the sacred gloom and indolence of a convent. . . . Kings, dukes, and counts, regarding their secular duties as mean and sordid, beheld with contempt everything that regarded this world, and, abandoning their thrones and temporal honors, shut themselves up in monasteries, and devoted themselves entirely to the exercises of prayer and mortification. Others, whose zeal had not led them quite so far, showed their reverence for the church by employing ecclesiastics in every department of secular government. At this time all embassies, negotiations, and treaties of State were conducted by monks and abbots, who most naturally contrived that all public measures should contribute to the great end of advancing the sovereign and paramount jurisdiction of the pope and the ecclesiastical councils.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 4, p. 95.

3172. LEADER, Matchless. Henry Clay. Other men have excelled him in specific powers, but in the rare combination of qualities which constitute at once the matchless leader of party and the statesman of consummate ability and inexhaustible resource, he has never been surpassed by any man speaking the English tongue. —BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, vol. 1, p. 108.

3173. LEADER, Noble. John Winthrop. In the year 1630 about three hundred of the best Puritan families in the kingdom came to New England. Not adventurers, not vagabonds, were these brave people, but virtuous, well-educated, courageous men and women, who for conscience' sake left comfortable homes, with no expectation of returning. It was not the least of their good fortune to choose a noble leader. If ever a man was worthy to be held in perpetual remembrance, that man was John Winthrop, Governor of Massachusetts. Born a royalist, he cherished the principles of republicanism. Himself an Episcopalian, he chose affliction with the Puritans. Surrounded with affluence and comfort, he left all to share the destiny of the persecuted Pilgrims. Calm, prudent, and peaceable, he joined the zeal of an enthusiast with the sublime faith of a martyr. —RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 13, p. 126.

3174. LEADER, Unnatural. Head. The tail, it seems, one day quarrelled with the head, and instead of being forced always to follow, insisted that it should lead in its turn. Accordingly, the tail undertook the charge, and as it moved forward at all adventures, it tore itself in a terrible manner; and the head, which was thus obliged, against nature, to follow a guide that could neither see nor hear, suffered likewise in its turn. —PLUTARCH.

3175. LEADERS, Change of. Ruinous. By the 10th of the month [July, 1864] the whole Confederate army had retired within the defences of Atlanta. This stronghold of the Confederacy was at once besieged. Here were the great machine-shops, foundries, car-works, and depots of supplies, upon the possession of which so much depended. At the very beginning of the siege the cautious and skilful General Johnston was superseded by the rash but daring General J. B. Hood. It was the policy of the latter to fight at whatever hazard. On the 20th, 22d, and 28th of July he made three desperate assaults on the Union lines around Atlanta, but was repulsed with dreadful losses in each engagement. In the three conflicts the Confederates lost more men than Johnston had lost in all his masterly retreating and fighting between Chattanooga and Atlanta. For more than a month the siege was pressed with great vigor. At last, by an incautious movement, Hood separated his army; Sherman thrust a column between the two divisions; and the immediate evacuation of Atlanta followed. On the 2d of September the Union army marched into the captured city. Since leaving Chattanooga General Sherman had lost fully 30,000 men; and the Confederate losses were even greater. . . . [On the 15th of December General Hood was defeated at Nashville.] . . . The Confederate army was ruined, and the rash general who had led it to destruction was relieved of his command. —RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 66, p. 526.

3176. LEADERSHIP, Omen of. Tarquin. Tarquin, during some of his wars, had vowed to erect a temple to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva; but he lived only to see the work begun. On the top of the Tarpeian Hill, the skull of a man was found—a very ordinary occurrence, but which the augurs declared to be a presage that Rome was one day to become the head, or mistress, of the universe. The new temple was from this incident called Capitolium. —TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 2, p. 296.

3177. LEARNING dishonored. James II. [He proposed one Anthony Farmer to be President of Magdalen College—the wealthiest in England.] This man's life had been one series of shameful acts. He had been a member of the University of Cambridge, and had escaped expulsion only by a timely retreat. He had then joined the Dissenters. Then he had gone to Oxford, had entered himself at Magdalen, and had soon become notorious there for every kind of vice. He generally reeled into his college at night speechless with liquor. He was celebrated for having headed a disgraceful riot at Abingdon. He had been a constant frequenter of noted haunts of libertines. At length he had turned pander, had exceeded even the ordinary vileness of his vile calling, and had received money from dissolute young gentleman commoners for services such as it is not good that history should record. This wretch, however, had pretended to turn papist. His apostasy atoned for all his vices; and, though still a youth, he was selected to rule a grave and religious society in which the scandal given by his depravity was still fresh. —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 267.

3178. LEARNING esteemed. Puritans. [The Puritans were not distinguished for any capricious dislike of music, after the rantings of Stubbes and Prynne, nor of secular knowledge.] No man was more eager than Cromwell himself to protect learning and learned men. He sought out scholars for public employments. . . . His house was as remarkable for its refined amusements as its decorous piety. The love of music was with him almost a passion, as it was with Milton. —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 11, p. 173.

3179. LEARNING honored. Tartar. [Timour the Tartar was one of the most cruel conquerors.] Everywhere, however, Timour saved and protected the learned men of the conquered city. The aristocracy of human thought and wisdom appeared to him to form an exception to that humanity which he despised to the extreme of nothingness. —LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 321.

3180. LEARNING, Secular. Rejected. [Edmund Rich was Archbishop of Canterbury—a saint also.] Even knowledge brought its troubles; the Old Testament, which, with a copy of the Decretals, long formed his sole library, frowned down upon a love of secular learning, from which Edmund found it hard to wean himself. At last, in some hour of dream, the form of his dead mother floated into the room, where the teacher stood among his mathematical diagrams. "What are these?" she seemed to say; and, seizing Edmund's right hand, she drew on the palm three circles interlaced, each of which bore the name of a person of the Christian Trinity. "Be these," she cried, as the figure faded away, "thy diagrams henceforth, my son." —HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 164.

3181. LEARNING, Superficial. Samuel Johnson. He defended his remark upon the general insufficiency of education in Scotland, and confirmed to me the authenticity of his witty saying on the learning of the Scotch: "Their learning is like bread in a besieged town: every man gets a little, but no man gets a full meal." "There is," said he, "in Scotland a diffusion of learning, a certain portion of it widely and thinly spread. A merchant has as much learning as one of their clergy."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 251.

3182. LEARNING, Wide. Samuel Johnson. The two years which he spent at home, after his return from Stourbridge, he passed in what he thought idleness, and was scolded by his father for his want of steady application. He might, perhaps, have studied more assiduously; but it may be doubted whether such a mind as his was not more enriched by roaming at large in the fields of literature than if it had been confined to any single spot. The analogy between body and mind is very general, and the parallel will hold as to their food, as well as any other particular. The flesh of animals who feed excursively is allowed to have a higher flavor than that of those who are cooped up. May there not be the same difference between men who read as their taste prompts, and men who are confined in cells and colleges to stated tasks?—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 10.

3183. LEGACIES, Christian. Reign of Constantine. Eight years after the edict of Milan, Constantine granted to all his subjects the free and universal permission of bequeathing their fortunes to the Holy Catholic Church; and their devout liberality, which during their lives was checked by luxury or avarice, flowed with a profuse stream at the hour of their death. The wealthy Christians were encouraged by the example of their sovereign. An absolute monarch, who is rich without patrimony, may be charitable without merit; and Constantine too easily believed that he should purchase the favor of Heaven if he maintained the idle at the expense of the industrious, and distributed among the saints the wealth of the republic.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20, p. 285.

3185. LEGACIES, Enriched by. Cicero. While so many unjust and extravagant wills were every day dictated by cunning and subscribed by folly, a few were the result of national esteem and virtuous gratitude. Cicero, who had so often defended the lives and fortunes of his fellow-citizens, was rewarded with legacies to the amount of a hundred and seventy thousand pounds; nor do the friends of the younger Pliny seem to have been less generous to that amiable orator.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6, p. 193.

3186. LEGISLATION, Complicated. "Log-rolling." When the bill to admit Missouri as a State was finally, in January of 1820, brought before Congress, the measure was opposed by those who had desired the exclusion of slavery. But at that time the new free State of Maine was asking for admission into the Union; and those who favored slavery in Missouri determined to exclude Maine unless Missouri should also be admitted. After another angry debate, which lasted till the 16th of February, the bill coupling the two new States together was actually passed.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 52, p. 421.

3187. LEGISLATION, Corruption of. Members of Parliament. [In 1674 the "indigent courtiers" in the House of Commons were thus described by Lord Shaftesbury as supposed:] Their votes are publicly saleable for a guinea and a dinner every day in the week, unless the House be upon money, or a minister of State; for that is their harvest; and then they make their earnings suit the work they are about, which inclines them most constantly as sure clients to the court. The only thing that we are obliged to them for is, that they do nothing gratis, but make every tax as well chargeable to the court as burdensome to the country, and save no man's neck but they break his purse.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 20, p. 324.

3188. LEGISLATION, Fanatical. "Barebones' Parliament." Yet Cromwell, thus become absolute master of the whole power, civil and military, of the three kingdoms, thought it necessary to leave the nation some shadow, some phantom of liberty. It was proper that there should be the appearance of a parliament; and he therefore, by the advice of his council of officers, summoned one hundred and twenty-eight persons from the different towns and counties of England—five from Scotland and six from Ireland—to assemble at Westminster, with power to exercise legislative authority for fifteen months. These, who were chiefly a set of low fanatical mechanics, Anabaptists, and Independents, were in scorn denominated by the people Barebones' Parliament, from the name of one of their most violent and active members, Praise-god Barebones, a leather-seller. This assembly, whose shameful ignorance, meanness, and absurdity of conduct rendered them useless and contemptible both to Cromwell and the nation, voluntarily dissolved themselves by a vote after a session of five months.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30, p. 414.

3189. LEGISLATION by Packing. Oliver Cromwell. Amid these successes abroad the Protector found his situation at home extremely uneasy. His parliaments were refractory, and he was obliged to have recourse to the violent method of excluding, by a guard at the door, such of the members as he knew to be disaffected to him. At length, by using every art to influence the elections and to fill the house with his sure friends, he got one parliament so perfectly to his mind that a vote was proposed and passed for investing the Protector with the dignity of king, and a committee was appointed to confer with him on that subject, and overcome any scruples which he might have on that score.

But Cromwell's scruples were not violent; he had other objections than what proceeded from his own inclinations. He dreaded the resentment of the army.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30, p. 415.

3190. LEGISLATION ridiculed. British Prohibition. [Manufactures were forbidden in the colonies. Men said:] "Catching a mouse within his Majesty's colonies with a trap of our own making will be deemed, in the ministerial cant, an infamous, atrocious, and nefarious crime."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 14.

3191. LEGISLATION, Special. Emperor Justinian. [That he might marry a prostitute,] a law was promulgated in the name of the Emperor Justin, which abolished the rigid jurisprudence of antiquity. A glorious repentance (the words of the edict) was left open for the unhappy females who had prostituted their persons on the theatre, and they were permitted to contract a legal union with the most illustrious of the Romans. This indulgence was speedily followed by the solemn nuptials of Justinian and Theodora; her dignity was gradually exalted with that of her lover.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40, p. 52.

3192. LEGISLATION, Strange. Andrew Jackson. In 1796 he was elected to the House of Representatives from the new State of Tennessee. Here his turbulent and wilful disposition manifested itself in full force. During the next year he was promoted to the Senate, where he remained a year, without making a speech or casting a vote. He then resigned his seat, and returned home.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 54, p. 427.

3193. LEGISLATION suspended. "Eleven Years." Now commenced a new era. Many English kings had occasionally committed unconstitutional acts, but none had ever systematically attempted to make himself a despot, and to reduce the Parliament to a nullity. Such was the end which Charles distinctly proposed to himself. From March, 1629, to April, 1640, the houses were not convoked. Never in our history had there been an interval of eleven years between Parliament and Parliament. Only once had there been an interval of even half that length.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 81.

3194. LEGISLATION unintelligent. Stamp Act. [Of the Stamp Act, which occasioned the Revolutionary War,] Walpole says: "This famous bill, little understood here at that time, was less attended to." [Knight says there was] only a feeble debate and one division. It was passed in the House of Lords without a debate or division.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 17, p. 272.

3195. LETTER, Decoy. Washington. Washington had written a letter to . . . Lafayette, then in Virginia, which he caused to be intercepted. In the letter he remarked that he was pleased with the probability that Earl Cornwallis would fortify either Portsmouth or Old Point Comfort, for were he to fix upon Yorktown, from its great capabilities of defence, he might remain there snugly and unharmed, until a superior British fleet would relieve him with strong re-enforcements or embark him altogether. This fated letter quieted the apprehensions of the British commander-in-chief.—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 6.

3196. LETTER from Heaven. The Pope's. [The pope aided his usurpation of the crown.] Pepin prepared to discharge his obligations to the see of Rome, of which he was reminded by a most extraordinary letter from heaven, written by Pope Stephen III., the successor of Zachary, in the character of St. Peter. Urged by this invocation, he passed the Alps, and compelled the King of the Lombards to evacuate the greater part of his territories. His conquests put him in possession of a great part of Italy.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 2, p. 60.

3197. LETTERS, Civilization by. Germans. The Germans in the age of Tacitus were unacquainted with the use of letters; and the use of letters is the principal circumstance that distinguishes a civilized people from a herd of savages, incapable of knowledge or reflection. Without an artificial help the memory soon dissipates or corrupts the ideas intrusted to her charge; and the nobler faculties of the mind, no longer supplied with models or with materials, gradually forget their powers; the judgment becomes feeble and lethargic, the imagination languid or irregular.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 257.

3198. LETTERS, Mystery of. Captain John Smith. [When a prisoner in the hands of the Indians] he managed to write a letter to his countrymen, telling them of his captivity and their peril [from attack], asking certain articles, and requesting that those bearing the note should be thoroughly frightened before their return. This letter, which seemed to have such mysterious power of carrying intelligence to a distance, was not lost on the Indians, who dreaded the writer more than ever. When the warriors bearing the epistle arrived at Jamestown and found everything precisely as Smith had said, their terror and amazement knew no bounds; . . . all thought of attacking the settlement was given up.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 9, p. 100.

3200. LEVITY contrasted. French. A civil war was kindled in Paris, of which the object was the removal of the Cardinal Mazarin. The fortune and the power of this minister naturally excited envy, and gave rise to cabals to pull him down; and the maladministration of the finances, the distresses of the State, and the oppression of the people, by a variety of new taxes, were sufficient to render these discontents universal. The Parliament, which saw edicts pronounced for taxes, without being, as usual, confirmed by them, expressed an open and violent disapprobation of Mazarin's measures. . . . The gay humor of the French, that spirit of levity which turns everything into ridicule, was never more conspicuous than in this war—a strong contrast to the temper that characterized those civil commotions, which almost, at this very time, had drowned England in blood. The grievances of the English prompted to a serious, a gloomy, and a desperate resistance, which embroiled the whole nation, and ended in the destruction of the constitution. The grievances of the French kindled the civil war of the Fronde, but afforded to this volatile people nothing more than the occasion of an agreeable confusion, and a fit subject for lampoons and ballads. The Parisians marched out to attack the royal army adorned with plumes of feathers and fine nose-gays; and when the regiment of the Coadjutor de Retz, who was nominal Archbishop of Corinth, was defeated by the Royalists, they called this engagement the first epistle to the Corinthians. The women had as active a share in these proceedings as the men; and the Duchess of Longueville actually prevailed on the great Turenne to leave the king's party, and revolt with his army to that of the rebels.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 34, p. 454.

3201. LEWDNESS, Habitual. Charles II. He did not merely indulge his passions; his neck bowed to the yoke of lewdness. He was attached to women, not from love, for he had no jealousy, and was regardless of infidelities; nor entirely from debauch, but from the pleasure of living near them, and sauntering in their company. His delight—such is the record of the royalist Evelyn—was in “concubines, and cattle of that sort;” and up to the last week of his life he spent his time in dissoluteness and listening to love-songs.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 11.

3202. LIAR, Proverbial. Reign of James II. Richard Talbot . . . had long before earned the nickname of Lying Dick Talbot; and at Whitehall any wild fiction was commonly designated as one of Dick Talbot's truths. He now daily proved that he was well entitled to this unenviable reputation. Indeed, in him mendacity was almost a disease. He would, after giving orders for the dismissal of English officers, take them into his closet, assure them of his confidence and friendship, and implore Heaven to confound him, sink him, blast him, if he did not take good care of their interests. Sometimes those to whom he had thus perjured himself learned, before the day closed, that he had cashiered them.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 134.

3203. LIBEL, Trials for. William Hone. The three trials of William Hone are among the most remarkable in our [British] constitutional history. They produced more distinct effects upon the temper of the country than any public proceedings of that time. [They taught the government that the diffusion of knowledge is the best corrective for a seditious and irreligious press. William Hone was a bookseller, who vended his wares in a little shop in the Old Bailey. On the 18th of December, 1817, he is brought for trial to Guildhall as a libeller. He had written a series of political satires. He was a well-read man, of remarkable ability, but he made a financial failure of every enterprise which he undertook. His clothes were threadbare. And being too poor to hire counsel, he plead for himself before the jury, and defended himself against the prosecution by the attorney-general. He was charged with writing a parody on the Catechism, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments. The offence was a libel. Hone read in defence parodies, written by authors, from Martin Luther to the editor of Blackwood's Magazine. He was acquitted. The lord chief-justice was mortified at his acquittal.] He swore that, at whatever cost, he would preside in court next day himself, so that conviction might be certain. [He was charged with writing] a profane libel on the Litany. [The jury acquitted him. The lord chief-justice the next day brought him to answer to an indictment for] publishing a parody on the creed of St. Athanasius, called “The Sincurest's Creed.” [Hone was again acquitted. He became very popular with the masses, and his writings had an immense sale.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 5, p. 86.

3204. LIBERALITY, Cloak of. Commodus. [The infamous Roman emperor.] To divert the public envy, Cleander, under the emperor's name, erected baths, porticos, and places of exercise, for the use of the people. He flattered himself that the Romans, dazzled and amused by this apparent liberality, would be less affected by the bloody scenes which were daily exhibited; that they would forget the death of Byrrhus, a senator to whose superior merit the late emperor had granted one of his daughters; and that they would forgive the execution of Arrius Antoninus, the last representative of the name and virtues of the Antonines.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4, p. 109.

3205. LIBERALITY in Opinions. John Wesley. [When Wesley was eighty-six years of age he boasted that the Methodist Church] “requires of its members no conformity, either in opinions or modes of worship, but barely this one thing, to fear God and work righteousness.”—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 388.

3206. LIBERALITY uncertain. Charles I. He relied, indeed, chiefly, for pecuniary aid, on the munificence of his opulent adherents. Many of these mortgaged their land, pawned their jewels, and broke up their silver charges and christening bowls in order to assist him. But experience has fully proved that the voluntary liberality of individuals, even in times of the greatest excitement, is a poor financial resource when compared with severe and methodical taxation, which presses on the willing and unwilling alike.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 106.

3207. LIBERTIES demanded. Magna Charta. A charter very favorable to the liberties of the people, and tending to abridge the power of the sovereign in many capital articles, had been granted by Henry I. A copy of this charter, which had never been followed by any substantial effect, came into the possession of Langton, who, in a conference with some of the principal barons, proposed that, on the ground of these concessions from his predecessor, they should insist that John should grant a solemn confirmation and ratification of their liberties and privileges. The barons bound themselves with an oath to support their claims by a vigorous and steady perseverance. An application was drawn up and presented to the sovereign, who, unwilling to yield and yet unable to refuse, appealed to the holy see. The pope [Innocent III.] had now an interest to support his vassal, and he wrote instantly to England, requiring by his supreme authority that all confederacies among the barons which tended to disturb the peace of the kingdom should be immediately put an end to. This requisition met with its just disregard. The associated barons had taken the most effectual measures to enforce their claims. They had assembled an army of 2000 knights, and a very numerous body of foot. With these forces they surrounded the residence of the court, which was then at Oxford, and transmitting to the king a scroll of the chief articles of their demand, they were answered, that he had solemnly sworn never to comply with any one of them. They proceeded immediately to hostilities, laid siege to Northampton, took the town of Bedford, and marched to London, where they were received with the acclamations of all ranks of the people. The King [John], who found his partisans daily abandoning him, began now to talk in a more submissive strain. He offered first to submit all differences to the pope, and this being peremptorily refused, he at length acquainted the confederates that it was his supreme pleasure to grant all their demands. At Runnymede, between Staines and Windsor, a spot which will be deemed sacred to the latest posterity, a solemn conference was held between John and the assembled barons of England, when, after a very short debate, the king signed and sealed that great charter, which is at this day the foundation and bulwark of English liberty—MAGNA CHARTA.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 8, p. 142.

3208. LIBERTIES lost. Massachusetts Colony. Sir Edmund Andros had been . . . appointed royal governor of all New England. His commission ought to have been entitled AN ARTICLE FOR THE DESTRUCTION OF COLONIAL LIBERTY. . . . The scarlet-coated despot landed at Boston on the 20th of December [1686], and at once began the work of demolishing the cherished institutions of the people. . . . Nothing might be printed without his [censor's] sanction. Popular representation was abolished. Voting by ballot was prohibited. Town meetings were forbidden. . . . The public schools were allowed to go to ruin. Men were arrested without warrant of law. . . . Thus did Massachusetts lose her liberty.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 15, p. 146.

3209. LIBERTIES unprotected. Reign of James II. In Ireland . . . panic spread fast among the English when they found that the viceroy [Lord Clarendon], their fellow-countryman and fellow-Protestant, was unable to extend to them the protection which they had expected from him. They began to know by bitter experience what it is to be a subject caste. They were harassed by the natives with accusations of treason and sedition. This Protestant had corresponded with Monmouth; that Protestant had said something disrespectful of the king four or five years ago, when the Exclusion Bill was under discussion; and the evidence of the most infamous of mankind was ready to substantiate every charge. The lord-lieutenant expressed his apprehension that, if these practices were not stopped, there would soon be at Dublin a reign of terror similar to that which he had seen in London, when every man held his life and honor at the mercy of Oates and Bedloe.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 129.

3210. LIBERTINE, The aged. Louis XV. Libertinage must be observed in an old man, to learn all its baseness. It takes the experience and daring hardihood of sensual age to be thoroughly depraved. . . . In the old voluptuary sensuality springs from infidelity in the moral existence. . . . The absolute King of France, now that he was growing old, abandoned himself to unbounded dissoluteness, and while he trembled before the unknown future, and dared not hear death named, he filled his remaining days with lewd pleasure, in which Richelieu, a profligate of seventy-two, was his counsellor.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 48.

3211. LIBERTY, Celebration of. Paris. [In 1790] it was resolved that the anniversary of the taking of the Bastille should be honored by a magnificent festival in the Champ de Mars—a grand federation, to which deputies should come from every one of the eighty-three departments of France. To prepare an immense amphitheatre for this gathering, . . . 12,000 workmen were employed. But they worked too slowly. All Paris then went forth to dig and to move earth—all classes, men and women, coming in the early morning . . . and returning home by torchlight. [Three hundred thousand persons were present on the 14th of July, seated on the grass, in the midst of a pouring rain. All swore to be faithful to the nation, the law, and the king. The king swore to maintain the constitution.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 10, p. 188.

3212. LIBERTY, Champion for. Lafayette. In spite of the remonstrances of England, America, and the friends of liberty everywhere, Lafayette remained a prisoner. To every demand for his liberation, the Austrian Government replied, with its usual stupidity, that the liberty of Lafayette was incompatible with the safety of the governments of Europe. He owed his liberation, at length, to General Bonaparte, and it required all his great authority to procure it. When Lafayette was presented to Napoleon to thank him for his interference, the First Consul said to him: "I don't know what the devil you have done to the Austrians, but it cost them a mighty struggle to let you go."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 484.

3213. LIBERTY, Cloak of. Criminals. [During the Reign of Terror the] enthusiastic and noble-hearted Madame Roland was led to the scaffold. . . . On passing before the statue of Liberty, which was erected at the Place de la Révolution, she apostrophized it in the memorable words, "O Liberty! what crimes are committed in thy name!"—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 27, § 4.

3214. LIBERTY, Defence of. English in Ireland. [James II. sought the overthrow of Protestantism.] Already the designs of the court began gradually to unfold themselves. A royal order came from Whitehall for disarming the population. This order [the viceroy in Ireland] Tyrconnel strictly executed as respected the English. Though the country was infested by predatory bands, a Protestant gentleman could scarcely obtain permission to keep a brace of pistols. The native peasantry, on the other hand, were suffered to retain their weapons.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 128.

3215. LIBERTY, Delusive. Romans. The infatuated Romans now believed themselves a free people, since they had no longer to fight for their liberty. It was the policy of Augustus to keep up this favorable delusion, by extraordinary marks of indulgence and munificence. He gratified the people by continually amusing them with their favorite games and spectacles; he affected an extreme regard for all the ancient popular customs; he pretended the utmost deference for the Senate; he re-established the Comitia, which the internal commotions of the government had prevented from being regularly held; he flattered the people with the ancient right of electing their own magistrates; if he presented candidates, it was only to give a simple recommendation, under reservation that they should be judged worthy by the people, and the people, on their part, could not but regard as the most certain symptom of desert there commendation of so gracious a prince. It was in this manner that Augustus, by the retention of all those empty but ancient appendages of liberty, concealed the form of that arbitrary monarchy which he determined to maintain.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 476.

3216. LIBERTY, Devotion to. Lafayette. By the time he had left America, at the close of the war, he had expended in the service of Congress 700,000 francs—a free gift to the cause of liberty. One of the most pleasing circumstances of Lafayette's residence in America was the affectionate friendship which existed between himself and General Washington. He looked up to Washington as to a father as well as a chief, and Washington regarded him with a tenderness truly paternal. Lafayette named his eldest son George Washington, and never omitted any opportunity to testify his love and veneration for the illustrious American. Franklin, too, was much attached to the youthful enthusiast, and privately wrote to General Washington, asking him, for the sake of the young and anxious wife of the marquis, not to expose his life except in an important and decisive engagement.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 479.

3217. LIBERTY in Disguise. Barbarians civilized. The western countries were civilized by the same hands which subdued them. As soon as the barbarians were reconciled to obedience, their minds were opened to any new impressions of knowledge and politeness. The language of Virgil and Cicero, though with some inevitable mixture of corruption, was so universally adopted in Africa, Spain, Gaul, Britain, and Panonia, that the faint traces of the Punic or Celtic idioms were preserved only in the mountains, or among the peasants. Education and study insensibly inspired the natives of those countries with the sentiments of Romans; and Italy gave fashions, as well as laws, to her Latin provincials.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 45.

3218. LIBERTY, Emblem of. Liberty Pole. A.D. 1770. [After three repulses the British soldiers cut down the citizens' pole in New York.] The Sons of Liberty, purchasing a piece of land near the junction of Broadway and Bowery, erected a Liberty Pole, strongly guarded by iron bands and bars, deeply sunk into the earth, and inscribed "Liberty and Property."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 43.

3219. LIBERTY endangered. Fugitive Slave Laws. It allowed the personal liberty of a man to be peremptorily decided by a United States commissioner, acting with absolute power and without appeal. For a claim exceeding $20 in value, every citizen has the right to a trial by jury; but by this law the body, the life, the very soul of a man, possibly a free-born citizen, might be consigned to perpetual enslavement on the fallible judgment of a single official. . . . The commissioner, . . . in the event of his remanding the alleged fugitive to slavery, received a fee of $10, and if he adjudged him to be free, only $5.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 98.

3220. LIBERTY, Enthusiasm for. Lafayette. December, 1776. When [Deane,] the American commissioner, told Lafayette plainly that the credit of his government was too low to furnish the volunteers [from France] a transport, "Then," said the young man, "I will purchase one myself." . . . At his own cost he bought and secretly freighted the Victory, which was to carry himself, the veteran De Kalb, and twelve other French officers to America. . . . At the age of nineteen it seemed to him an amusement to be presented to the king against whom he was going to fight.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 16.

3221. LIBERTY, Government for. Roman. [When the consuls were elected] they immediately exercised an act of jurisdiction, by the manumission of a slave, who was brought before them for that purpose; and the ceremony was intended to represent the celebrated action of the elder Brutus, the author of liberty and of the consulship, when he admitted among his fellow-citizens the faithful Vindex, who had revealed the conspiracy of the Tarquins.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17, p. 111.

3222. LIBERTY lost. Athenians. The aversion to restraint assumes the same external appearance with the love of liberty; but this criterion will enable us to distinguish the reality from the counterfeit. In fact, the spirit of liberty and a general corruption of manners are so totally adverse and repugnant to each other, that it is utterly impossible they should have even the most transitory existence in the same age and nation. When Thrasybulus delivered Athens from the thirty tyrants, liberty came too late; the manners of the Athenians were irretrievably corrupted; licentiousness, avarice, and debauchery had induced a mortal disease. When Antigonos and the Achaean States restored liberty to the Spartans, they could not enjoy or preserve it; the spirit of liberty was utterly extinct, for they were a corrupted people. The liberty of Rome could not be recovered by the death of Cæsar; it had gone forever with her virtuous manners.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 6, p. 465.

3223. LIBERTY, Love of. Unconquerable. Such was the result of the Flemish war—a memorable struggle, as proving for the first time that it was possible for a small feudal State, if well organized and animated by a fervent love of liberty, to resist successfully the will of a despotic suzerain, and to humble the pride of a great military kingdom.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 9, § 15.

3224. LIBERTY, Martyr for. Sir Henry Vane. [Executed by Charles II., A.D. 1662.] "Blessed be God!" exclaimed he, as he bared his neck for the axe, "I have kept a conscience void of offence till this day, and have not deserted the righteous cause for which I suffer." That cause was democratic liberty; in the history of the world he was the first martyr to the principle of the paramount power of the people. . . . The manner of his death was the admiration of his times.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 11.

3225. LIBERTY of Mountaineers. By Arms. [In Gaul.] Of the native barbarians, the Celtiberians were the most powerful, as the Cantabrians and Asturians proved the most obstinate. Confident in the strength of their mountains, they were the last who submitted to the arms of Rome, and the first who threw off the yoke of the Arabs.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 22.

3226. LIBERTY, Personal. Habeas Corpus. The famous act of Habeas Corpus was likewise the work of this Parliament—one of the chief securities of English liberty. By this excellent statute, the nature of which we shall hereafter more fully consider, it is prohibited to send any one to a prison beyond seas; no judge, under severe penalties, must refuse a prisoner a writ of habeas corpus by which the jailer is directed to produce in court the body of the prisoner, and to certify the cause of his detainer and imprisonment; every prisoner must be indicted the first term after his commitment, and brought to trial in the subsequent term. A law of this kind, so favorable to the liberty of the subject, takes place in no government except that of Britain, and even of itself is a sufficient argument of the superiority of our constitution to that of all other governments.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30, p. 422.

3227. LIBERTY, Proclamation of. Abraham Lincoln. On the 1st of January, 1863, the President issued one of the most important documents of modern times—THE EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION. The war had been begun with no well-defined intention on the part of the government to free the slaves of the South. But the President and the Republican party looked with disfavor on the institution of slavery; during the progress of the war the sentiment of abolition had grown with great rapidity in the North; and when at last it became a military necessity to strike a blow at the labor-system of the Southern States, the step was taken with but little hesitancy or opposition. Thus, after an existence of two hundred and forty-four years, the institution of African slavery in the United States was swept away.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 65, p. 511.

3228. LIBERTY protected. Eleventh Century. At a period when the feudal oppression was at its height and the condition of the commonalty, through the greater part of Europe, was in the lower stage of degradation, one of these small Christian kingdoms exhibited the example of a people who shared the sovereignty with the prince, and wisely limited his arbitrary government by constitutional restraints. This was the kingdom of Aragon, in which not only the representatives of the towns had a seat in the Cortes, or national assemblies, but an officer was elected by the people, termed a Justiza, who was the supreme interpreter of the law, and whose recognized duty it was to protect the rights of the people against the encroachments of the crown. This officer, whose person was sacred, was chosen from among the commoners; he had a right to judge whether the royal edicts were agreeable to law before they could be carried into effect; and while the king's ministers were answerable to him for their conduct, he was responsible to the Cortes alone. This great officer had likewise the privilege of receiving, in the name of the people, the king's oath of coronation; and during this ceremony he held a naked sword, pointed at the breast of the sovereign, whom he thus addressed: "We, your equals, constitute you our sovereign, and we solemnly engage to obey your mandates on condition that you protect us in the enjoyment of our rights; if otherwise, not."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 7, p. 126.

3229. LIBERTY by Reaction. William the Conqueror. William, in short, through the whole of his reign, considered the English as a conquered nation. Under the Anglo-Saxon government the people had enjoyed a very considerable portion of freedom. The greater barons, perhaps even some of the landholders, had their share in the government, by their place in the Wittenagemot, or assembly of the States. Under William the rights and privileges of all the orders of the State seem to have been annihilated and overpowered by the weight of the crown; but this very circumstance, unfavorable as it may appear to the people's liberties, was, in fact, the very cause of the subsequent freedom of the English constitution. It was the excessive power of the crown that gave rise to a spirit of union among the people in all their efforts to resist it; and from the want of that spirit of union in the other feudal kingdoms of the continent—a spirit which was not excited in them by a total extinction of their liberties as it was in England by the whole career of William the Conqueror—we can easily account for the great difference at this day between their constitutions and ours, with respect to political freedom.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 8, p. 133.

3230. LIBERTY in Religion. James II. He had, as supreme ordinary, put forth directions, charging the clergy of the establishment to abstain from touching in their discourses on controverted points of doctrine. Thus, while sermons in defence of the Roman Catholic religion were preached on every Sunday and holiday within the precincts of the royal palaces, the Church of the State, the Church of the great majority of the nation, was forbidden to explain and vindicate her own principles. The spirit of the whole clerical order rose against this injustice.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 84.

3231. LIBERTY, Religious. Colony of Maryland. The foundation of Maryland was peacefully and happily laid. Within six months it had advanced more than Virginia had in as many years. . . . Every other country in the world had persecuting laws. "I will not"—such was the oath of the Governor of Maryland—"I will not by myself or any other, directly or indirectly, molest any person professing to believe in Jesus Christ, for or in respect of religion.”—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 7.

3232. LIBERTY secured. Magna Charta. With respect to the people, the following were the principal clauses calculated for their benefit. It was ordained that all the privileges and immunities granted by the king [John I.] to his barons should be also granted by the barons to their vassals. That one weight and one measure should be observed throughout the kingdom. That merchants should be allowed to transact all business without being exposed to any arbitrary tolls or impositions; that they, and all freemen, should be allowed to go out of the kingdom and return to it at pleasure. London, and all cities and boroughs, shall preserve their ancient liberties, immunities, and free customs. Aids or taxes shall not be required of them, except by the consent of the great council. No towns or individuals shall be obliged to make or support bridges, unless it has been the immemorial custom. The goods of every freeman shall be disposed of according to his will or testament; if he die intestate, his heirs at law shall succeed to them. The king's courts of justice shall be stationary, and shall no longer follow his person; they shall be open to every one, and justice shall no longer be bought, refused, or delayed by them. The sheriffs shall be incapacitated to determine pleas of the crown, and shall not put any person upon his trial from rumor or suspicion alone, but upon the evidence of lawful witnesses. No freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, or dispossessed of his free tenements or liberties, or outlawed or banished, or any way hurt or injured, unless by the legal judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land; and all who suffered otherwise in this and the former reigns shall be restored to their rights and possessions. Every freeman shall be fined in proportion to his fault, and no fine shall be levied on him to his utter ruin.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 7, p. 149.

3233. LIBERTY of Speech denied. The Commons. [In 1593 the lord-keeper replied to the Commons in the name of the queen, when they asked for liberty of speech.] Privilege of speech is granted, but you must know what privilege you have: not to speak every one what he listeth, or what cometh into his brain to utter that; but your privilege is aye or no. Wherefore, Mr. Speaker, her Majesty's pleasure is, that if you perceive any idle heads, which will not stick to hazard their own estates, which will meddle with reforming the church and transforming the Commonwealth, and do exhibit any bills to such purpose, that you receive them not, until they be viewed and considered by those who it is fitter should consider of such things, and can better judge of them.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 17, p. 262.

3234. LIBERTY vs. Tyranny. Roman Senator Boethius. In the last gloomy season of Theodoric [the Gothic King of Italy] he indignantly felt that he was a slave; but as his master had only power over his life, he stood without arms and without fear against the face of an angry barbarian, who had been provoked to believe that the safety of the Senate was incompatible with his own. The Senator Albinus was accused and already convicted on the presumption of hoping, as it was said, the liberty of Rome. “If Albinus be criminal,” exclaimed the orator, “the Senate and myself are all guilty of the same crime. If we are innocent, Albinus is equally entitled to the protection of the laws.” These laws might not have punished the simple and barren wish of an unattainable blessing, but they would have shown less indulgence to the rash confession of Boethius, that, had he known of a conspiracy, the tyrant never should. The advocate of Albinus was soon involved in the danger and perhaps the guilt of his client.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39, p. 35.

3235. LIBERTY, Unexpected. George Washington. A.D. 1774. [Addressing a royal officer, he said:] “It is not the wish of that government [Massachusetts] or any other upon this continent, separately or collectively, to set up for independence; but none of them will ever submit to the loss of those rights and privileges without which life, liberty, and property are rendered totally insecure.”—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 13.

3236. LIBERTY and Union. Sources of. The Netherlands divide with England the glory of having planted the first colonies in the United States; they also divide the glory of having set the examples of public freedom. If England gave our fathers the idea of a popular representation, the United Provinces were their model of a federal union.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

3237. LIBERTY by Vigilance. British. In the Middle Ages the state of society was widely different. Rarely and with great difficulty did the wrongs of individuals come to the knowledge of the public. A man might be illegally confined during many months in the Castle of Carlisle or Norwich, and no whisper of the transaction might reach London. It is highly probable that the rack had been many years in use before the great majority of the nation had the least suspicion that it was ever employed. Nor were our ancestors by any means so much alive as we are to the importance of maintaining great general rules. We have been taught by long experience that we cannot, without danger, suffer any breach of the Constitution to pass unnoticed.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 31.

3238. LIBRARIES, Ancient. Arabian. In every city the productions of Arabic literature were copied and collected by the curiosity of the studious and the vanity of the rich. A private doctor refused the invitation of the sultan of Bochara because the carriage of his books would have required four hundred camels. The royal library of the Fatimites consisted of one hundred thousand manuscripts, elegantly transcribed and splendidly bound, which were lent, without jealousy or avarice, to the students of Cairo. Yet this collection must appear moderate, if we can believe that the Omniades of Spain had formed a library of six hundred thousand volumes, forty-four of which were employed in the mere catalogue. Their capital, Cordova, with the adjacent towns of Malaga, Almeria, and Murcia, had given birth to more than three hundred writers, and above seventy public libraries were opened in the cities of the Andalusian kingdom. The age of Arabian learning continued about five hundred years, till the great eruption of the Mooguls, and was coeval with the darkest and most slothful period of European annals; but since the sun of science has arisen in the West, it should seem that the Oriental studies have languished and declined.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 52, p. 302.

3239. LIBRARIES, Subscription. Benjamin Franklin. He invented the system of subscription libraries, and laid the foundation of one that was long the most considerable library in America.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 23.

3240. LIBRARY destroyed. Alexandria. Ptolemy Soter founded the famous library of Alexandria, that immense treasury of literature, which, in the time of his son Ptolemy Philadelphus, contained above one hundred thousand volumes. It was still enlarged by the succeeding monarchs of the same race, till it amounted, at length, as Strabo informs us, to seven hundred thousand volumes—a collection quite prodigious, when we consider the comparative labor and expense of amassing books before the invention of printing, and since that era. This immense library was burnt to ashes in the war which Julius Cæsar waged with the inhabitants of Alexandria. Adjoining to this was a smaller library, which escaped the conflagration at that time, and which became, in the course of ages, very considerable; but, as if fate had opposed the progress and continuance of Egyptian literature, this second library of Alexandria was burnt, about eight hundred years afterward, when the Saracens took possession of Egypt. The books were taken out by order of the Caliph Omar, and used, for six months, in supplying the fires of the public baths. "If these books," said Omar, "contain nothing but what is in the Alcoran, they are of no use; if they contain anything not in it, they are of no consequence to salvation; and if anything contrary to it, they are damnable, and ought not to be suffered."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 5, p. 192.

3241. ———. Constantinople. [The royal college of Constantinople was burnt in the reign of Leo the Isaurian. In the pompous style of the age, the president] of that foundation was named the Sun of Science; his twelve associates, the professors in the different arts and faculties, were the twelve signs of the zodiac; a library of thirty-six thousand five hundred volumes was open to their inquiries; and they could show an ancient manuscript of Homer, on a roll of parchment one hundred and twenty feet in length, the intestines, as it was fabled, of a prodigious serpent. But the seventh and eighth centuries were a period of discord and darkness; the library was burnt, the college was abolished, the Iconoclasts are represented as the foes of antiquity; and a savage ignorance and contempt of letters has disgraced the princes of the Heracleian and Isaurian dynasties.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53, p. 378.

3242. LICENTIOUSNESS authorized. Mahomet. In his adventures with Zeineb, the wife of Zeid, and with Mary, an Egyptian captive, the amorous prophet forgot the interest of his reputation. At the house of Zeid, his freedman and adopted son, he beheld, in a loose undress, the beauty of Zeineb, and burst forth into an ejaculation of devotion and desire. The servile, or grateful freedman understood the hint, and yielded without hesitation to the love of his benefactor. But as the filial relation had excited some doubt and scandal, the Angel Gabriel descended from heaven to ratify the deed, to annul the adoption, and gently to reprove the apostle for distrusting the indulgence of his God. One of his wives, Hafsa, the daughter of Omar, surprised him on her own bed, in the embrace of [Mary] his Egyptian captive; she promised secrecy and forgiveness; he swore that he would renounce the possession of Mary. Both parties forgot their engagements; and Gabriel again descended with a chapter of the Koran, to absolve him from his oath, and to exhort him freely to enjoy his captives and concubines, without listening to the clamors of his wives. In a solitary retreat of thirty days he labored, alone with Mary, to fulfil the commands of the angel. When his love and revenge were satiated, he summoned to his presence his eleven wives, reproached their disobedience and indiscretion, and threatened them with a sentence of divorce, both in this world and in the next; a dreadful sentence, since those who had ascended the bed of the prophet were forever excluded from the hope of a second marriage.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 150.

3243. LICENTIOUSNESS, Fashionable. Milan. A.D. 1797. [Napoleon had conquered Italy and Austria, and was the most famous man in Europe. After the war, with Josephine he resided for a time at Milan.] Every conceivable temptation was at this time presented to entice Napoleon into habits of licentiousness. . . . The corruption of those days of infidelity was such that the ladies were jealous of Josephine's exclusive influence over her illustrious spouse, and they exerted all their powers of fascination to lead him astray.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLÉON B., vol. 1, ch. 9.

3244. LICENTIOUSNESS, Literary. John Dryden. Not a line tending to make virtue contemptible or to inflame licentious desire would thenceforward have proceeded from his pen. The truth unhappily is, that the dramas which he wrote after his pretended conversion are in no respect less impure or profane than those of his youth. Even when he professed to translate he constantly wandered from his originals in search of images which, if he had found them in his originals, he ought to have shunned. What was bad became worse in his versions. What was innocent contracted a taint from passing through his mind. He made the grossest satires of Juvenal more gross, interpolated loose descriptions in the tales of Boccaccio, and polluted the sweet and limpid poetry of the Georgics with filth which would have moved the loathing of Virgil.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 184.

3245. LICENTIOUSNESS, Pontifical. Clement VI. Clement was ill-endowed with the virtues of a priest; he possessed, however, the spirit and magnificence of a prince, whose liberal hand distributed benefices and kingdoms with equal facility. Under his reign Avignon was the seat of pomp and pleasure; in his youth he had surpassed the licentiousness of a baron; and the palace—nay, the bed-chamber of the pope, was adorned or polluted by the visits of his female favorites.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 66, p. 294.

3246. LICENTIOUSNESS prevalent. Reign of Charles II. [After the overthrow of the Puritans] men flew to frivolous amusements and to criminal pleasures with the greediness which long and enforced abstinence naturally produces. Thomas Hobbes had . . . relaxed the obligations of morality, and degraded religion into a mere affair of state. Hobbism soon became an almost essential part of the character of the fine gentleman. All the lighter kinds of literature were deeply tainted by the prevailing licentiousness. Poetry stooped to be the pander of every low desire. Ridicule, instead of putting guilt and error to the blush, turned her formidable shafts against innocence and truth.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 169.

3247. LICENTIOUSNESS, Regal. Louis XV. When the personal attractions [of Marchioness of Pompadour] began to wane, she had the address to maintain her empire over the king, by sanctioning, if she did not actually suggest, the infamous establishment called the Parc aux Cerfs, which was neither more nor less than a seraglio, after the fashion of the Oriental monarchs, formed by Louis in a beautiful retreat belonging to his mistress near Versailles. The favorite thus secured herself against the rise of any dangerous rival who might dispute her supremacy; but the spectacle offered thenceforth by the French court was a flagrant outrage to every principle of public decency, and produced results in the highest degree prejudicial to the royal authority.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 24, § 1.

3248. LICENTIOUSNESS, Ruinous. Dagobert. The private life of Dagobert was marked by gross licentiousness. He is said to have had, at the same time, three queens-consort, besides numerous mistresses. These excesses, added to the lavish expenditure of his court, in the course of a few years exhausted his revenues; and in order to raise money, he began to confiscate the estates of nobles who offended him, imposed exorbitant taxes, revoked fiefs which had been granted in perpetuity, and exacted heavy contributions from rich churches and abbeys.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 4, § 7.

3249. LIFE, Aim in. Diogenes. Diogenes held that the practice of virtue was man's chief end of existence; that as the body is strengthened by active labor, the mind is invigorated and kept in health by a constant tenor of active virtue; that even the contempt of pleasure is a solid and rational pleasure; that self-applause is a sufficient reward to the wise man; while glory, honors, and wealth are only the bait of fools; that the consummation of folly is to be loud in the praise of virtue without practising it; that the gods refuse the prayers of man often from compassion.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 269.

3250. LIFE, Ambition of. John Milton's. The ruling idea of Milton's life, and the key to his mental history, is his resolve to produce a great poem. Not that the aspiration in itself is singular, for it is probably shared by every young poet in his turn. As every clever schoolboy is destined by himself or his friends to become lord-chancellor, and every private in the French army carries in his haversack the baton of a marshal, so it is a necessary ingredient of the dream on Parnassus, that it should embody itself in a form of surpassing brilliance. What distinguishes Milton from the crowd of young ambition, audax juvenis, is the constancy of resolve. He not only nourished through manhood the dream of youth, keeping under the importunate instincts which carry off most ambitions in middle life into the pursuit of place, profit, honor—the thorns which spring up and smother the wheat—but carried out his dream in its integrity in old age. He formed himself for this achievement, and for no other. Study at home, travel abroad, the arena of political controversy, the public service, the practice of the domestic virtues, were so many parts of the schooling which was to make a poet.—PATTISON'S MILTON, ch. 13.

3251. LIFE, Changes in. Samuel Houston. His separation from his friends at the steamboat was a touching scene. He was a young man, for he had not passed his thirty-fifth year. He was in the vigor and strength of early manhood. He had filled the highest stations, and been crowned with the highest honors his State could give. They knew the history of his early life, and they felt pride in his character. He was literally a man of the people, and they looked forward to his future advancement with all the pride of kindred feelings. A storm had suddenly burst upon his path. [In an unhappy married life of three months. He returned to the Cherokee Indians. He remained three years. Became the deliverer of Texas.] But it was a voluntary exile from scenes which only harrowed his feelings while he stayed, and the Providence which had shaped out his future life was leading him in a mysterious way through the forests to found a new empire. Let those who laugh at a Divine Providence, which watches over its chosen instruments, sneer as they read this; they are welcome to their creed.—LESTER'S HOUSTON, p. 42.

3252. ———. Captain Cook. At thirteen (which was in the year 1741) he was apprenticed to a dealer in dry goods near one of the seaport towns of Yorkshire, and passed his time in carrying home parcels and waiting upon customers. He did not like this occupation; and the sea, the open sea, was ever before his eyes, alluring him to a life of adventure. His father dying, he persuaded his master to give up his indentures, and restore him to liberty. He hastened to the port, and binding himself apprentice to the owner of a coal-vessel, he went on board in the capacity of cabin-boy. Certainly, if a dandy naval officer had cast his eyes upon this coal-blackened cabin-boy, and had been told that that boy would die a post-captain in the royal navy of Great Britain, he would have laughed the prediction to scorn.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 379.

3253. LIFE attests Character. Humble. On the decease of Zeno, the emperor, Ariadne, the daughter, and mother, and the widow of an emperor, gave her hand and the imperial title to Anastasius, an aged domestic of the palace, who survived his elevation above twenty-seven years, and whose character is attested by the acclamation of the people, "Reign as you have lived!"—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39, p. 5.

3254. LIFE, Choice in. Parable. The Arabs express this by a parable that incarnates, as is their wont, the Word in the recital. King Nimrod, say they, one day summoned into his presence his three sons. He ordered to be set before them three urns under seal. One of the urns was of gold, the other of amber, the third of clay. The king bade the eldest of his sons to choose among these urns that which appeared to him to contain the treasure of greatest price. The eldest chose the vase of gold, on which was written the word Empire; he opened it, and found it full of blood. The second took the vase of amber, whereon was written the word Glory; he opened it, and found it full of the ashes of men who had made a great sensation in the world. The third son took the only remaining vase, the clay one; he opened it, and found it quite empty; but on the bottom the potter had inscribed the name of God. "Which of these vases weighs the most?" asked the king of his courtiers. The men of ambition replied it was the vase of gold; the poets and conquerors, that it was the amber one; the sages, that it was the empty vase, because a single letter of the name of God was of more weight than the entire globe. We are of the opinion of the sages. We believe that the greatest things are great but in the proportion of divinity which they contain.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 39.

3255. LIFE, City. Samuel Johnson. I suggested a doubt, that if I were to reside in London, the exquisite zest with which I relished it in occasional visits might go off, and I might grow tired of it. JOHNSON: "Why, sir, you find no man, at all intellectual, who is willing to leave London. No, sir; when a man is tired of London, he is tired of life; for there is in London all that life can afford."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 345.

3256. LIFE degraded. Romans. Only a little above the slaves stood the lower class, who formed the vast majority of the freeborn inhabitants of the Roman Empire. They were, for the most part, beggars and idlers, familiar with the grossest indignities of an unscrupulous dependence. Despising a life of honest industry, they asked only for bread and the games of the circus, and were ready to support any government, even the most despotic, if it would supply these needs. They spent their mornings in lounging about the Forum, or in dancing attendance at the levees of patrons. . . . They spent their afternoons and evenings in gossiping at the Public Baths, in listlessly enjoying the polluted plays of the theatre, or looking with fierce thrills of delighted horror at the bloody sports of the arena. At night they crept up to their miserable garrets in the sixth and seventh stories.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 1, p. 3.

3257. LIFE delusive. Edward Gibbon. Twenty hours before his death Mr. Gibbon happened to fall into a conversation not uncommon with him, on the probable duration of his life. He said that he thought himself a good life for ten, twelve, or perhaps twenty years. About six he ate the wing of a chicken and drank three glasses of Madeira. After dinner he became very uneasy and impatient, complained a good deal, and appeared so weak that his servant was alarmed.—MORRISON'S GIBBON, ch. 10.

3258. LIFE, Destruction of. Crusades. In these two unfortunate expeditions of Lewis IX., it is computed that there perished 100,000 men: 50,000 had perished under Frederic Barbarossa, 300,000 under Philip Augustus and Richard Cœur de Lion; 200,000 in the time of John de Brienne; and 160,000 had before been sacrificed in Asia, besides those that perished in the expedition of Constantinople. Thus, without mentioning a crusade in the North, and that afterward to be taken notice of against the Albigenes, it is a reasonable computation to estimate that two millions of Europeans, in these expeditions, were buried in the East.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 10, p. 165.

3259. LIFE, Farewell to. John Quincy Adams. The last words of John Quincy Adams are said to have been, "This is the last of earth; I am content."—AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA, "JOHN QUINCY ADAMS."

3260. LIFE forfeited. By Neglect. Edward Gibbon's . . . malady was dropsy, complicated with other disorders. He had most strangely neglected a very dangerous symptom for upward of thirty years, not only having failed to take medical advice about it, but even avoiding all allusion to it to bosom friends like Lord Sheffield. But longer concealment was now impossible. He sent for the eminent surgeon Farquhar. . . . Thus, in consequence of his own strange self-neglect and imprudence, was extinguished one of the most richly-stored minds that ever lived. Occurring when it did, so near the last summons, Gibbon's prospective hope of continued life "for ten, twelve, or twenty years" is harshly pathetic, and full of that irony which mocks the vain cares of men. But, truly, his forecast was not irrational if he had not neglected ordinary precautions.—MORRISON'S GIBBON, ch. 10.

3261. LIFE, Future. American Indians. The dying chief sometimes arrayed himself in the garments in which he was to be buried; . . . and when he had given up the ghost, he was placed by his wigman in a sitting posture, as if to show that though life was spent, the principle of being was not gone; and in that posture he was buried. Everywhere in America this posture was adopted at burials.—BANCROFT'S HIST. U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

3262. LIFE, Impediments in. Samuel Johnson. His figure was large and well formed, and his countenance of the cast of an ancient statue; yet his appearance was rendered strange and somewhat uncouth by convulsive cramps, by the scars of that disemper which it was once imagined the royal touch could cure, and by a slovenly mode of dress. He had the use only of one eye; yet so much does mind govern and even supply the deficiency of organs, that his visual perceptions, as far as they extended, were uncommonly quick and accurate. So morbid was his temperament that he never knew the natural joy of a free and vigorous use of his limbs: when he walked, it was like the struggling gait of one in fetters; when he rode, he had no command or direction of his horse, but was carried as if in a balloon. That with his constitution and habits of life he should have lived seventy-five years is a proof that an inherent vivida vis is a powerful preservative of the human frame.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 565.

3263. LIFE, Indestructible. Animals. The Indian believes also of each individual animal that it possesses the mysterious, the indestructible principle of life; there is not a breathing thing but has its shade, which never can perish.—BANCROFT'S HIST. U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

3264. LIFE, Influence of. A Good. [A young man in a fit of anger struck out one of Lyeurgus' eyes with a stick. The offender was surrendered to him for punishment.] He took him into his house, but showed him no ill treatment either by word or action, only ordering him to wait upon him, instead of his usual servants and attendants. The youth, who was of an ingenuous disposition, without murmuring, did as he was commanded. Living in this manner with Lycurgus, and having an opportunity to observe the mildness and goodness of his heart, his strict temperance and indefatigable industry, he told his friends that Lycurgus was not that proud and severe man he might have been taken for, but, above all others, gentle and engaging in his behavior. This, then, was the chastisement, and this punishment he suffered, of a wild and headstrong young man to become a very modest and prudent citizen.—PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

3266. LIFE, Insignificant. Bibulus. Cæsar had touched the right point in congratulating Cicero on his military exploits. His friends in the Senate had been less delicate. Bibulus had been thanked for hiding from the Parthians. When Cicero had hinted his expectations [of receiving a triumph], the Senate had passed to the order of the day. "Cato," he wrote, "treats me scurvily. He gives me praise for justice, clemency, and integrity, which I did not want. What I did want he will not let me have. Cæsar promises me everything. Cato has given a twenty days' thanksgiving to Bibulus. Pardon me, if this is more than I can bear. But I am relieved from my worst fear. The Parthians have left Bibulus half alive."—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 20.

3267. LIFE lengthened. One Fourth. [Statistics show that between the years 1693 and 1790 the expectation of human life in England had increased one fourth, resulting from great social advancement, temporal prosperity, and from less frequent and less fatal epidemics.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 10, p. 58.

3268. LIFE, Measure of. Charles XII. Having read a Latin life of Alexander, some one asked him what he thought of that conqueror. "I think," said he, "that I should like to resemble him." "But," said his tutor, "Alexander lived only thirty-two years." "Ah," replied the prince, "and is not that enough when one has conquered kingdoms?" When his father heard of this reply, he said: "Here is a boy who will make a better king than I am, and who will go farther even than Gustavus the Great."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 433.

3269. LIFE, Miserable. Roman Slaves. At the lowest extreme of the social scale were millions of slaves, without family, without religion, without possessions, who had no recognized rights, and toward whom none had any recognized duties, passing normally from a childhood of degradation to a manhood of hardship and an old age of unpitied neglect.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, p. 2.

3270. LIFE neglected. Robert Burns. Robert Burns, in the course of nature, might yet have been living; but his short life was spent in toil and penury; and he died, in the prime of his manhood, miserable and neglected; and yet already a brave mausoleum shines over his dust, and more than one splendid monument has been reared in other places to his fame: the street where he languished in poverty is called by his name; the highest personages in our literature have been proud to appear as his commentators and admirers, and here is the sixth narrative of his Life that has been given to the world!—CARLYLE'S BURNS, p. 12.

3271. LIFE, Object in. Philosophy of Epicurus. It proposed . . . the attainment of a perfect tranquillity of mind. The term by which he marked the object of his philosophy contributed much to increase the number of his disciples. "The supreme happiness of man," said Epicurus, "consists in pleasure. To this centre tend all his desires; and this, however disguised, is the real object of all his actions. The purpose of philosophy is to teach whatever best conduces to those laws. Vice therefore was folly, and virtue the only true wisdom."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 279.

3272. LIFE, Opening in. Abraham Lincoln. When nineteen years old Abraham Lincoln, moved perhaps equally by the desire to earn an honest livelihood, in the shape of "ten dollars a month and found," and by curiosity to see more of the world, made a trip down the Mississippi to New Orleans in a flat-boat. He went in company with the son of the owner of the boat, who intrusted a valuable cargo to their care.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 1, p. 22.

3273. LIFE, Price of. Human. The national inequality established by the Franks, in their criminal proceedings, was the last insult and abuse of conquest. In the calm moments of legislation they solemnly pronounced that the life of a Roman was of smaller value than that of a barbarian. The Antrusion, a name expressive of the most illustrious birth or dignity among the Franks, was appreciated at the sum of six hundred pieces of gold; while the noble provincial, who was admitted to the king's table, might be legally murdered at the expense of three hundred pieces. Two hundred were deemed sufficient for a Frank of ordinary condition; but the meaner Romans were exposed to disgrace and danger by a trifling compensation of one hundred, or even fifty, pieces of gold.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 38, p. 594.

3274. LIFE, A protected. Washington's. [The Indians concentrated the aim of their rifles on him at Braddock's defeat, but he escaped injury. Sixty-four British officers were killed or wounded, and Washington was the only mounted officer left. A distinguished chief said] 'twas all in vain; a power mightier than we shielded him from harm. He cannot die in battle. . . . Listen! The Great Spirit protects that man, and guides his destinies; he will become the chief of nations. [At the battles of Princeton, Germantown, and Monmouth he was peculiarly exposed, yet uninjured.]—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 11.

3275. LIFE, Public. For Others. As Pelopidas . . . was departing for the army, his wife, who followed him to the door, besought him, with tears, to take care of himself; he answered: "My dear, private persons are to be advised to take care of themselves, but persons in a public character to take care of others."—PLUTARCH'S PELOPIDAS.

3276. LIFE, Purpose in. John Milton. A seeming idler, but really hard at work, in his father's house at Horton. The intimation which he had given of his purpose in the sonnet . . . had become, in 1641, "an inward prompting which grows daily upon me, that by labor and intent study, which I take to be my portion in this life, joined with the strong propensity of nature, I might perhaps leave something so written to after times as they should not willingly let it die."—PATTISON'S MILTON, ch. 2.

3277. ———. Peter Cooper. Cooper Institute is that evening school which Peter Cooper resolved to found as long ago as 1810, when he was a coach-maker's apprentice looking about in New York for a place where he could get instruction in the evening, but was unable to find it. Through all his career, as a cabinet-maker, grocer, manufacturer of glue, and iron-founder, he never lost sight of this object. If he had a fortunate year, or made a successful speculation, he was gratified, not that it increased his wealth, but because it brought him nearer to the realization of his dream.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 577.

3278. LIFE, Qualification for. Education. His son Alexander being then fourteen years of age, Philip invited Aristotle to reside in his court, and take charge of the prince's education. This was the greatest honor which a king could then bestow upon a man of learning. Aristotle accepted the invitation. He was received at court with the greatest honor, and Alexander became tenderly attached to his instructor. He said once that he honored Aristotle no less than his own father; for if to the one he owed his life, he owed to the other that which made life worth having.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 556.

3279. LIFE, A rational. Roman Emperor Alexander. [Alexander rose early; the first moments of the day were consecrated to private devotion, and his domestic chapel was filled with the images of those heroes who, by improving or reforming human life, had deserved the grateful reverence of posterity. But as he deemed the service of mankind the most acceptable worship of the gods, the greatest part of his morning hours was employed in his council, where he discussed public affairs and determined private causes with a patience and discretion above his years. The dryness of business was relieved by the charms of literature; and a portion of time was always set apart for his favorite studies of poetry, history, and philosophy. The works of Virgil and Horace, the republics of Plato and Cicero, formed his taste, enlarged his understanding, and gave him the noblest ideas of man and government. The exercises of the body succeeded to those of the mind; and Alexander, who was tall, active, and robust, surpassed most of his equals in the gymnastic arts. Refreshed by the use of the bath and a slight dinner, he resumed, with new vigor, the business of the day; and till the hour of supper, the principal meal of the Romans, he was attended by his secretaries, with whom he read and answered the multitude of letters, memorials, and petitions, that must have been addressed to the master of the greatest part of the world. His table was served with the most frugal simplicity; and whenever he was at liberty to consult his own inclination, the company consisted of a few select friends, men of learning and virtue, among whom Ulpian was constantly invited. Their conversation was familiar and instructive; and the pauses were occasionally enlivened by the recital of some pleasing composition, which supplied the place of the dancers, comedians, and even gladiators, so frequently summoned to the tables of the rich and luxurious Romans. The dress of Alexander was plain and modest, his demeanor courteous and affable; at the proper hours his palace was open to all his subjects, but the voice of a crier was heard, as in the Eleusinian mysteries, pronouncing the same salutary admonition: "Let none enter those holy walls, unless he is conscious of a pure and innocent mind."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6, p. 179.

3280. LIFE regulated. Stoics. The virtue of the Stoics was not a principle of tranquil and passive acquiescence; it was a state of continual, active, and vigorous exertion. It was the duty of man to exercise the faculties of his mind in acquainting himself with the nature, the causes, and the relations of every part of that universe which he sees around him, that he may truly understand his own place in it and the duties which he is destined and called on to fulfil. It is incumbent on man likewise to exercise his faculties in the discerning and distinguishing those things over which he has the power and control, and those which are beyond his power, and therefore ought not to be the objects of his care or his attention. All things whatever, according to the Stoics, fall under one or the other of these descriptions. To the class of things within our power belong our opinions, our desires, affections, endeavors, aversions, and, in a word, whatever may be termed our own works. To the class of things beyond our power belong the body of man, his goods or possessions, honors, dignities, offices, and generally what cannot be termed his works.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 279.

3281. LIFE, Rules of. Swedenborg. His "Rules of Life" [were]: 1, often to read and meditate on the Word of God; 2, to submit everything to the will of Divine Providence; 3, to observe in everything a propriety of behavior, and to keep the conscience clear; 4, to discharge with fidelity the functions of my employment and the duties of my office, and to render myself in all things useful to society.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 7, p. 61.

3282. LIFE, Secret of. Josiah Quincy. It concerns us all to know the secret of such health and longevity as this. His father died very young, and his mother in middle life. Nor had any of his paternal ancestors lived beyond seventy-four. . . . In the first place, he was strictly temperate in the use of intoxicating drinks, almost to total abstinence. At breakfast and at night he ate moderately and of plain food. At dinner, which he had the good sense to eat in the middle of the day, he ate heartily of whatever was set before him. He discovered, many years ago, how important perfect cleanliness is to the preservation of health, and he made a frequent use of the bath-tub, the flesh-brush, and the hair gloves. He was an exceedingly early riser. He was addicted to no vice whatever. His life was blameless and cheerful. He indulged none of the passions which waste the vitality and pervert the character. All his objects were such as a rational and virtuous man could pursue without self-reproach, and with the approbation of the wise and good. Thus living, he attained nearly to the age of ninety-three, enjoying life almost to the last hour, and passed away as peacefully and painlessly as a child goes to sleep. He was an eminently handsome man, from youth to extreme old age. His fine set of teeth he kept entire until his death; and this, no doubt, had much to do with preserving the health of his body and the proportions of his countenance. [See No. 3287.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 759.

3283. LIFE shortened. "Artemus Ward." [Mr. Charles F. Browne.] Wherever he lectured, whether in New England, California, or London, there was sure to be a knot of young fellows to gather round him, and go home with him to his hotel, order supper, and spend half the night in telling stories and singing songs. To any man this will be fatal in time; but when the nightly carouse follows an evening's performance before an audience, and is succeeded by a railroad journey the next day, the waste of vitality is fearfully rapid. Five years of such a life finished poor Charles Browne [Artemus Ward]. He died in London, in 1867, aged thirty-three years; and he now lies buried at the home of his childhood in Maine. . . . He was not a deep drinker. He was not a man of strong appetites. It was the nights wasted in conviviality, which his system needed for sleep, that sent him to his grave forty years before his time.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 748.

3285. LIFE, Start in. Alexander Stephens. The most part of his younger days had been passed in the ordinary farm labors of a Southern plantation. His earliest practice in these labors would seem to have been in corn-dropping, an art in which he soon became an expert. At the age of eleven he commenced ploughing, and by the following year was one of the regular ploughers on the farm. As he also ran all the errands, was mill-boy, shop-boy, and did, in fact, all the little jobs that fall to a lad so situated, it will readily be perceived that his opportunities for schooling must have been few and far between.—NORTON'S LIFE OF ALEXANDER STEPHENS, ch. 1, p. 1.

3286. LIFE, A successful. Washington Irving. The life of Washington Irving was one of the brightest ever led by an author. He discovered his genius at an early age; was graciously welcomed by his countrymen; answered the literary condition of the period when he appeared; won easily, and as easily kept, a distinguished place in the republic of letters; was generously rewarded for his work; charmed his contemporaries by his amiability and modesty; lived long, wisely, happily, and died at a ripe old age, in the fulness of his powers and his fame.—STODDARD'S IRVING, p. 9.

3287. LIFE, Training for. Josiah Quincy. Born in 1772, and died in 1864! Ninety-two years of happy, prosperous, and virtuous life! How was it that, in a world so full of the sick, the miserable, and the unfortunate, Josiah Quincy should have lived so long, and enjoyed, during almost the whole of his life, uninterrupted happiness and prosperity? Let us see. . . . Left an orphan at so early an age, his education was superintended by one of the best mothers a boy ever had; and this was the first cause both of the length and of the happiness of his life. This admirable mother was so careful lest her fondness for her only son should cause her to indulge him to his harm, that she even refrained from caressing him, and, in all that she did for him, thought of his welfare first, and of her own pleasure last, or not at all. To harden him, she used to have him taken from a warm bed in winter, as well as in summer, and carried down to a cellar kitchen, and there dipped three times in a tub of cold water. She even accustomed him to sit in wet feet, and endeavored in all ways to toughen his physical system against the wear and tear of life. [See No. 3282.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 749.

3288. LIFE, Uncivilized. Indian. In mid-winter of 1703-4 the town of Deerfield was destroyed. . . . Forty-seven of the inhabitants were tomahawked. A hundred and twelve were dragged into captivity. The prisoners, many of them women and children, were obliged to march to Canada. The snow lay four feet deep. The poor wretches, haggard with fear and starvation, sank down and died. The deadly hatchet hung ever above the heads of the feeble and the sick. Eunice Williams, the minister's wife, fainted by the wayside; in the presence of her husband and five captive children her brains were dashed out with a tomahawk. Those who survived to the end of the journey were afterward ransomed and permitted to return to their desolated homes. A daughter of Mr. Williams remained with the savages, grew up among the Mohawks, married a chieftain, and in after years returned in Indian garb to Deerfield. No entreaties could induce her to remain with her friends. The solitude of the woods and the society of her tawny husband had prevailed over the charms of civilization.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 17, p. 154.

3289. LIFE, Unhappy. Samuel Johnson. He used frequently to observe that there was more to be endured than enjoyed in the general condition of human life; and frequently quoted those lines of Dryden:

"Strange cozenage! none would live past years again,
Yet all hope pleasure from what still remain."
For his part, he said, he never passed that week in his life which he would wish to repeat, were an angel to make the proposal to him.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 176.

3290. LIFE, A useful. Sir Humphry Davy. It was Davy who gave the great impulse to agricultural chemistry—a branch of science which has already revolutionized farming in the Old World, and which is destined to be the farmer's best friend in the New. It was he who applied chemistry to the art of tanning. It was he who discovered that diamond is nothing but crystallized charcoal, and he who found out how to convert whiskey into tolerable brandy. His discoveries in galvanism and electricity were striking and valuable, and they have been further developed by his celebrated pupil and friend, Faraday. . . . Of all his inventions, the one which he and his contemporaries valued most was the safety-lamp, to prevent the explosion of fire-damp in mines. This lamp, which is merely a lantern made of wire-gauze, was the result of an exhaustive investigation of the nature and composition of the explosive gas.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 304.

3291. LIFE, Value of. In Gold. [With the Romans.] According to the strange jurisprudence of the times, the guilt of blood might be redeemed by a fine; yet the high price of nine hundred pieces of gold declares a just sense of the value of a simple citizen. Less atrocious injuries, a wound, a fracture, a blow, an opprobrious word, were measured with scrupulous and almost ridiculous diligence; and the prudence of the legislator encouraged the ignoble practice of bartering honor and revenge for a pecuniary compensation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 45, p. 415.

3292. LIFE, Vanity of. Triumphal Procession. [The great soldier Belisarius] obtained the honors of a triumph, a ceremony . . . which ancient Rome, since the reign of Tiberius, had reserved for the auspicious arms of the Cæsars. From the palace of Belisarius the procession was conducted through the principal streets to the hippodrome. . . . The wealth of nations was displayed, the trophies of martial or effeminate luxury; rich armor, golden thrones, and the chariots of state which had been used by the Vandal queen; the massy furniture of the royal banquet, the splendor of precious stones, the elegant forms of statues and vases, the more substantial treasure of gold. . . . A long train of the noblest Vandals reluctantly exposed their lofty stature and manly countenance. Gelimor [the captive Vandal king] slowly advanced; he was clad in a purple robe, and still maintained the majesty of a king. Not a tear escaped from his eyes, not a sigh was heard; but his pride or piety derived some secret consolation from the words of Solomon, which he repeatedly pronounced, VANITY! VANITY! ALL IS VANITY! Instead of ascending a triumphal car drawn by four horses or elephants, the modest conqueror marched on foot at the head of his brave companions; his prudence might decline an honor too conspicuous for a subject, and his magnanimity might justly disdain what had been so often sullied by the vilest of tyrants.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 139.

3293. LIFE, Vision of. Strong and Weak. Truly affecting is the imaginary spectacle, so easily conjured up, of Cromwell and his bride standing by the altar of St. Giles' Church, Cripplegate. . . . The soft hand of Elizabeth—the rough, strong hand of Oliver; the hand holding that little one in its grasp was to deal death-blows on battle-fields; it was to sign a monarch's death-warrant; it was to grasp the truncheon of royalty and power; it was to fold the purple of sovereignty over the shoulders; it was to wave back an offered crown! That frank but strongly lined face, so youthful, yet prematurely thoughtful, and that kind and gentle creature, face to face before him—through what a crowd of varying changes shall it sorrow and smile: in a lowly homestead, directing the work of maids and churls; in a palace and a court, among nobles and sagacious statesmen; and again, in silence and obscurity, and shining with the same equable lustre through all. Beautiful Elizabeth Boucher! so humble, and yet so dignified!—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 25, p. 42.

3294. LIFE, Wandering. Tartars. The wandering Tartars follow at this day the life of the ancient Scythians. In the spring a large body or horde, amounting perhaps to ten thousand, sets out in quest of settlement for the summer. They drive before them their flocks and herds; and when they come to an inviting spot, they live upon it till all its verdure is eaten up, and till the country supplies no more game for the chase. They exchange cattle with the Russians, the Persians, and the Turks, for money, with which they purchase cloth, silks, stuffs, and apparel for their women. They have the use of fire-arms, which they are very dexterous at making, and it is almost the only mechanical art which they exercise. They disdain every other species of labor, and account no employment to be honorable, unless that of hunting. When a man, from age, is incapable of partaking in the usual occupation of his tribe, it is customary with them, as it is likewise with the Canadian savages, to build him a small hut upon the banks of a river, and, giving him some provisions, leave him to die, without taking any further charge of him.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 23, p. 332.

3295. LIFE, Wasted. Charles II. He wished merely to be a king such as Louis XV. of France afterward was—a king who could draw without limit on the treasury for the gratification of his private tastes, who could hire with wealth and honors persons capable of assisting him to kill the time, and who, even when the State was brought by maladministration to the depths of humiliation and to the brink of ruin, could still exclude unwelcome truth from the purlieus of his own seraglio, and refuse to see and hear whatever might disturb his luxurious repose. . . . His favorite vices were precisely those to which the Puritans were least indulgent. He could not get through one day without the help of diversions which the Puritans regarded as sinful.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 159.

3296. LIGHT, Contribution of. "Hang out your Lights." The steeple of Bow Church, erected in 1512, had lanterns, "which were meant to have been glazed," says Stow, "and lights placed nightly in them in the winter, whereby travellers to the city might have the better sight thereof, and not to miss of their ways." The mayor commanded a century earlier that lanterns and lights should be suspended in front of the houses on winter evenings. "Hang out your lights" was the cry of the ancient watchman.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 29, p. 481.

3297. LIGHT introduced. London Streets. In the last year of the reign of Charles II. began a great change in the police of London—a change which has perhaps added as much to the happiness of the great body of the people as revolutions of much greater fame. An ingenious projector, named Edward Heming, obtained letters patent, conveying to him, for a term of years, the exclusive right of lighting up London. He undertook, for a moderate consideration, to place a light before every tenth door, on moonless nights, from Michaelmas to Lady Day, and from six to twelve of the clock. Those who now see the capital all the year round, from dusk to dawn, blazing with a splendor compared with which the illuminations for La Hogue and Blenheim would have looked pale, may perhaps smile to think of Heming's lanterns, which glimmered feebly before one house in ten during a small part of one night in three.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 336.

3298. LIGHT opposed. Gas. In 1807 Pall Mall was lighted by gas. The original gas company, whose example was to be followed, not only by all England, but by the whole civilized world, was first derided, and then treated in Parliament as rapacious monopolists, intent upon the ruin of established industry. The adventurers in gaslight did more for the prevention of crime than the government had done since the days of Alfred. [It was said to be ruinous to the whale-fisheries and to the seamen engaged in them.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 6, p. 66.

3299. LIGHTNING, Fear of. Superstition. The public expected that [the Emperor Carinus,] the successor of [the Roman Emperor] Carus, would pursue his father's footsteps, and, without allowing the Persians to recover from their consternation, would advance sword in hand to the palaces of Susa and Ecbatana. But the legions, however strong in numbers and discipline, were dismayed by the most abject superstition. Notwithstanding all the arts that were practised to disguise the manner of the late emperor's death, it was found impossible to remove the opinion of the multitude, and the power of opinion is irresistible. Places or persons struck with lightning were considered by the ancients with pious horror, as singularly devoted to the wrath of Heaven.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12, p. 393.

3300. ——. Mother of Washington. One weakness alone belonged to this lofty-minded and intrepid woman. It was a fear of lightning. In early life a female friend had been killed at her side while sitting at the table. . . . The matron never recovered from the shock. . . . On the approach of a thunder cloud she would retire to her chamber, and not leave it again till the storm had passed over.—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 1.

3301. LIQUOR-TRAFFIC vs. Sabbath. France. [When Bonaparte was banished to Elba, and Louis XVIII. was restored to the throne of France, he] forbade shops to be opened on Sundays and fête days. Wine-sellers, restaurateurs, and billiard-table-keepers thought that no tyranny could be equal to that of closing their establishments during the hours of divine service.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 2, p. 23.

3302. LITERATURE, Conceit in. Greeks of Constantinople. In prose the least offensive of the Byzantine writers are absolved from censure by their naked and unassuming simplicity; but the orators most eloquent in their own conceit are the farthest removed from the models whom they affect to emulate. In every page our taste and reason are wounded by the choice of gigantic and obsolete words, a stiff and intricate phraseology, the discord of images, the childish play of false or unseasonable ornament, and the painful attempt to elevate themselves, to astonish the reader, and to involve a trivial meaning in the smoke of obscurity and exaggeration. Their prose is soaring to the vicious affectation of poetry; their poetry is sinking below the flatness and insipidity of prose.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53, p. 381.

3303. LITERATURE, Effects of. Military. We are told that in the sack of Athens the Goths had collected all the libraries, and were on the point of setting fire to this funeral pile of Grecian learning, had not one of their chiefs, of more refined policy than his brethren, dissuaded them from the design by the profound observation that as long as the Greeks were addicted to the study of books, they would never apply themselves to the exercise of arms. The sagacious counsellor (should the truth of the act be admitted) reasoned like an ignorant barbarian. In the most polite and powerful nations genius of every kind has displayed itself about the same period; and the age of science has generally been the age of military virtue and success.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 10, p. 314.

3304. LITERATURE, Fame in. Limited. Of the thirty "heirs of fame" (authors and poets) who occupy about seven hundred pages of Johnson's biographies, there are only about seven whom the world has not very "willingly let die." Rowe, Prior, Congreve, Gay, are still talked about. Addison and Swift are read for their prose. Pope is almost the sole name in poetry that is not partially or hermetically sealed up in the "monument of banished minds."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 26, p. 415.

3305. LITERATURE, Genius in. Tasso. He is peculiarly excellent in the delineation of his characters. . . . It is now generally allowed that Boileau and Addison have much undervalued the merit of Tasso, when, in contrasting him with Virgil, they speak of the tinsel ornaments of his poems compared with the gold of the other. Tasso, though not on the whole so correct a poet as Virgil, has his strokes of the sublime—his golden passages—which will stand the test of the severest criticism. In point of fancy and imagination no poet has gone beyond him: witness the description of his enchanted forest; nor have we anywhere more beautiful examples of the true pathetic.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 36, p. 493.

3306. ——. Ariosto. A work . . . (about the middle of the sixteenth century) appeared in Italy, which engrossed the attention of all the literary world. This was the "Orlando Furioso" of Ariosto, an epic poem, which, with a total disregard of all the rules of this species of composition, without plan, without probability, without morality or decency, has the most captivating charms to all who are possessed of the smallest degree of genuine taste. Orlando is the hero of the piece, and he is mad. Eight books are consumed before the hero is introduced, and his first appearance is in bed desiring to sleep. His great purpose is to find his mistress Angelica; but his search of her is interrupted by so many adventures of other knights and damsels, each of them pursuing some separate object, few of which have any necessary relation to the piece, that it becomes almost impossible to peruse this poem with any degree of connection between the parts. . . . The reader must hunt for . . . [any tale] through a dozen books, for it is often cut short in the most interesting part, and resumed at the distance of five or six cantos, as abruptly as it was broken off. There is no good moral in the adventures of the mad Orlando, and the scenes which the poet describes are often most grossly indecent.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 36, p. 493.

3307. ——. Milton. From the date of the Gerusalemme Liberata of Tasso, the genius of epic poetry seems to have lain asleep for above a century, till the days of Milton; with the exception only of the Fairy Queen of Spenser, which has many detached passages abounding in beauties, but, as an intricate and protracted allegory, is dry and tedious upon the whole. The merits of the Paradise Lost have been so admirably illustrated by Addison in the Spectator, and the work itself, as well as his criticism, are so generally known, that it becomes entirely unnecessary in this place to bestow much time in characterizing it. Compared with the great epic poems of antiquity, the Iliad, the Odyssey, and the Æneid, the Paradise Lost has more examples of the true sublime than are to be found in all those compositions put together. At the same time, if examined by critical rules, it is not so perfect a work as any one of them; and there are greater instances of a mediocrity, and even sinking in composition, than are to be found in any of those ancient poems, unless in the sixth book, which is almost one continued specimen of the sublime. It is but seldom that the poet sustains himself for a single page without degenerating into bombast, false wit, or obscurity.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 36, p. 493.

3308. ——. John Dryden. In the end of the seventeenth century lyric poetry in England was carried to its highest perfection by Dryden. The ode on St. Cecilia's Day has never since been equalled; and it may even be pronounced equal to the best lyric compositions of antiquity. The genius of Dryden, as a poet, was universal. As a satirist, he has the keenness without the indelicacy of Horace or Juvenal. In this species of composition his Mack-flecknoe and Absalom and Achitophel have never been surpassed. He excels Boileau in this respect, that the satire of the French poet is too general, and therefore falls short of its great purpose, which is to amend. The author who makes mankind in general the subject of his censure or of his ridicule will do no good as a reformer. Dryden, as a fabulist, displays a very happy turn for the poetical narrative, and though the subjects of his fables are not his own, they are in general well chosen. The merit of his dramatic pieces, though considerable, is not very high. He certainly possessed that invention which is the first quality of a dramatic poet; but he is very deficient in the expression of passion, and in his finest scenes we are inclined more to admire the art of the poet than to participate in the feelings of his characters.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 36, p. 496.

3309. ——. Shakespeare. The merits of Shakespeare have often been analyzed, and are familiar to every person of taste. He cannot be measured by the rules of criticism—he understood them not, and has totally disregarded them; but this very circumstance has given room for those beauties of unconfined nature and astonishing ebullitions of genius which delight and surprise in his productions, and which the rules of the drama would have much confined and repressed. I know not whether there is not something, even in the very absurdities of Shakespeare, which tends, by contrast, to exalt the lustre of his beauties and to elevate his strokes of the sublime.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 36, p. 496.

3310. LITERATURE, Honors of. Milton. [See No. 3307.] The neglect of the merit of Milton during his own life is sufficiently known. Hume, in his History of England, mentions an anecdote which strongly marks the small regard that was had for this great poet, even by that party to whose service he had devoted his talents. Whitelocke, in his Memorials, talks of one Milton, a blind man, who was employed in translating a treaty with Sweden into Latin!—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 36, p. 494.

3311. LITERATURE, Importance of. Flame. The vigor with which Attila wielded the sword of Mars convinced the world that it had been reserved alone for his invincible arm. But the extent of his empire affords the only remaining evidence of the number and importance of his victories; and the Scythian monarch, however ignorant of the value of science and philosophy, might perhaps lament that his illiterate subjects were destitute of the art which could perpetuate the memory of his exploits.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 34, p. 397.

3312. LITERATURE, Opportunity of. Alexander Pope. External conditions pointed to letters as the sole path to eminence, but it was precisely the path for which he had admirable qualifications. The sickly son of the Popish tradesman was cut off from the Bar, the Senate, and the Church. Physically contemptible, politically ostracised, and in a humble social position, he could yet win this dazzling prize and force his way with his pen to the highest pinnacle of contemporary fame. Without adventitious favor, and in spite of many bitter antipathies, he was to become the acknowledged head of English literature and the welcome companion of all the most eminent men of his time. Though he could not foresee his career from the start, he worked as vigorously as if the goal had already been in sight.—MEYER'S WORDSWORTH, ch. 1.

3313. LITERATURE, Pleasures of. Charles James Fox. [When Fox, the great orator and man of the world, withdrew, disaffected, from the excitements of politics and from his place in Parliament, he employed his time in] reading the Iliad; writing of Prior, and Ariosto, and Dryden, and La Fontaine; going through Lucretius regularly; and taking up Chaucer upon his nephew's suggestion. It is pleasant to see how literature can fill up an aching void, however created.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 20, p. 350.

3314. LITERATURE and Poverty. Samuel Johnson. Dr. Samuel Johnson . . . came to London, a literary adventurer, in 1737. He was long destined to bear the poverty and to encounter the supposed degradation that surrounded the author who wrote for subsistence—the successor of the author who wrote for preferment. [He swallowed the scraps from the bookseller Cave's table, hidden behind a screen to conceal his ragged clothes.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 5, p. 85.

3315. LITERATURE, Preservation of. Monkery. However absurd to the eye of reason and philosophy may appear the principle which led to monastic seclusion, the obligations which learning owes to those truly deserving characters who, in ages of barbarism, preserved alive, in their secluded cloisters, the embers of the literary spirit, ought never to be forgotten. The ancient classics were multiplied by transcripts, to which undoubtedly we owe the preservation of such of the Greek and Roman authors as we now possess entire. Even the original labors of some of those monkish writers are possessed of considerable merit, and evince a zeal for the cultivation of letters, which does them the highest honor.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 16, p. 245.

3316. LITERATURE, Profligate. Reign of Charles II. The profligacy of the English plays, satires, songs, and novels of that age is a deep blot on our national fame. The evil may easily be traced to its source. The wits and the Puritans had never been on friendly terms. There was no sympathy between the two classes. They looked on the whole system of human life from different points and in different lights. The earnest of each was the jest of the other; the pleasures of each were the torments of the other. To the stern precision, even the innocent sport of the fancy, seemed a crime. To light and festive natures the solemnity of the zealous brethren furnished copious matter of ridicule.—MACAULAY'S HIST., ch. 3, p. 370.

3317. LITERATURE, Recompense of. Alexander Pope. Between 1715 and 1725 Pope completed the Iliad and the Odyssey. Never was literary labor in those times more abundantly recompensed. Pope received nearly £9000 from his subscribers and his publisher as his clear gain from these undertakings.—KNIGHT'S ENG.

3318. LITERATURE, Restoration of. Arabs. It is generally admitted that the Arabians were the first restorers of literature in Europe, after that extinction which it suffered from the irruption of the barbarous nations and the fall of the Western Empire. About the beginning of the eighth century this enterprising people, in the course of their Asiatic conquests, found many manuscripts of the ancient Greek authors, which they carefully preserved; and in that dawn of mental improvement which now began to appear at Bagdad, the gratification which the Arabians received from the perusal of those manuscripts was such that they requested their caliphs to procure from the Constantinopolitan emperors the works of the best Greek writers. These they translated into Arabic; but the authors who chiefly engaged their attention were those who treated of mathematical, metaphysical, and physical knowledge. The Arabians continued to extend their conquests and to communicate their knowledge to some of the European nations, which at that time were involved in the greatest ignorance.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 16, p. 244.

3319. LITERATURE ridiculed. Crusaders. [They pillaged Constantinople.] To expose the arms of a people of scribes and scholars, they affected to display a pen, an inkhorn, and a sheet of paper, without discerning that the instruments of science and valor were alike feeble and useless in the hands of the modern Greeks.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 60, p. 93.

3320. LITERATURE, Vicious. Reign of Charles II. Of that generation, from Dryden down to Dufey, the common characteristic was hard-hearted, shameless, swaggering licentiousness, at once inelegant and inhuman. The influence of these writers was doubtless noxious, yet less noxious than it would have been had they been less depraved. The poison which they administered was so strong that it was, in long time, rejected with nausea. None of them understood the dangerous art of associating images of unlawful pleasure with all that is endearing and ennobling. None of them was aware that a certain decorum is essential even to voluptuousness; that drapery may be more alluring than exposure; and that the imagination may be far more powerfully moved by delicate hints which impel it to exert itself than by gross descriptions which it takes in passively.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 373.

3321. LITIGATION, Period of. Fifteenth Century. One of the most remarkable features of society in this period [A.D. 1450–1485] is the incessant litigation. Every gentleman had some knowledge of law, and his knowledge never rusted for want of practice.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 7, p. 109.

3322. LITTLE THINGS, Importance of. Spanish War. [The Duke of Wellington wrote in his despatches from Portugal to the government:] The people of England . . . will not readily believe that important results here frequently depend on fifty or sixty mules, more or less, or a few bundles of straw to feed them.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 30, p. 588.

3323. LITURGY opposed. Scots. Charles [I.] and Laud determined to force on the Scots the English Liturgy, or, rather, a liturgy which, wherever it differed from that of England, differed, in the judgment of all rigid Protestants, for the worse. . . . The first performance of the foreign ceremonies produced a riot. The riot rapidly became a revolution. Ambition, patriotism, fanaticism, were mingled in one headlong torrent. The whole nation was in arms.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 88.

3324. LOAN, A hopeless. Samuel Johnson. The heterogeneous composition of human nature was remarkably exemplified in Johnson. His liberality in giving his money to persons in distress was extraordinary. Yet there lurked about him a propensity to paltry saving. One day I owned to him that "I was occasionally troubled with a fit of narrowness." "Why, sir," said he, "so am I. But I do not tell it." He has now and then borrowed a shilling of me; and when I asked him for it again seemed to be rather out of humor. A droll little circumstance once occurred: as if he meant to reprimand my minute exactness as a creditor, he thus addressed me: "Boswell, lend me sixpence—not to be repaid."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 489.

3325. LOBBYIST, A successful. Marcus Crassus. As he despaired of rising to an equality with him [Pompey] in war, he betook himself to the administration; and by paying his court, by defending the impeached, by lending money, and by assisting and canvassing for persons who stood for offices, he gained an authority and influence equal to that which Pompey acquired by his military achievements.—PLUTARCH'S MARCUS CRASSUS.

3326. LONGEVITY, Causes of. John Locke. Whenever it was possible he preferred the quiet life and pure air of the country to the many attractions which the capital must have offered to a man with his wide acquaintance, and with so many political and literary interests. In diet he practised an abstemiousness very rare among men of that age. His ordinary drink was water, and to this habit he attributed not only his length of years, but also the extraordinary excellence of his eyesight. Till recently a curious relic of Locke's water-drinking habits was preserved in the shape of a large mortar of spongy stone, which acted as a natural filter, and which he used to call his brew-house. He was assiduous in taking exercise, and was specially fond of walking and gardening. In the latter years of his life he used to ride out slowly every day after dinner. [He had feeble health from his youth.] —FOWLER'S LOCKE, ch. 7.

3327. LONGEVITY by Prudence. Peter Cooper. Peter was the fifth of nine children, of whom seven were boys. He seemed not to inherit a strong constitution, and in his case, as in so many others, the fact that he reached so advanced an age could be attributed only to his living so natural a life; that he subjected himself to no influences or exposures which cut off the great mass of men in civilized countries from living out their natural lives. He owed his longevity chiefly to himself.—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 10.

3328. LORD absent, The. House of Commons. A few of the members who dissented, . . . continuing to occupy the House of Commons, Cromwell sent one of his officers to turn them out. This officer, a Colonel White, entering the house, demanded what they were doing there; the chairman answered, "They are seeking the Lord." "Then," said White, "you may go elsewhere, for to my certain knowledge the Lord has not been here these many years;" so saying he turned them out of doors. Thus the supreme power became vested in the council of officers, [who nominated Cromwell Lord Protector of the three kingdoms].—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30, p. 414.

3330. LOSS, Inevitable. Battle of Sedgemoor. [Rebellion of the Duke of Monmouth against James II.] The . . . divisions of the royal army were in motion. The Life Guards and Blues came pricking fast from Weston Zoyland, and scattered in an instant some of Grey's horse, who had attempted to rally. The fugitives spread a panic among their comrades in the rear, who had charge of the ammunition. The wagons drove off at full speed, and never stopped till they were many miles from the field of battle. Monmouth had hitherto done his part like a stout and able warrior. He had been seen on foot, pike in hand, encouraging his infantry by voice and by example. . . . But the struggle of the hardy rustics could not last. Their powder and ball were spent. Cries were heard of "Ammunition! for God's sake, ammunition!" But no ammunition was at hand.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 564.

3331. LOSSES, Disparity in. Battle of New Orleans. Earthworks had been constructed, and a long line of cotton bales and sand-bags thrown up for protection. On the morning of the memorable 8th of January the British moved forward. They went to a terrible fate. The battle began with the light of early morning, and was ended before nine o'clock. Pakenham hurled column after column against the American position, and column after column was smitten with irretrievable ruin. Jackson's men behind their breastworks were almost entirely secure from the enemy's fire, while every discharge of the Tennessee and Kentucky rifles told with awful effect on the exposed veterans of England. Pakenham, trying to rally his men, was killed; General Gibbs, second in command, was mortally wounded; General Keene fell disabled; only General Lambert was left to call the shattered fragments of the army from the field. Never was there in a great battle such disparity of losses. Of the British fully 700 were killed, 1400 wounded, and 500 taken prisoners. The American loss amounted to 8 killed and 13 wounded.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 51, p. 418.

3332. LOST, Seeking the. Sir John Franklin's Crew. This prolonged search for a handful of men presents a curious contrast to the recklessness with which human life is frequently risked and destroyed. We kill 40,000 of one another in a great battle without the slightest remorse; but if a poor little child goes astray in the woods, the population of half a dozen towns engages eagerly in the search for it, day and night, till its fate is ascertained. Thousands of England's people are permitted to perish every year for want of food and care, and no one regards the fact; but let a few men be lost in the polar ice, and the resources of the empire are lavished in the endeavor to rescue them. Such a creature is man!—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 400.

3333. LOT, Choice by. Turkmenans. The victorious Turkmenans immediately proceeded to the election of a king; and if the probable tale of a Latin historian deserves any credit, they determined by lot the choice of their new master. A number of arrows were successively inscribed with the name of a tribe, a family, and a candidate; they were drawn from the bundle by the hand of a child.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 57, p. 607.

3334. LOTTERY, Profitable. Peter Cooper. In his seventeenth year, stirred with a higher ambition, the boy came to New York to start in life for himself. He had accumulated $10 of his own money, and, thinking to augment it rapidly, he invested his capital in a lottery ticket. He lost it, of course, as millions of older fools have since. But he never regretted it, and he often recalled the fact with good-humor and thankfulness, for he said it was "the cheapest piece of knowledge he ever bought."—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 12.

3335. LOVE, The abode of. "Agapemone." In 1246 the Rev. Henry Prince, a curate of Charlino, Eng., united with several members of his church in founding an establishment near Spaxton, called by them the Agapemone. They possess a long file of elegant buildings, where they live professedly in the most refined pleasure. The cuisine is admirable. The "turn-out" in the afternoon consists of a graceful barouche drawn by four thorough-bred grays, preceded by outriders and bloodhounds, and accompanied by a mounted escort. Thus dashingly "the family of love" was wont to take the air. . . . Without care, in a beautiful spot, amid sound of music, delicious cookery, and all those appliances which to the sensualist makes even nature more delightful, they lived in their ease in much enjoyment, and mocked at the religious communities outside their extensive walls for their seriousness and their cares. They rode out on gallant horses, they followed the hounds with keen delight, played at all manner of manly sports within their own grounds, and took especial joy in a game peculiar to England, called "hockey," which they played on Sundays to the disedification of their neighbors around. Their property is considerable and in common, and, strange to relate, all their converts have been from among the wealthy. The relations between the sexes are not of a grossly sensual nature, as might be inferred from the title of the sect. . . . They enter upon matrimonial unions while the attraction lasts, or until a new one supersedes it; but one partner at a time is all that is allowed to any one. They profess to be Trinitarians, and hold to the Apostles' Creed. They now declare that they do all things for the glory of God. . . . They renounce prayers, but sing hymns of praise.—AM. CYCLOPEDIA, "AGAPEMONE."

3336. LOVE, Accidental. Sir Walter Scott. One Sunday, about two years before his call to the bar, Scott offered his umbrella to a young lady of much beauty who was coming out of the Greyfriars Church during a shower; the umbrella was graciously accepted; and it was not an unprecedented consequence that Scott fell in love with the borrower, who turned out to be Margaret, daughter of Sir John and Lady Jane Stuart Belches, of Invermay. For near six years after this Scott indulged the hope of marrying this lady, and it does not seem doubtful that the lady herself was in part responsible for this impression.—HUTTON'S LIFE OF SCOTT, ch. 3.

3337. LOVE, Active. George Whitefield. The device of Whitefield's seal was a winged heart, soaring above the globe, and the motto, Astra petamus.—SOUTHEY.

3338. LOVE, Battle of. Lovers. [Aidoneus, king of the Molossians,] named his wife Proserpine, his daughter Core, and his dog Cerberus; with this dog he commanded all his daughter's suitors to fight, promising her to him that should overcome him.—PLUTARCH'S THESEUS.

3339. LOVE, Changed by. Another Body. Cato the Censor used to say the soul of a lover lived in the body of another.—PLUTARCH.

3340. LOVE, Conjugal. Napoleon I. While these scenes were conspiring [in opening the Italian campaign] Napoleon did not forget the bride he had left in Paris. Though for seven days and nights he had allowed himself no quiet meal, no regular repose, and had not taken off either his coat or his boots, he found time to send frequent and most affectionate, though very short, notes to Josephine.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLÉON B., vol. 1, ch. 4.

3341. LOVE, Disappointment in. Kosciusko the Pole. He left his native country from a disappointment in love; and devoting himself to freedom and humanity, in the autumn of 1776 he entered the American army as an officer of engineers. [He was a grand soldier, and fell in the war.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 19.

3342. LOVE, Infatuation of. Mary Stuart. Du Chatelard [her page], surprised a second time hidden behind the curtains of the queen's bed, was sent to trial, and condemned to death by the judges of Edinburgh for a meditated treason. With a single word Mary might have commuted his punishment or granted him pardon, but she ungenerously abandoned him to the executioner. Ascending the scaffold erected before the windows of Holyrood Palace, the theatre of his madness and the dwelling of the queen, he faced death like a hero and a poet. "If," said he, "I die not without reproach, like the Chevalier Bayard, my ancestor, like him I die, at least, without fear." For his last prayer he recited Ronsard's beautiful Ode on Death. Then, casting his last looks and thoughts toward the windows of the palace inhabited by the charm of his life and the cause of his death, "Farewell!" he cried, "thou who art so beautiful and so cruel; who killest me, and whom I cannot cease to love!"—LAMARTINE'S QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 16.

3343. LOVE, Juvenile. Napoleon I. When Napoleon was but five or six years of age he was placed in a school. . . . There a fair-haired little maiden won his youthful heart. It was Napoleon's first love. His impetuous nature was all engrossed by his new passion, and he inspired as ardent an affection in the bosom of his loved companion. . . . He walked to and from school, holding the hand of Giacomietta. He abandoned all the plays and companionship of other children to talk and muse with her. The older boys and girls made themselves merry with the display of affection which the loving couple exhibited; . . . [this] exerted not the slightest influence to abash Napoleon.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 1.

3344. LOVE a Necessity. Cannoneers. [Napoleon's soldiers dragged their dismembered cannon over the Alps.] It was now the great glory of these men to take care of their guns. They loved tenderly the merciless monsters. They lavished caresses and terms of endearment upon the glittering, polished, death-dealing brass. The heart of man is a strange enigma. Even when most degraded it needs something to love. These blood-stained soldiers, brutalized by vice, amid all the horrors of battle, lovingly fondled the murderous machines of war. . . . The unrelenting gun was the stern cannoneer's lady-love. He kissed it with unwashed, mustached lips. . . . Affectionately he named it Mary, Emma, Lizzie.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 19.

3345. LOVE, Passionate. Poet Shelley. Shelley fell suddenly and passionately in love with Godwin's daughter, Mary. Peacock, [his intimate friend, says] as to the overwhelming nature of the new attachment: "Nothing that I ever read in tale or history could present a more striking image of a sudden, violent, irresistible, uncontrollable passion, than that under which I found him laboring. . . . Between his old feeling toward Harriet [his wife], from whom he was not then separated, and his passion for Mary, he showed in his looks, in his gestures, in his speech, the state of a mind 'suffering, like a little kingdom, the nature of an insurrection.' His eyes were blood-shot, his hair and dress disordered. He caught up a bottle of laudanum, and said, 'I never part from this.'"—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 4.

3346. LOVE vs. Prudence. Agésilauus. [Agésilauus was very ardent in his friendships.] There were, indeed, times when his attachments gave way to the exigencies of state. Once being obliged to decamp in a hurry, he was leaving a favorite sick behind him. The favorite called after him, and earnestly entreated him to come back; upon which he turned and said, "How little consistent are love and prudence!"—PLUTARCH'S AGESILAUS.

3347. LOVE, Religion of. Napoleon I. [Napoleon said to Montholon at St. Helena:] "Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne, and myself have founded empires; but upon what did we rest the creations of our genius? Upon force. Jesus Christ alone founded His empire upon love; and at this moment millions of men would die for Him. I die before my time, and my body will be given back to worms. Such is the fate of him who has been called the great Napoleon. What an abyss between my deep misery and the eternal kingdom of Christ, which is proclaimed, loved, and adored, and which is extended over the whole earth! Call you this dying? Is it not rather living? The death of Christ is the death of a God!"—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 14.

3348. LOVE, Romantic. Geoffrey Rudel was a mad poet, who fell in love with the Countess of Tripoli, whom he had never seen, and who, being afterward blessed with a sight of her, dropped down dead for joy.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 16, p. 248.

3349. ———. Samuel Johnson. A young woman of Leek, in Staffordshire, while he served his apprenticeship there, conceived a violent passion for him; and though it met with no favorable return, followed him to Lichfield, where she took lodgings opposite to the house in which he lived, and indulged her hopeless flame. When he was informed that it so preyed upon her mind that her life was in danger, he with a generous humanity went to her and offered to marry her, but it was then too late; her vital power was exhausted; and she actually exhibited one of the very rare instances of dying for love. She was buried in the cathedral of Lichfield; and he, with a tender regard, placed a stone over her grave.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 5.

3350. ———. Poet Shelley. Nearly the whole of the winter was spent in Naples, where Shelley suffered from depression of more than ordinary depth. Mrs. Shelley attributed this gloom to the state of his health; but Medwin tells a strange story, which, if it is not wholly a romance, may better account for the poet's melancholy. He says that so far back as the year 1816, on the night before his departure from London, "a married lady, young, handsome, and of noble connections," came to him, avowed the passionate love she had conceived for him, and proposed that they should fly together. He explained to her that his hand and heart had both been given irrevocably to another, and, after the expression of the most exalted sentiments on both sides, they parted.—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 5.

3351. LOVE, Shadow of. Washington Irving. He had passed through troubles which had deepened his knowledge of life, having lost his father, who died shortly before the completion of "Salmagundi," and his mother, who died about ten years later, and whose death was still fresh in his memory. Between these two sorrows came the tragedy which darkened his young manhood, and was never forgotten—the death of Matilda Hoffman, the young lady to whom he was attached, who closed her brief existence at the age of eighteen, while he was composing the amusing annals of Mr. Diedrich Knickerbocker.—STODDARD'S IRVING, p. 35.

3352. LOVE, Supremacy of. Domestic. [Queen Elizabeth required obedience. A domestic anecdote illustrates this principle of her conduct. Harrington says] the queen did once ask my wife in merry sort, "how she kept my good-will and love, which I did always maintain to be truly good toward her and my children." My Moll, in wise and discreet manner, told her Highness "she had confidence in her husband's understanding and courage, well founded on her own steadfastness, not to offend or thwart, but to cherish and obey; hereby did she persuade her husband of her own affection, and in so doing did command his." "Go to, go to, mistress," saith the queen; "you are wisely bent, I find; after such sort do I keep the good-will of all my husbands, my good people; for if they did not rest assured of some special love toward them, they would not readily yield me such good obedience."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 18, p. 284.

3353. LOVER, A fallen. Hernando Cortes. Spanish girls were kept almost as secluded, and guarded almost as carefully, as the ladies in the harem of a Turk. Therefore, when a young man fell in love, instead of ringing the door-bell and sending in his card, he often made a rope ladder, and surveyed the residence of the young lady, with a view to ascertain the best mode of getting upon her balcony or into her window. Our adventurer proceeded in this manner. In scaling the wall of the garden which enclosed the house wherein lived the object of his passion, he fell to the ground, and injured himself so seriously that it was long before he recovered his health.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 317.

3355. LOVER, A youthful. Lord Byron. When first he imagined himself the victim of the tender passion he was only eight years of age; and he cherished so fond a recollection of his infant flame, that when, at the age of sixteen, his mother carelessly told him that his "old sweetheart, Mary Duff," was married, he was nearly thrown into convulsions, which so alarmed his mother that she avoided mentioning the subject to him ever after. At twelve he thought himself madly in love with a beautiful cousin. "I could not sleep—I could not eat—I could not rest," he afterward wrote. The last of his boyish passions, which seized him when he was fifteen, before it was possible for him to have been really in love, was not so violent as his first; but he always spoke of it as something exceedingly serious. The lady was much older than himself, and very properly regarded and treated him as a school-boy.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 291.

3356. LOVERS, Rival. Thomas Jefferson. Mrs. Martha Skelton [had many lovers, and] among all her lovers he was the favored swain. The story goes that two of his rivals arrived at the same moment at the widow's house, and were shown into a room together. It happened that, at that moment, Mr. Jefferson and Mrs. Skelton were singing and playing together, their voices being accompanied by her harpsichord and his violin. The song was a tender and plaintive melody, and they performed it as two lovers might be expected to execute a piece of music which enabled them to express their feelings to one another. The rivals listened for a few moments, and then retired, to return no more on the same errand.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 221.

3357. LOYALTY esteemed. Cromwell. We think this is the moment to say a few words upon that other ever difficult problem, What were Cromwell's intentions with reference to himself and to Charles [I.]? We cannot see that there is foundation for any other thought than that Cromwell especially intended to preserve English law; and to him, we dare say, a king was not more sacred than a man, and a lawless king not so sacred as an obedient and law-keeping man.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 14, p. 179.

3358. LOYALTY, Unreserved. Widow Windham. [After his defeat Charles I. was] conveyed to the residence of a widow named Windham, who had lost her husband and three eldest sons in the cause of Charles I., and with unshaken devotion now offered her two surviving ones to the successor of the decapitated monarch. She received Charles, not as a fugitive but as a king. "When my husband lay on his death-bed," said she, "he called to him our five sons, and thus addressed them: 'My children, we have hitherto enjoyed calm and peaceful days under our three last sovereigns; but I warn you that I see clouds and tempests gathering over the kingdom. I perceive factions springing up in every quarter, which menace the repose of our beloved country. Listen to me well: whatever turn events may take, be ever true to your lawful sovereign; obey him, and remain loyal to the crown! Yes,' added he, with vehemence, 'I charge you to stand by the crown, even though it should hang upon a bush!'" These last words engraved their duty on the hearts of my children," continued the mother, "and those who are still spared to me are yours, as their dead brothers were given to your father."—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 54.

3359. LOYALTY, Vigorous. Bismarck. At a beer saloon much frequented by Conservatives, Bismarck, one evening, just as he had taken his seat, and was about to drink his first glass of beer, overheard a man, who sat at the next table, speak of a member of the royal family in a particularly insulting manner. Bismarck rose, and, lifting his glass of beer, thundered out, "Out of the house! If you are not off when I have drunk this beer, I will break the glass on your head!" Upon this there was a wild commotion in the room, and loud outcries, but Bismarck drank his glass of beer with the utmost composure. When he had finished it he smashed the glass upon the offender's head. The outcries ceased for a moment, and Bismarck said, quietly, "Waiter, what is to pay for this broken glass?" The manner in which this outrage was committed—Bismarck's commanding look and bearing—carried the day; the beer-drinkers applauded the act, and the man dared not resent it.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 632.

3360. LOYALTY, Zealous. Puritans. The Puritans, even in the depths of the prisons to which she [Elizabeth] had sent them, prayed, and with no simulated fervor, that she might be kept from the dagger of the assassin, that rebellion might be put down under her feet, and that her arms might be victorious by sea and land. One of the most stubborn of the stubborn sect, immediately after one of his hands had been lopped off by the executioner for an offence into which he had been hurried by his intemperate zeal, waved his hat with the hand which was still left him, and shouted, "God save the Queen!"—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 58.

3361. LUCK, Days of. Ancient. The month Thargelion (May) was also remarkably unfortunate to the barbarians; for in that month Alexander defeated the King of Persia's generals near the Granicus, and the Carthaginians were beaten by Timoleon in Sicily on the twenty-fourth of the same—a day still more remarkable (according to Ephorus, Callisthenes, Demaster, and Phylarchus) for the taking of Troy. On the contrary, the month Melaginition (August), which the Bœotians call Panemus, was very unlucky to the Greeks; for on the seventh they were beaten by Antipater in the battle of Crannon and utterly ruined, and before that they were defeated by Philip at Chæroneæ. And on that same day, month, and year, the troops which under Archidamus made a descent upon Italy, were cut to pieces by the barbarians. The Carthaginians have set a mark upon the twenty-second of that month as a day that has always brought upon them the greatest calamities.—PLUTARCH'S CAMILLUS.

3362. LUXURY, Employment by. To the Poor. Under the Roman empire, the labor of an industrious and ingenious people was variously but incessantly employed in the service of the rich. In their dress, their table, their houses, and their furniture, the favorites of fortune united every refinement of convenience, of elegance, and of splendor—whatever could soothe their pride or gratify their sensuality. Such refinements, under the odious name of luxury, have been severely arraigned by the moralists of every age; and it might perhaps be more conducive to the virtue, as well as happiness, of mankind, if all possessed the necessaries and none the superfluities of life. But in the present imperfect condition of society, luxury, though it may proceed from vice or folly, seems to be the only means that can correct the unequal distribution of property.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 67.

3363. LUXURY, Dangers of. Puritans. [In 1593] Thomas Nash, whom the Puritans counted among the wicked, . . . [says:] "We must have our tables furnished like poulterers' stalls, or as though we were to victual Noah's Ark again. . . . What a coil have we, this course and that course, removing this dish higher, setting another lower, and taking away the third! A general might in less space move his camp than they standing dispose of their gluttony. . . . From gluttony of meats let me descend to superfluity in drink—a sin that, ever since we mixed ourselves with the low countries, is counted honorable."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 249.

3364. LUXURY denied. Oxford Friars. [St.] Francis made a hard fight against the taste for sumptuous buildings and for greater personal comfort which characterized the time. "I didn't enter into religion to build walls," protested an English provincial when the brethren pressed for a larger house; and Albert of Pisa ordered a stone cloister, which the burgesses of Southampton had built for them, to be razed to the ground. "You need no little mountains to lift your heads to heaven," was his scornful reply to a claim for pillows. None but the sick went shod. An Oxford friar found a pair of shoes one morning, and wore them at matins. At night he dreamed that robbers leapt on him in a dangerous pass between Gloucester and Oxford with shouts of "Kill, kill!" "I am a friar," shrieked the terror-stricken brother. "You lie," was the instant answer, "for you go shod." The friar lifted up his foot in disproof, but the shoe was there. In an agony of repentance he woke and flung the pair out of the window.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 208.

3365. LUXURY, Evil of. Spartans. In . . . the regulation of manners one single principle influenced the whole plan of Lycurgus. Luxury is the bane of society. Let us see in what manner the particular institutions of the Spartan legislator were calculated to guard against that powerful source of corruption. The inequality of possessions was, in the first place, to be corrected, which could not be done without a new partition of territorial property. This was in all probability the greatest of those difficulties which Lycurgus had to encounter.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book I, ch. 9, p. 91.

3366. LUXURY, Excess in. Alexander. [Alexander the Great, after the conquest of Persia,] found that his great officers set no bounds to their luxury, that they were most extravagantly delicate in their diet and profuse in other respects, insomuch that Agnon of Teos wore silver nails in his shoes; Leonatus had many camel loads of earth brought from Egypt to rub himself with when he went to the wrestling-ring; Philotas had hunting-nets that would enclose the space of a hundred furlongs; more made use of rich essences than oil after bathing, and had their grooms of the bath, as well as chamberlains who excelled in bed-making. This degeneracy he reproved with all the temper of a philosopher.—PLUTARCH.

3367. LUXURY misplaced. Romans. [The Romans under Pompey were defeated at Pharsalia by Cæsar.] The camp itself was a singular picture. Houses of turf had been built for the luxurious patricians, with ivy trained over the entrances to shade their delicate faces from the summer sun; couches had been laid out for them to repose on after their expected victory; tables were spread with plate and wines and the daintiest preparations of Roman cookery. Cæsar commented on the scene with mournful irony. "And these men," he said, "accused my patient, suffering army, which had not even common necessities, of dissoluteness and profligacy!"—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 22.

3368. LUXURY, Nauseous. Tobacco. [At Cuba Columbus and his men] for the first time witnessed the use of a weed which the ingenious caprice of man has since converted into an universal luxury, in defiance of the opposition of the senses. They beheld several of the natives going about with firebrands in their hands, and certain dried herbs which they rolled up in a leaf, and lighting one end, put the other in their mouths, and continued exhaling and puffing out the smoke. A roll of this kind they called a tobacco, a name since transferred to the plant of which the rolls were made. The Spaniards, although prepared to meet with wonders, were struck with astonishment at this singular and apparently nauseous indulgence.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 4, ch. 4.

3369. LUXURY and Poverty. Roman. Every age in its decline has exhibited the spectacle of selfish luxury side by side with abject poverty; of—"Wealth, a monster gorged

'Mid starving populations;"

but nowhere and at no period were these contrasts so startling as they were in imperial Rome. There a whole population might be trembling lest they should be starved by the delay of an Alexandrian corn-ship, while the upper classes were squandering a fortune at a single banquet, drinking out of myrrhine and jewelled vases worth hundreds of pounds, and feasting on the brains of peacocks and the tongues of nightingales. As a consequence, disease was rife, men were short-lived. . . . At this very time the dress of Roman ladies displayed an unheard-of splendor. The elder Pliny tells us that he himself saw Lollia Paulina dressed for a betrothal feast in a robe entirely covered with pearls and emeralds, which had cost 40,000,000 sesterces, and which was known to be less costly than some of her other dresses. Gluttony, caprice, extravagance, ostentation, impurity, rioted in the heart of a society which knew of no other means by which to break the monotony of its weariness, or alleviate the anguish of its despair.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 1, p. 3.

3370. LUXURY repudiated. Primitive Christians. They were vainly aspiring to imitate the perfection of angels; . . . disdained, or . . . affected to disdain, every earthly and corporeal delight. Some of our senses, indeed, are necessary for our preservation, others for our subsistence, and others again for our information; and thus far it was impossible to reject the use of them. The first sensation of pleasure was marked as the first moment of their abuse. The unfeeling candidate for heaven was instructed, not only to resist the grosser allurements of the taste or smell, but even to shut his ears against the profane harmony of sounds, and to view with indifference the most finished productions of human art. Gay apparel, magnificent houses, and elegant furniture were supposed to unite the double guilt of pride and of sensuality; a simple and mortified appearance was more suitable to the Christian who was certain of his sins and doubtful of his salvation. In their censures of luxury, the Fathers are extremely minute and circumstantial; and among the various articles which excite their pious indignation, we may enumerate false hair, garments of any color except white, instruments of music, vases of gold or silver, downy pillows (as Jacob reposed his head on a stone), white bread, foreign wines, public salutations, the use of warm baths, and the practice of shaving the beard, which, according to the expression of Tertullian, is a lie against our own faces, and an impious attempt to improve the works of the Creator.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 25, p. 548.

3371. LUXURY, Senseless. Roman Feast. The expense ridiculously bestowed on these entertainments, and the labor employed in collecting the rarest and most costly articles of food, exceeded all belief. In this, as indeed in every other species of luxury, there was the most capricious refinement of extravagance. Suetonius mentions a supper given to Vitellius by his brother, in which, among other articles, there were two thousand of the choicest fishes (lectissimorum piscium), seven thousand of the most delicate birds—one dish, from its size and capacity, was named the egis, or shield of Minerva. It was filled chiefly with the livers of scari (a delicate species of fish), the brains of pheasants and peacocks, the tongues of parrots (imagined, probably, to be tender from their much chattering), and the bellies of lampreys, brought from most distant provinces. This may serve as some specimen of the luxury of the Roman suppers.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 4, p. 450.

3372. LUXURY, Unsatisfying. Baian. [The chagan of the Avars, a barbarian people who invaded Southern Europe.] He wished, at the expense of the emperor, to repose in a golden bed. The wealth of Constantinople and the skillful diligence of her artists were instantly devoted to the gratification of his caprice; but when the work was finished he rejected with scorn a present so unworthy the majesty of a great king.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 46, p. 443.

3373. LYING, Polite. Samuel Johnson. [His study] seemed to be very favorable for retirement and meditation. Johnson told me that he went up thither without mentioning it to his servant when he wanted to study secure from interruption; for he would not allow his servant to say he was not at home when he really was. "A servant's strict regard to truth," said he, "must be weakened by such a practice. A philosopher may know that it is merely a form of denial; but few servants are such nice distinguishers. If I accustom a servant to tell a lie for me, have I not reason to apprehend that he will tell many lies for himself?"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 120.

3374. MACHINERY, Benefits of. Clocks. Eighty years ago a good family clock cost from $75 to $150, and the cheapest clocks made were $25 each. These last were small clocks hung to a nail in the wall, and were wound up by pulling a string. At that time the State of Connecticut already took the lead in the business of clock-making, and we find it mentioned, as a great wonder, that in 1804 three hundred and fifty clocks were made in Connecticut. The business was done in a very simple and primitive manner. A man would get a few clocks finished, then strap four or five on a horse's back, and go off into an adjacent county to sell them, offering them from door to door. At a later date some makers got on so far as to employ one or more agents to travel for them. At the present time Connecticut makes six hundred thousand clocks per annum, and sells most of them at less than $5 each. Before the war some makers sold their cheapest clocks, wholesale, at 50 cents each, their good clocks at $2, and their best at about $4. The marvellous cheapness and excellence of these time-keepers have spread them over the whole earth.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 209.

3375. MACHINERY a Means. Samuel Johnson. Mr. Fergusson, the self-taught philosopher, told him of a new-invented machine which went without horses; a man who sat in it turned a handle, which worked a spring that drove it forward. "Then, sir," said Johnson, "what is gained is, the man has his choice whether he will move himself alone, or himself and the machine too."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 167.

3376. MACHINERY, Triumph of. Clocks. Never have I seen more original and startling mechanical effects than are produced by Jerome's clock-making machinery. Think of one man and one boy sawing veneers enough in one day for three hundred clock-cases! Think of six men making brass wheels enough in a day for one thousand clocks! Think of a factory of twenty-five persons producing two thousand clocks a week! Think of a clock being made for 40 cents! All this is chiefly due to the patience and genius of Chauncey Jerome.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 214.

3377. MADNESS effective. James Otis. [The Massachusetts patriot published a book against the Stamp Act.] The book of Otis was reprinted in England. Lord Mansfield, who had read it, rebuked those who spoke of it with contempt. But they rejoined, "The man is mad!" "What then?" answered Mansfield. "One mad man often makes many. Massaniello was mad—nobody doubted it; yet for all that he overturned the government of Naples."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 10.

3378. MAGIC, Belief in. Columbus. [To the Spaniards the South American Indians seemed versed in sorcery.] Columbus himself entertained an idea of the kind, and assures the sovereigns, in his letter from Jamaica, that the people of Cariari and its vicinity are great enchanters, and he intimates that the two Indian girls who had visited his ship had magic powder concealed about their persons. He adds that the sailors attributed all the delays and hardships experienced on that coast to their being under the influence of some evil spell, worked by the witchcraft of the natives, and that they still remained in that belief.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 14, ch. 3.

3379. MAGNANIMITY, Admirable. Trial of Sir Henry Vane. He had asked for counsel. "Who," cried the solicitor, "will dare to speak for you, unless you can call down from the gibbet the heads of your fellow traitors?" "I stand single," said Vane; "yet, being thus left alone, I am not afraid, in this great presence, to bear my witness to the glorious cause [of popular liberty], nor to seal it with my blood."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 11.

3380. MAGNANIMITY, Noble. General Robert E. Lee. [At the battle of Gettysburg an English officer says:] I saw General Wilcox come up to him, and explain, almost crying, the state of his brigade. General Lee immediately shook hands with him, and said, cheerfully, "Never mind, general, all this has been my fault; it is I that have lost this fight, and you must help me out of it the best way you can." In this way I saw General Lee encourage and reanimate his somewhat dispirited troops, and magnanimously take upon his own shoulders the whole weight of the repulse.—POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, p. 355.

3381. MAGNANIMITY of Savages. Onondagas. A.D. 1687. [Louis XIV. required Iroquois Indians for galley-slaves.] By open hostilities no captives could be made; and Lamberville, the missionary among the Onondagas, was unconsciously employed to decoy the Iroquois chiefs into Fort Ontario. [They were put in irons and sent to France.] . . . Meantime the old men of the Onondagas summoned Lamberville to their presence. "We have much reason," said an aged chief, "to treat thee as an enemy, but we know thee too well. Thou hast betrayed us, but treason was not in thy heart. Fly, therefore, for when our young braves shall have sung their war song they will listen to no voice but the swelling voice of their anger." And trusty guides conducted the missionary through by-paths to a place of security.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 17.

3382. MAGNIFICENCE vs. Happiness. Abdalahmans. [See No. 3383.] In the West the Om-miades of Spain supported, with equal pomp, the title of commander of the faithful. Three miles from Cordova, in honor of his favorite sultana, the third and greatest of the Abdalahmans constructed the city, palace, and gardens of Zehra. Twenty-five years, and above three millions sterling, were employed by the founder; his liberal taste invited the artists of Constantinople, the most skilful sculptors and architects of the age; and the buildings were sustained or adorned by twelve hundred columns of Spanish and African, of Greek and Italian marble. The hall of audience was incrustured with gold and pearls, and a great basin in the centre was surrounded with the curious and costly figures of birds and quadrupeds. In a lofty pavilion of the gardens one of these basins and fountains, so delightful in a sultry climate, was replenished, not with water, but with the purest quicksilver. The seraglio of Abdalahman, his wives, concubines, and black eunuchs amounted to six thousand three hundred persons; and he was attended to the field by a guard of twelve thousand horse, whose belts and cimeters were studded with gold. It may be . . . of some use . . . to transcribe an authentic memorial which was found in the closet of the deceased caliph. "I have now reigned above fifty years in victory or peace, beloved by my subjects, dreaded by my enemies, and respected by my allies. Riches and honors, power and pleasure, have waited on my call, nor does any earthly blessing appear to have been wanting to my felicity. In this situation I have diligently numbered the days of pure and genuine happiness which have fallen to my lot: they amount to fourteen. O man! place not thy confidence in this present world!"—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 52, p. 298.

3383. MAGNIFICENCE, Oriental. At Bagdad. The glories of the [caliph's] court were brightened rather than impaired in the decline of the empire, and a Greek ambassador might admire or pity the magnificence of the feeble Mactader. "The caliph's whole army," says the historian Abulfeda, "both horse and foot, was under arms, which together made a body of 160,000 men. His state officers, the favorite slaves, stood near him in splendid apparel, their belts glittering with gold and gems. Near them were 7000 eunuchs, 4000 of them white, the remainder black. The porters or door-keepers were in number 700. Barges and boats, with the most superb decorations, were seen swimming upon the Tigris. Nor was the palace itself less splendid, in which were hung up 38,000 pieces of tapestry, 12,500 of which were of silk embroidered with gold. The carpets on the floor were 22,000. A hundred lions were brought out, with a keeper to each lion. Among the other spectacles of rare and stupendous luxury was a tree of gold and silver spreading into eighteen large branches, on which, and on the lesser boughs, sat a variety of birds made of the same precious metals, as well as the leaves of the tree. While the machinery affected spontaneous motions, the several birds warbled their natural harmony. Through this scene of magnificence the Greek ambassador was led by the vizier to the foot of [Mactader's] the caliph's throne."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 52, p. 298.

3384. MAGNIFICENCE, Royal. Arcadius. [Emperor of Rome.] The eloquent sermons of St. Chrysostom celebrate, while they condemn.

the pompous luxury of the reign of Arcadius. "The emperor," says he, "wears on his head either a diadem or a crown of gold, decorated with precious stones of inestimable value. These ornaments and his purple garments are reserved for his sacred person alone; and his robes of silk are embroidered with the figures of golden dragons. His throne is of massy gold. Whenever he appears in public he is surrounded by his courtiers, his guards, and his attendants. Their spears, their shields, their cuirasses, the bridles and trappings of their horses, have either the substance or the appearance of gold; and the large splendid boss in the midst of their shield is encircled with smaller bosses, which represent the shape of the human eye. The two mules that draw the chariot of the monarch are perfectly white, and shining all over with gold. The chariot itself, of pure and solid gold, attracts the admiration of the spectators, who contemplate the purple curtains, the snowy carpet, the size of the precious stones, and the resplendent plates of gold, that glitter as they are agitated by the motion of the carriage. The Imperial pictures are white, on a blue ground; the emperor appears seated on his throne, with his arms, his horses, and his guards beside him, and his vanquished enemies in chains at his feet."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 32, p. 323.

3385. MAIDEN, A military. Roman. [Daughter of the Prefect Gregory—African invasion of the Arabs.] The daughter of Gregory, a maid of incomparable beauty and spirit, is said to have fought by his side; from her earliest youth she was trained to mount on horseback, to draw the bow, and to wield the cimeter; and the richness of her arms and apparel were conspicuous in the foremost ranks of the battle. Her hand, with a hundred thousand pieces of gold, was offered for the head of [Abdallah] the Arabian general, and the youths of Africa were excited by the prospect of the glorious prize. At the pressing solicitation of his brethren Abdallah withdrew his person from the field; but the Saracens were discouraged by the retreat of their leader, and the repetition of these equal or unsuccessful conflicts.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 237.

3386. MAIDS detained. Reign of James II. [James was trying to coerce Parliament to grant political relief to the Roman Catholics.] While the contest lasted, the anxiety in London was intense. Every report, every line from Edinburgh, was eagerly devoured. One day the story ran that Hamilton had given way, and that the government would carry every point. Then came intelligence that the Opposition had rallied, and was more obstinate than ever. At the most critical moment orders were sent to the post-office that the bags from Scotland should be transmitted to Whitehall. During a whole week not a single private letter from beyond the Tweed was delivered in London.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 114.

3387. MAJORITY, Rule of. Condemned. Their idea [the people of the north] of government may be briefly stated as the sovereignty of numbers. . . . According to the interpretation of the Yankees, the body politic ought simply to have a political organization to bring out and enforce the will of the majority. . . . The Northern idea was materialistic; it degraded political authority, because it despoiled it of its moral offices, and represented it as an accident determined by a comparison of numbers. It destroyed the virtue of minorities; compelled them to servile acquiescence; . . . it laid the foundations of a despotism more terrible than that of any single tyrant; destroyed moral courage in the people; broke down all the barriers of conservatism, and substituted the phrase, "the majority must govern" for the conscience and justice of society.—POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 18, p. 292.

3388. MAJORITY, An unconquerable. Eng-land. [James II. sought the overthrow of the Established Church and the promotion of the Roman Catholic faith.] The proportion which they bore to the population of England was very much smaller than at present. . . . Forty-nine fiftieths of the inhabitants of the kingdom, forty-nine fiftieths of the property of the kingdom, almost all the political, legal, and military ability and knowledge to be found in the kingdom, were Protestant. Nevertheless, the king, under a strong infatuation, had determined to use his vast patronage as a means of making proselytes. To be of his Church was, in his view, the first of all qualifications for office. To be of the national Church was a positive disqualification.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 219.

3389. MALIGNITY, Parental. To Frederick [the Great]. He asked puzzling questions, and brought forward arguments which seemed to savor of something different from pure Lutheranism. The king suspected that his son was inclined to be a heretic of some sort or other, whether Calvinist or atheist, his Majesty did not very well know. The ordinary malignity of Frederick William was bad enough. He now thought malignity a part of his duty as a Christian man, and all the conscience that he had stimulated his hatred. The flute was broken, the French books were sent out of the palace, the prince was kicked and cudgelled and pulled by the hair. At dinner the plates were hurled at his head; sometimes he was restricted to bread and water, sometimes he was forced to swallow food so nauseous that he could not keep it on his stomach. Once his father knocked him down, dragged him along the floor to a window, and was with difficulty prevented from strangling him with the cord of the curtain. The queen, for the crime of not wishing to see her son murdered, was subjected to the grossest indignities. The Princess Wilhelmina, who took her brother's part, was treated almost as ill as Mrs. Brownrigg's apprentices. Driven to despair, the unhappy youth tried to run away; then the fury of the old tyrant rose to madness. The prince was an officer in the army; his flight was therefore desertion, and, in the moral code of Frederick William, desertion was the highest of all crimes. [Execution would have followed but for the intervention of others.]—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 13.

3390. MAN civilized. Changes in America. [See No. 3398.] Man is still in harmony with nature, which he has subdued, developed, and adorned. For him the rivers that flow to remotest climes mingle their waters; for him the lakes gain new outlets to the ocean; for him the arch spans the flood, and science spreads iron pathways to the recent wilderness; for him the hills yield up the shining marble and the enduring granite; for him immense rafts bring down the forests of the interior ; for him the marts of the city gather the produce of all climes, and libraries collect the works of every language and of every age. The passions of society are chastened into purity ; manners are made benevolent by refinement, and the virtue of the country is the guardian of its peace.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

3391. MAN defined. Plato. Plato had defined man to be a two-legged animal, without feathers. Diogenes plucked the feathers from a cock, and said, Behold Plato's man!—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 270.

3392. MAN degenerated. Unskilful. [Timour the Tartar visited the ruins of Baalbec,] of which he ascribed the construction to demons and genii, not being able to conceive them human, [these] appeared to him to transcend those of Persepolis. He felt some envy toward the unknown sovereigns of these mysterious edifices. "Have mankind, then," said he, "degenerated, or is it that the stones have vegetated after being extracted from the quarries?"—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 322.

3393. MAN, An honest. Estimated. [Cardinal Mazarin estimated Louis XIV. very highly.] "There is enough in him," said he, "to make four kings and one honest man." His powers of application were remarkable. During the whole of his reign he labored regularly in his cabinet for eight hours every day.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 21, § 1.

3394. MAN, Mission of. Stoics. The Stoics believed the universe to be the work of a . . . Being whose providence continually regulates the whole, . . . so as to produce the greatest possible sum of general good ; so they regarded man as a principal instrument in the hand of God to accomplish that great purpose. The Creator, therefore, . . . had so framed the moral constitution of man, that he finds his own chief happiness in promoting the welfare and happiness of his fellow-creatures. In the free consent of man to fulfil this end of his being, by accommodating his mind to the divine will, and thus endeavoring to discharge his part in society with cheerful zeal, with perfect integrity, with manly resolution, and with an entire resignation to the decrees of Providence, lies the sum and essence of his duty.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 279.

3395. MAN, A monster. Bonaparte. [Mr. Jefferson] has given his testimony against the character of Napoleon : . . . "If he could seriously and repeatedly affirm that he had raised himself to power without ever having committed a crime, it proves that he wanted totally the sense of right and wrong. If he could consider the million of human lives that he had destroyed, or caused to be destroyed ; the desolations of countries, by plunderings, burnings, and famine ; the dethronement of lawful rulers of the world, without the consent of their constituents, to place his brothers and sisters on their thrones ; the cutting up of established societies of men, and jumbling them discordantly together at his caprice ; the demolition of the fairest hopes of mankind for the recovery of their rights and the amelioration of their condition ; and all the numberless train of his other enormities—the man, I say, who could consider all these as no crimes, must have been a moral monster, against whom every hand should have been lifted to slay him."—QUOTED FROM TUCKER'S "LIFE OF JEFFERSON," IN KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 10, p. 176.

3396. MAN or a Mouse. A. Robert Morris, of Philadelphia. [The financial helper of Washington during the Revolution afterward engaged in immense speculations, and was ruined.] Washington . . . remonstrated, observing : "You are old ; you had better retire, rather than engage in such extensive concerns." Morris replied, "Your advice is proof of that wisdom and prudence which govern all your words and actions ; but, my dear general, I can never do things in the small ; I must be either a man or a mouse."—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 13.

3397. MAN, Origin of. West Indians. [See No. 2709.] They believed that mankind issued from a . . . cavern, the large men from a great aperture, the small men from a little cranny. They were for a long time destitute of women, but wandering on one occasion near a small lake, they saw certain animals among the branches of the trees, which proved to be women. On attempting to catch them, however, they were found to be as slippery as eels, so that it was impossible to hold them. At length they employed certain men, whose hands were rendered rough by a kind of leprosy. These succeeded in securing four of these slippery females, from whom the world was peopled.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 6, ch. 10.

3398. MAN uncivilized. American Indians. Man, the occupant of the soil, was as untamed as the savage scene, in harmony with the rude nature by which he was surrounded—a vagrant over the continent, in constant warfare with his fellow-men—the bark of the birch his canoes ; strings of shells his ornaments, his record, and his coin ; the roots of uncultivated plants among his resources for food ; his knowledge in architecture surpassed both in strength and durability by the skill of the beaver ; bended saplings the beams of his house ; the branches and rind of trees its roof ; drifts of leaves his couch ; mats of bulrushes his protection against winter's cold ; his religion the adoration of nature ; his morals the promptings of undisciplined intellect ; disputing with the wolves and bears the lordship of the soil, and dividing with the squirrel the wild fruits with which the universal woodlands abounded.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

3399. MANŒUVRES ignored. Directness. [One of Admiral Nelson's frequent injunctions was :] "Never mind manœuvres ; always go at them."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 20, p. 357.

3400. MANHOOD, Complete. Julius Cæsar. In person Cæsar was tall and slight. His features were more refined than was usual in Roman faces ; the forehead was wide and high, the nose large and thin, the lips full, the eyes dark gray like an eagle's, the neck extremely thick and sinewy. His complexion was pale. His beard and mustache were kept carefully shaved. His hair was short and naturally scanty, falling off toward the end of his life and leaving him partially bald. His voice, especially when he spoke in public, was high and shrill. His health was uniformly strong until his last year, when he became subject to epileptic fits. He was a great bather, and scrupulously neat in all his habits, abstemious in his food, and careless in what it consisted, rarely or never touching wine, and noting sobriety as the highest of qualities when describing any new people. He was an athlete in early life, admirable in all manly exercises, and especially in riding. In Gaul, as has been said already, he rode a remarkable horse, which he had bred himself, and which would let no one but Cæsar mount him. From his boyhood it was observed of him that he was the truest of friends, that he avoided quarrels, and was most easily appeased when offended. In manner he was quiet and gentleman-like, with the natural courtesy of high-breeding. On an occasion when he was dining somewhere the other guests found the oil too rancid for them. Cæsar took it without remark, to spare his entertainer's feelings. When on a journey through a forest with his friend Oppius, he came one night to a hut where there was a single bed. Oppius being unwell, Cæsar gave it up to him, and slept on the ground.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 28.

3401. MANHOOD deteriorated. Ancient Greece. [A.D. 396.] Corinth, Argos, Sparta, yielded without resistance to the arms of the Goths; and the most fortunate of the inhabitants were saved, by death, from beholding the slavery of their families and the conflagration of their cities. The vases and statues were distributed among the barbarians, with more regard to the value of the materials than to the elegance of the workmanship; the female captives submitted to the laws of war; the enjoyment of beauty was the reward of valor; and the Greeks could not reasonably complain of an abuse which was justified by the example of the heroic times. The descendants of that extraordinary people, who had considered valor and discipline as the walls of Sparta, no longer remembered the generous reply of their ancestors to an invader more formidable than Alaric. "If thou art a god, thou wilt not hurt those who have never injured thee; if thou art a man, advance, and thou wilt find men equal to thyself."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 30, p. 194.

3402. MANHOOD evinced. Goethe. In Goethe we discover by far the most striking instance, in our time, of a writer who is, in strict speech, what philosophy can call a man. He is neither noble nor plebeian, neither liberal nor servile, nor infidel nor devotee; but the best excellence of all these, joined in pure union—"a clear and universal man." Goethe's poetry is no separate faculty, no mental handicraft, but the voice of the whole harmonious manhood—nay, it is the very harmony, the living and life-giving harmony of that rich manhood which forms his poetry. All good men may be called poets in act or in word; all good poets are so in both.—CARLYLE'S GOETHE, ch. 1.

3403. MANHOOD exhibited. Dr. Rowland Taylor. Taylor, who as a man of mark had been one of the first victims chosen for execution, was arrested in London, and condemned to suffer in his own parish. His wife, "suspecting that her husband should that night be carried away," had waited through the darkness with her children in the porch of St. Botolph's beside Aldgate. "Now when the sheriff his company came against St. Botolph's Church, Elizabeth cried, saying, 'Oh, my poor father! Mother! mother! here is my father led away!' Then cried his wife, 'Rowland, Rowland, where art thou?' for it was a very dark morning, that the one could not see the other. Dr. Taylor answered, 'I am here, dear wife,' and stayed. The sheriff's men would have led him forth, but the sheriff said, 'Stay a little, masters, I pray you, and let him speak to his wife.'" Then came she to him, and he took his daughter Mary in his arms, and he and his wife and Elizabeth knelt down and said the Lord's prayer. At which sight the sheriff wept apace, and so did divers others of the company. After they had prayed he rose up and kissed his wife and shook her by the hand, and said, "Farewell, my dear wife, be of good comfort, for I am quiet in my conscience! God shall still be a father to my children." . . . Then said his wife, "God be with thee, dear Rowland! I will, with God's grace, meet thee at Hadleigh." All the way Dr. Taylor was merry and cheerful as one that accounted himself going to a most pleasant banquet or bridal. . . . Coming within two miles of Hadleigh, he desired to light off his horse, which done he leaped and set a frisk or twain as men commonly do for dancing. "Why, master doctor," quote the sheriff, "how do you now?" He answered, "Well, God be praised, master sheriff, never better; for now I know I am almost at home. I lack not past two stiles to go over, and I am even at my Father's house!"—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 659.

3405. MANHOOD, Honest. Cromwell. We may have too little ceremony as well as too much. It does not matter much, but we do rather like our servant to tap at our study door before coming in, although we do not care about her handing our letters on a silver salver. When ambassadors crowded Cromwell's court from all the States of Europe, some of them, in deference to the usualities of royalty, desired to kiss his hand; but, with manly dignity, he retired back two or three steps higher, to his throne, bowed to the deputation, and so closed the audience. A man, we see, who will not bate an inch of his nation's dignity, nor wear more than his manhood for his own. As he would not adopt the designation, so he would not permit himself to play at being a king.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 15, p. 199.

3406. MANHOOD, Model. George Washington. His faculties were so well balanced and combined that his constitution, free from excess, was tempered evenly with all the elements of activity, and his mind resembled a well-organized commonwealth; his passions, which had the intensest vigor, owned allegiance to reason; and with all the fiery quickness of his spirit, his impetuous and massive will was held in check by consummate judgment. He had in his composition a calm which gave him in moments of highest excitement the power of self-control, and enabled him to excel in patience, even when he had most cause for disgust.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 37.

3407. MANHOOD, Physical. Washington. General Washington stood six feet three in his slippers, and in the prime of his life was rather slender than otherwise, but as straight as an arrow. His form was well-proportioned and evenly developed, so that he carried his tallness gracefully, and looked strikingly well on horseback. There has never been a more active, sinewy figure than his when he was a young man; it was only in later life that his movements became slow and dignified.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 9.

3408. MANHOOD recognized. Ancient Germans. Civil governments, in their first institution, are voluntary associations for mutual defence. To obtain the desired end, it is absolutely necessary that each individual should conceive himself obliged to submit his private opinions and actions to the judgment of the greater number of his associates. The German tribes were contented with this rude but liberal outline of political society. As soon as a youth, born of free parents, had attained the age of manhood, he was introduced into the general council of his countrymen, solemnly invested with a shield and spear, and adopted as an equal and worthy member of the military commonwealth.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 264.

3409. ———. Ancient Germans. The government of the Germanic nations, where a vast number of detached tribes were each under the command of an independent chief, and the condition of individuals, whose almost constant occupation was war, were a necessary cause of that exclusive regard which was paid to the profession of arms, in comparison with which every other employment was esteemed mean and unimportant. It was customary in many nations that the first introduction of youth to the occupations of manhood was attended with peculiar ceremonies and distinguished solemnity; and thus, among the German nations, it was extremely natural that the youth should be introduced with particular ceremonies to that military profession in which he was to be engaged for life. The chief of the tribe, under whose banner all his vassals were to fight, bestowed, himself, the sword and armor upon the young soldier, as a mark that, being conferred by him, they were to be used at his command, and for his service alone.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 10, p. 167.

3410. MANHOOD tested. William of Orange. If his battles were not those of a great tactician, they entitled him to be called a great man. No disaster could for one moment deprive him of his firmness or of the entire possession of all his faculties. . . . He was proved by every test; by war, by wounds, by painful and depressing maladies, by raging seas, by the imminent and constant risk of assassination, a risk which has shaken very strong nerves, a risk which severely tried even the adamant fortitude of Cromwell; yet none could ever discover what that thing was which the Prince of Orange feared. His advisers could with difficulty induce him to take any precaution against the pistols and jaggers of conspirators. Old sailors were amazed at the composure which he preserved amid roaring breakers on a perilous coast. In battle his bravery made him conspicuous even among tens of thousands of brave warriors, drew forth the generous applause of hostile armies, and was never questioned even by the injustice of hostile factions. During his first campaigns he exposed himself like a man who sought for death; was always foremost in the charge and last in the retreat; fought, sword in hand, in the thickest press; and with a musket ball in his arm and the blood streaming over his cuirass still stood his ground and waved his hat under the hottest fire.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 154.

3411. MANIA, Popular. Crusaders. [In 1096] the peasant shod his oxen like horses, and, yoking them to a cart, migrated with his wife and children; and the children, whenever they approached a town, cried out, "Is this Jerusalem?" Lands were abandoned. Houses and chattels were sold for ready money by townsmen and husbandmen. The passion to reach Jerusalem extinguished all ordinary love of gain and absorbed every other motive for exertion. . . . The desire to see that land, if not possess it, went through the most remote parts of Christian Europe. . . . As they passed through the populous cities of Germany the spirit of fanatical hatred . . . incited the multitude to pillage and massacre the Jews.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 16, p. 228.

3412. MANKIND distrusted. Charles II. was addicted beyond measure to sensual indulgence, fond of sauntering and of frivolous amusements, incapable of self-denial and of exertion, without faith in human virtue or in human attachment, without desire of renown, and without sensibility to reproach. According to him, every person was to be bought. But some people haggled more about their price than others; and when this haggling was very obstinate and very skilful, it was called by some fine name. The chief trick by which clever men kept up the price of their abilities was called integrity. The chief trick by which handsome women kept up the price of their beauty was called modesty. . . . Thinking thus of mankind, Charles naturally cared very little what they thought of him. Honor and shame were scarcely more to him than light and darkness to the blind.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 156.

3413. MANKIND, Inequality of. Samuel Johnson. On his favorite subject of subordination, Johnson said: "So far is it from being true that men are naturally equal, that no two people can be half an hour together but one shall acquire an evident superiority over the other."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 142.

3414. MANKIND, Prosperity of. Age. If a man were called to fix the period in the history of the world during which the condition of the human race was most happy and prosperous, he would, without hesitation, name that which elapsed from the death of Domitian to the accession of Commodus. The vast extent of the Roman Empire was governed by absolute power, under the guidance of virtue and wisdom.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 3, p. 95.

3415. MANNERS, Blunt. Diogenes. The bluntness of his manners was exemplified in his celebrated answer to Alexander the Great, who, coming to visit the philosopher, and finding him seated in his tub, asked if he could do him any favor. "Yes," said the other, "stand from between me and the sun."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 271.

3416. MANNERS changed. Romans. These Asiatic conquests were, in a moral point of view, much more prejudicial than advantageous to the Romans. Their simple and austere manners began gradually to relax, and they acquired a relish for luxurious enjoyments. This change in the manners of his countrymen roused the virtuous indignation of Cato the Censor, the determined enemy of every species of luxury and corruption. At the time when Hannibal was ravaging Italy, and when the Roman state had the strongest motive to retrench all superfluous expenses, a sumptuary statute, called the Oppian law, was passed, which prohibited the women from the use of gold in their ornaments, beyond the quantity of half an ounce, and from wearing garments of different colors, and likewise interdicted the use of chariots. At the end of the Second Punic War the Roman ladies used all their influence to have this law repealed, urging that the motive for its enactment no longer existed. So earnest were they in their purpose, that, forgetting that modest reserve which is their sex's highest ornament, they rushed out into the streets, and besetting every avenue to the forum, laid hold of the men as they passed, and endeavored, both by clamor and by blandishments, to engage their votes for the abrogation of this odious statute. It was no wonder that the rigid virtue of old Cato, then consul, was inflamed with indignation at this spectacle.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9, p. 378.

3417. MANNERS, Effects of. Samuel Johnson. The difference, he observed, between a well-bred and an ill-bred man is this: "One immediately attracts your liking, the other your aversion. You love the one till you find reason to hate him; you hate the other till you find reason to love him."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 530.

3418. ———. Samuel Johnson. I had the resolution to ask Johnson whether he thought that the roughness of his manner had been an advantage or not, and if he would not have done more good if he had been more gentle. JOHNSON: "No, sir; I have done more good as I am. Obscenity and impiety have always been repressed in my company." BOSWELL: . . . "Greater liberties have been taken in the presence of a bishop, though a very good man, from his being milder, and therefore not commanding such awe. Yet, sir, many people who might have been benefited by your conversation have been frightened away. A worthy friend of ours has told me that he has often been afraid to talk to you." JOHNSON: "Sir, he need not have been afraid, if he had anything rational to say. If he had not, it was better he did not talk."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 523.

3419. MANNERS neglected. Samuel Johnson. The late Alexander, Earl of Eglintoun, who loved wit more than wine, and men of genius more than sycophants, had a great admiration of Johnson; but from the remarkable elegance of his own manners was, perhaps, too delicately sensible of the roughness which sometimes appeared in Johnson's behavior. . . . He regretted that Johnson had not been educated with more refinement, and lived more in polished society. "No, no, my lord," said Signior Baretto, "do with him what you would, he would always have been a bear." "True," answered the earl, with a smile, "but he would have been a dancing bear." [Goldsmith said:] "Johnson, to be sure, has a roughness in his manners; but no man alive has a more tender heart. He has nothing of the bear but his skin."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 159.

3420. MANNERS, Plain. George Fox the Quaker. A.D. 1649. About two years and a half from the day when Cromwell went on his knees to kiss the hand of the young boy who was Duke of York, the Lord, who sent George Fox into the world, forbade him to put off his hat to any, high or low, and he was required to thee and thou all men and women, without any respect to rich or poor, to great or small.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 16.

3421. MANNERS, Unrefined. Johnson. He observed: "The great in France live very magnificently, but the rest very miserably. There is no happy middle state, as in England. The shops of Paris are mean; the meat in the markets is such as would be sent to a jail in England; and Mr. Thrale justly observed that the cookery of the French was forced upon them by necessity; for they could not eat their meat, unless they added same taste to it. The French are an indelicate people; they will spit upon any place. At Madame——'s, a literary lady of rank, the footman took the sugar in his fingers, and threw it into my coffee. I was going to put it aside: but hearing it was made on purpose for me, I e'en tasted Tom's fingers. The same lady would needs make tea à l'Anglaise. The spout of the teapot did not pour freely; she bade the footman blow into it."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 264.

3422. MANNERS, Urbane. Charles II. The morning light began to peep through the windows of Whitehall, and Charles desired the attendants to pull aside the curtains, that he might have one more look at the day. He remarked that it was time to wind up a clock which stood near his bed. These little circumstances were long remembered, because they proved beyond dispute that, when he declared himself a Roman Catholic, he was in full possession of his faculties. He apologized to those who had stood round him all night for the trouble which he had caused. He had been, he said, a most unconscionable time dying, but he hoped that they would excuse it. This was the last glimpse of that exquisite urbanity, so often found potent to charm away the resentment of a justly incensed nation.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 408.

3423. MANUFACTURES, Exhibition of. Boston Common. A.D. 1754. At Boston a society was formed for promoting domestic manufactures; on one of its anniversaries three hundred young women appeared on the common, clad in homespun, seated in a triple row, each with a spinning-wheel, and each busily transferring the flax from the distaff to the spool.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 4.

3424. MANUFACTURES fostered. Flemish. After the establishment of the great mart of Bruges, the Flemings began to apply their whole industry to the establishment of manufactures, and Baldwin, the young Count of Flanders, encouraged this spirit by bestowing privileges and immunities on the merchants and manufacturers. His successors, however, possessed a very different spirit; they recalled these immunities; and the consequence was, that the manufacturers left Flanders and settled in Brabant, where the dukes of that province showed them for some time all manner of favor. This, however, did not long continue. The revocation of their immunities, by some impolitic sovereigns of that province, banished trade and manufactures from Brabant, as it had done from Flanders.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 17, p. 262.

3425. MANUFACTURES, Monopoly in. Hatters. In the land of furs it was found that hats were well made; the London company of hatters remonstrated; and their craft was protected by an act forbidding hats to be transported from one plantation to another. . . . "None of the plantations should manufacture iron wares of any kind whatsoever;" and the house of peers added a clause prohibiting every "forge going by water for making bar or rod iron."—BANCROFT'S U. S.

3426. MANUFACTURES restricted. Reign of Charles II. As early as the reign of Elizabeth there had been loud complaints that whole forests were cut down for the purpose of feeding the furnaces, and the Parliament had interfered to prohibit the manufacturers from burning timber. The manufacture consequently languished. At the close of the reign of Charles II. great part of the iron which was used in the country was imported from abroad.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 296.

3427. MARCHING, Prodigious. Spartans. After the battle had been fought [at Marathon], but while the dead bodies were yet on the ground, the promised re-enforcement from Sparta arrived. Two thousand Lacedæmonian spearmen, starting immediately after the full moon, had marched the hundred and fifty miles between Athens and Sparta in the wonderfully short time of three days. Though too late to share in the glory of the action, they requested to be allowed to march to the battle-field to behold the Medes. They proceeded thither, gazed on the dead bodies of the invaders, and then, praising the Athenians and what they had done, they returned to Lacedæmon.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 48.

3428. MARINER, Famous. Discovery of America. The enterprise of Columbus, the most memorable maritime enterprise in the history of the world, formed between Europe and America the communication which will never cease.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 1.

3429. MARINERS, Cautious. Portuguese. Till the middle of the fifteenth century none of the nations of Europe had ventured to sail out of the sight of their coasts. Their vessels were flat-bottomed and extremely shallow; and as they followed in their navigation every turning of the coast, which exposed them continually to shifting and contrary winds, it was not unusual that a voyage, which would now be performed in a few months, lasted at that time four or five years. We have already remarked the very limited knowledge which the Greeks and Romans possessed of the habitable globe. The Eastern Ocean was known only by name, and the Atlantic scarcely attempted out of the sight of the coast of Europe. It was supposed that all to the west was an immense extent of ocean.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 18, p. 266.

3430. MARKSMAN, Royal. Commodus. The Emperor Commodus, elated with praise which gradually extinguished the innate sense of shame, resolved to exhibit before the eyes of the Roman people those exercises which till then he had decently confined within the walls of his palace, and to the presence of a few favorites. On the appointed day the various motives of flattery, fear, and curiosity attracted to the amphitheatre an innumerable multitude of spectators; and some degree of applause was deservedly bestowed on the uncommon skill of the imperial performer. Whether he aimed at the head or heart of the animal, the wound was alike certain and mortal. With arrows whose point was shaped into the form of a crescent, Commodus often intercepted the rapid career, and cut asunder the long, bony neck of the ostrich. A panther was let loose; and the archer waited till he had leaped upon a trembling malefactor. In the same instant the shaft flew, the beast dropped dead, and the man remained unhurt. The dens of the amphitheatre disgorged at once a hundred lions; a hundred darts from the unerring hand of Commodus laid them dead as they ran raging around the Arena. Neither the huge bulk of the elephant nor the scaly hide of the rhinoceros could defend them from his stroke. Æthiopia and India yielded their most extraordinary productions; and several animals were slain in the amphitheatre, which had been seen only in the representations of art, or perhaps of fancy. In all these exhibitions the securest precautions were used to protect the person of the Roman Hercules from the desperate spring of any savage, who might possibly disregard the dignity of the emperor and the sanctity of the god.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4, p. 113.

3431. MARRIAGE, Ceremony of. From the Romans. Our marriage ceremonies are all Roman—the ring, the veil, the wedding gifts, the groomsmen and bridesmaids, the bride-cake.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 3, p. 49.

3432. MARRIAGE cheap. Alexander Keith. [The Rev. Alexander Keith, soon after the passage of the Marriage act, had the reputation of marrying very cheap.] Many came to be married when they had half a crown in their pockets and sixpence to buy a pot of beer, and for which they had pawned some of their clothes. . . . His motto was, "Happy is the wooing that is not long a-doing." . . . Six thousand a year were married at his chapel.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 12, p. 194.

3433. MARRIAGE, Choice in. Samuel Johnson. BOSWELL: "Pray, sir, do you not suppose that there are fifty women in the world, with any one of whom a man may be as happy, as with any one woman in particular?" JOHNson: "Ay, sir, fifty thousand." BOSWELL: "Then, sir, you are not of opinion with some who imagine that certain men and certain women are made for each other, and that they cannot be happy if they miss their counterparts." JOHNSON: "To be sure not, sir. I believe marriages would in general be as happy, and often more so, if they were all made by the Lord Chancellor, upon a due consideration of the characters and circumstances, without the parties having any choice in the matter."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 283.

3434. MARRIAGE by Coercion. William Wat. Auld Wat's son William, captured by Sir Gideon Murray, of Elibank, during a raid of the Scotts on Sir Gideon's lands, was, as tradition says, given his choice between being hanged on Sir Gideon's private gallows, and marrying the ugliest of Sir Gideon's three ugly daughters, Meikle-mouthed Meg, reputed as carrying off the prize of ugliness among the women of four counties. Sir William was a handsome man. He took three days to consider the alternative proposed to him, but he chose life with the large-mouthed lady in the end; and found her, according to the tradition which the poet, her descendant, has transmitted, an excellent wife, with a fine talent for picking the beef which her husband stole from the herds of his foes. Meikle-mouthed Meg transmitted a distinct trace of her large mouth to all her descendants, and not least to him who was to use his "meikle" mouth to best advantage as the spokesman of his race [Sir Walter Scott].—HUTTON'S LIFE OF SCOTT, ch. 1.

3435. MARRIAGE declined. Queen Elizabeth. [Queen Elizabeth was urged by the House of Commons to become a married woman. She strongly expressed her constant preference for the unmarried state.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 8, p. 109.

3436. MARRIAGE, Denial of. Honorio. The sister of Valentinian [the Roman emperor] was educated in the palace of Ravenna; and as her marriage might be productive of some danger to the State she was raised, by the title of Augusta, above the hopes of the most presumptuous subject. But the fair Honorio had no sooner attained the sixteenth year of her age than she detested the importunate greatness which must forever exclude her from the comforts of honorable love. In the midst of vain and unsatisfactory pomp Honorio sighed, yielded to the impulse of nature, and threw herself into the arms of her chamberlain Eugenius. Her guilt and shame (such is the absurd language of imperious man) were soon betrayed by the appearances of pregnancy; but the disgrace of the royal family was published to the world by the imprudence of the Empress Placidia.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 25, p. 431.

3437. MARRIAGE, A detested. Mary Queen of Scots. [After Mary Queen of Scots had secured, as was believed, the murder of her first husband, she soon called upon Craig, a Protestant minister, to proclaim the bans of matrimony between herself and Bothwell, which he did in the High Church, adding,] I take heaven and earth to witness that I abhor and detest this marriage.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 9, p. 147.

3438. MARRIAGE, Disappointment in. David Crockett. He soon fell in love again, at a ball, and, before the evening was finished, he was engaged to be married, and a day was appointed for him to announce the fact to the girl's parents. On the appointed day he started for the young lady's abode, but falling in on the way with a gay party, he spent the whole night in a frolic; and when, the next morning, he approached the house of his lady-love, he learned that she was to be married that evening to another man. His riding-whip slipped from his hand, his jaw fell, and he sat on his horse staring wildly at his informant. He recovered his spirits, however, went to the wedding, and danced all night, the merriest of the merry.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 666.

3439. MARRIAGE dishonored. Time of Nero. Family life among the Romans had once been a sacred thing, and for five hundred and twenty years divorce had been unknown among them. Under the empire marriage had come to be regarded with disfavor and disdain. Women, as Seneca says, were married in order to be divorced, and were divorced in order to marry; and noble Roman matrons counted the years, not by the consuls, but by their discarded or discarding husbands.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, p. 5.

3440. MARRIAGE, Dowry in. "Oxen." At the age of twelve [Abyssinian] youths entertain views of matrimony. Oxen form the basis of their selection—that is to say, they marry the girl whose father can provide them with the most oxen. The chosen fair one need not be over nine years of age.—APPLETON'S CYCLOPEDIA, "ABYSSINIA."

3441. MARRIAGE, Early. Eight Years Old. [In 1396 Richard II., a widower, married Isabella, daughter of the King of France, she being only eight years old.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 2, p. 27.

3442. — — —. Mahomet. Ayesha . . . was doubtless a virgin, since Mahomet consummated his nuptials (such is the premature ripeness of the climate) when she was only nine years old.—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 55.

3443. MARRIAGE encouraged. Origin. The first sovereigns of all nations are said to have instituted marriage—Menes, the first king of Egypt; Fohi, the first sovereign of China; Cecrops, the first legislator of the Greeks. The earliest laws of many civilized nations likewise provided encouragements for matrimony. By the Jewish law a married man was for the first year exempted from going to war and excused from the burden of any public office. Among the Peruvians he was free for a year from the payment of all taxes. The respect for the matrimonial union cannot be more clearly evinced than by the severity with which the greater part of the ancient nations restrained the crime of adultery.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 3, p. 23.

3444. MARRIAGE excused. Henry VIII. His fourth wife was Anne of Cleves, who did not retain his affections above nine months. He represented to his clergy that at the time he married her he had not given his inward consent; but it is less surprising that a monarch of this character should urge such an excuse, than that his clergy and Parliament should sustain it. Anne was divorced.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 20, p. 303.

3445. MARRIAGE, Extraordinary. John Howard. In his twenty-fifth year he had a long and dangerous illness. When he was first seized he was living in lodgings near London, where he fancied he was not treated with the attention his case demanded. He consequently removed to the house of a widow, who was herself a confirmed invalid, and fifty-two years of age. This lady, who possessed a small independence, nursed him during many months with such tender care that he felt toward her an unbounded gratitude, and upon his recovery he offered her his hand. . . . This singular marriage between a man of twenty-five and a woman of fifty-two was productive, as Howard always averred, of nothing but happiness. After two years and a half of tranquil felicity the lady died.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 83.

3446. MARRIAGE, A forced. Princess Anne. [In 1490 Maximilian, King of the Romans, wanted the Princess Anne, the rich heiress of Francis, and with her the duchy of Brittany; and she entered into a contract of marriage with him.] Charles of France now put forth his pretensions to the hand of the lady. The contract was void, he said, because Brittany was a fief of France, and the lord could control the marriage of an heiress who was his vassal. The argument was supported by the emphatic presence of a French army; the princess, who resisted till resistance was no longer possible, was forced into a marriage which she hated and into the conclusion of a treaty which placed the province, so long independent, under French rule.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 13, p. 217.

3447. MARRIAGE, A fortunate. John Adams. He was admitted to the bar, and, returning to his father's house, endeavored to set up in the practice of his profession. His father lived then at Braintree, a small and obscure town fourteen miles from Boston, where there was very little chance for a young lawyer. For some years his gains were small and his anxieties severe. It was not until after his father's death that his circumstances were alleviated, and he was enabled to marry. His marriage was one of the most fortunate ever contracted in this world; for not only was the lady one of the most amiable and accomplished of women, but, being a member of a numerous and influential family, she brought to her husband a great increase of business. He was then twenty-nine years of age.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 175.

3448. MARRIAGE, Happy. Peter Cooper. In 1814, before the war ended, he contracted that exquisite marriage which gave him fifty-five years of domestic happiness, as complete, as unalloyed, as mortals can ever hope to enjoy. It is believed by members of his family that during that long period of time there was never an act done or a word spoken by either of them which gave pain to the other. They began their married life on a humble scale indeed. When a cradle became necessary, and he was called upon to rock it oftener than was convenient, he invented a self-rocking cradle, with a fan attachment, which he patented, and sold the patent for a small sum.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 572.

3449. MARRIAGE in Heaven. Swedenborg. Swedenborg, in his treatise on Conjugal Love, first speaks of marriages in heaven. He shows that a man lives a man after death, and that a woman lives a woman; and since it was ordained from creation that the woman should be for the man, and the man for the woman, and thus that each should be the other's, and since that love is innate in both, it follows that there are marriages in heaven as well as on earth. Marriage in the heavens is the conjunction of two into one mind. The mind of man consists of two parts, the understanding and the will. When these two parts act in unity, they are called one mind. The understanding is predominant in man, and the will in woman; but in the marriage of minds there is no predominance, for the will of the wife becomes also the will of the husband, and the understanding of the husband is also that of the wife; because each loves to will and to think as the other wills and thinks, and thus they will and think mutually and reciprocally. Hence their conjunction; so that in heaven two married partners are not called two, but one angel.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 22, p. 191.

3450. MARRIAGE, Ill-chosen. Catherine of Russia. [She was the daughter of a German prince, and married Peter, a dissipated, vulgar, cowardly Russian prince.] On arriving at Moscow, in her fifteenth year, she was presented to her future husband, and, it is said, conceived for him so profound a disgust that she fell sick, and was unable to reappear in public for several weeks. She submitted, however, to her fate, and, after being baptized into the Greek Church under the name of Catherine, she was married to the imperial prince—he being seventeen years of age, and she sixteen. Seldom has there been a more ill-assorted union. Catherine was born to command, Peter was born to serve. She was a young lady of wit, information, and good breeding; he knew no pleasures beyond those which he could enjoy in common with the besotted officers of the Imperial Guard.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 403.

3451. MARRIAGE, Ill-mated second. Louis XII. The young Princess Mary, the sister of the English king, was married to the widowed Louis. But this hasty match was followed by unforeseen and melancholy consequences. The king, whose health was declining, had for some time restricted himself to the simplest and most regular habits of life, dining early, and retiring to rest at sunset. In the society of his beautiful and light-hearted bride he was now induced to engage in a round of exciting festivities, ill suited to his years and infirmities; his strength rapidly failed during the autumn, and he expired at the palace of the Tournelles, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, on the 1st of January, 1515.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 13, § 9.

3452. MARRIAGE, Imported for. Virginians. In this condition of affairs Smith was superseded by Sir Edwyn Sandys, a man of great prudence and integrity. . . . By the influence of Sandys and his friends ninety young women of good breeding and modest manners were induced to emigrate to Jamestown. In the following year sixty others of similar good character came over, and received a hearty welcome. The statement that the early Virginians bought their wives is absurd. All that was done was this: when Sandys sent the first company of women to America, he charged the colonists with the expense of the voyage, a measure made necessary by the fact that the company was almost bankrupt. An assessment was made according to the number who were brought over, and the rate fixed at a hundred and twenty pounds of tobacco for each passenger—a sum which the settlers cheerfully paid. The many marriages that followed were celebrated in the usual way, and nothing further was thought of the transaction. When the second shipload came, the cost of transportation was reported at a hundred and fifty pounds for each passenger, which was also paid without complaint.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 11, p. 111.

3453. MARRIAGE, Inauspicious. Andrew Jackson's. [Young lawyer Jackson boarded with Mrs. Donelson at Nashville, Tenn.] He soon discovered that Mrs. Robards [her daughter] lived very unhappily with her husband, who was a man of violent temper and most jealous disposition. Young Jackson had not long resided in the family before Mr. Robards began to be jealous of him, and many violent scenes took place between them. The jealous Robards at length abandoned his wife, and went off to his old home in Kentucky, leaving Jackson master of the field. . . . A rumor soon after reached the place that Robards had procured a divorce from his wife in the legislature of Virginia, soon after which Andrew Jackson and Rachel Donelson were married. The rumor proved to be false, and they lived together for two years before a divorce was really granted, at the end of which time they were married again. This marriage, though so inauspiciously begun, was an eminently happy one, although out of doors it caused the irascible Jackson a great deal of trouble. [See No. 105.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 534.

3454. MARRIAGE, Incestuous. Ancient. The freedom of love and marriage was restrained among the Romans by natural and civil impediments. An instinct, almost innate and universal, appears to prohibit the incestuous commerce of parents and children in the infinite series of ascending and descending generations. Concerning the oblique and collateral branches, nature is indifferent, reason mute, and custom various and arbitrary. In Egypt the marriage of brothers and sisters was admitted without scruple or exception; a Spartan might espouse the daughter of his father, an Athenian that of his mother; and the nuptials of an uncle with his niece were applauded at Athens as a happy union of the dearest relations.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 35.

3455. MARRIAGE, Indecent. Queen of Scots. To satisfy the public opinion, however, Bothwell was tried by his peers for the murder of Darnley, and no evidence being brought against him, he was absolved by the verdict of a jury. The queen, who had never believed him guilty, had now, as she thought, a perfect assurance of his innocence. He stood high in her favor, and, prompted by ambition, began to aspire at the dangerous honor of obtaining her hand in marriage. These views being known to Murray and his associates, seemed to afford, at length, a most promising means for accomplishing the ruin of Mary, and throwing into their hands the government of the kingdom. It now, therefore, became their great object to bring about the marriage of Bothwell with the queen; a formal deed, or bond, was for that purpose framed by the Earl of Morton and the chief nobility of his party, recommending Bothwell, in the strongest terms, as the most proper person she could choose for a husband. Mary gave in to the snare; she married Bothwell, a measure which is the most indefensible part of her conduct; for however she might have been persuaded of his innocence, of which this request of her chief nobility was certainly a very strong testimony, yet the public voice still pointed him out as an associate in the murder of her husband; and to marry this man was a measure as indecent as it was ruinous and impolitic.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 28, p. 387.

3456. MARRIAGE to Industry. Sabines. When the Sabines, after the war with the Romans, were reconciled, conditions were obtained for the women, that they should not be obliged by their husbands to do any other work beside spinning. It was customary therefore, ever after, that they who gave the bride, or conducted her home, or were present on the occasion, should cry out, amid the mirth of the wedding, "Talasius," intimating that she was not to be employed in any other labor but that of spinning.—PLUTARCH'S ROMULUS.

3457. MARRIAGE, Informal. Duke of Monmouth. [The day before his execution for rebellion bishops Ken and Turner visited the prisoner.] He maintained that his connection with Lady [Henrietta] Wentworth was blameless in the sight of God. He had been married, he said, when a child. He had never cared for his duchess. The happiness which he had not found at home he had sought in a round of loose amours, condemned by religion and morality. Henrietta had reclaimed him from a life of vice. To her he had been strictly constant. They had, by common consent, offered up fervent prayers for the Divine guidance. After those prayers they had found their affection for each other strengthened; and they could then no longer doubt that, in the sight of God, they were a wedded pair. The bishops were so much scandalized by this view of the conjugal relation that they refused to administer the sacrament to the prisoner.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 577.

3458. MARRIAGE, Irregular. Robert Burns. Jean Armour, the daughter of a respectable master-mason in that village, had the chief place in his affections. All through 1785 their courtship had continued, but early in 1786 a secret and irregular marriage, with a written acknowledgment of it, had to be effected. Then followed the father's indignation that his daughter should be married to so wild and worthless a man as Burns; compulsion of his daughter to give up Burns, and to destroy the document which vouched their marriage; Burns' despair driving him to the verge of insanity; the letting loose by the Armours of the terrors of the law against him; his skulking for a time in concealment; his resolve to emigrate to the West Indies, and become a slave-driver. . . . In September of the same year Jean Armour became the mother of twin children.—SHAIRP'S BURNS, ch. 1.

3459. MARRIAGE, Kingdom for. Earl Godwin. [In 1042 Earl Godwin forced his daughter Edith upon Edward the Confessor, the king of about half of England, a man of forty, saying,] Swear to me that you will take my daughter for your wife, and I will give you the kingdom of England. [Edward was unwilling to receive the kingdom with such an encumbrance.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 12, p. 167.

3460. MARRIAGE, Loose. Romans. Marriage, which under the ancient Romans was the most sacred of ties, had become the lightest and the loosest. Cicero divorced Terentia when she was old and ill-tempered, and married a young woman. Cato made over his Marcia, the mother of his children, to his friend Hortensius, and took her back as a wealthy widow when Hortensius died. Pompey put away his first wife at Sylla's bidding, and took a second, who was already the wife of another man. Cæsar, when little more than a boy, dared the Dictator's displeasure rather than condescend to a similar compliance.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 12.

3461. MARRIAGE, Mediation in. Isaac Newton. One Mr. Smith, a clergyman of the neighborhood, who had a good estate, having attained middle age, and being still a bachelor, one of his parishioners advised him to marry. He replied that he did not know where to get a good wife. "The widow Newton," said his friend, "is an extraordinary good woman." "But," said the clergyman, "how do I know she will have me? and I don't care to ask and be denied. But if you will go and ask her, I'll pay you for your day's work." The gentleman having performed his errand, Mrs. Newton answered that she would be guided in the affair by the advice of her brother. Upon receiving this answer, the clergyman despatched him to the brother, with whom the marriage was arranged.—PARTON'S NEWTON, p. 74.

3462. MARRIAGE, Meekness in. "Count Rumford." [Benjamin Thompson, of Massachusetts, was Count of the Holy Roman Empire.] In Concord, at the time of Thompson's arrival, there dwelt the widow of a Colonel Rolfe with her infant son. Her husband had died in December, 1771, leaving a large estate. . . . Rumford, somewhat ungallantly, told his friend Pictet in after years that she married him rather than he her. She was obviously a woman of decision. As soon as they were engaged, an old curriole, left by her father, was fished up, and, therein mounted, she carried her betrothed to Boston, and committed him to the care of the tailor and the hairdresser. This journey involved a drive of sixty miles. On the return they called at the house of Thompson's mother, who, when she saw him, is reported to have exclaimed, "Why, Ben, my son, how could you go and lay out all your winter's earnings in finery?" Thompson was nineteen when he married, his wife being thirty-three.—TYNDALL'S COUNT RUMFORD.

3463. MARRIAGE, Modes of. Romans. There were three different modes by which marriage could be contracted among the Romans. The marriages of the patricians were celebrated in the presence of ten witnesses, and with a variety of religious ceremonies peculiar to their order. The plebeians married after two different forms: the one was by a species of sale, emptio venditio; and the other by the simple cohabitation of the parties for a year, which by law constituted a marriage.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 6, p. 340.

3465. ———. Lord Byron. Having squandered his own fortune and that of his first wife, and incurred immense debts, he cast his eyes upon Miss Catherine Gordon, a silly, romantic Scotch girl of ancient family and large fortune, and openly avowed his intention to marry her for the sole purpose of paying off his debts. In money, stocks and land, the young lady possessed property equal to about a quarter of a million of our dollars, all of which, with her hand and heart, she bestowed upon this handsome, fascinating, and despicable debauchee. Before the honeymoon was over a crowd of creditors came upon the husband of this fine estate. First, all the ready money was paid away—£3000. Next went the bank stock and fishery shares—£1000 more. Then, £1500 worth of timber was cut from the estate and sold. Next, £8000 were raised by a mortgage on the estate, and all paid to creditors. Finally, when they had been married less than two years, the estate was sold, and all the money which it yielded was poured into the bottomless pit of Captain Byron's debts, except a small sum necessary to secure Mrs. Byron the annual pittance named above. When he had wrung from her all that she possessed, and even made away with part of her little annuity, he abandoned her and went off to the continent, leaving to her care their only son, a boy three years of age. . . . She loved him to the last.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 290.

3466. ———. Chivalry. The old days were passed, when the knight knelt at the feet of his lady-love, and went forth to the tournament to challenge men to produce her equal in beauty and virtue. The knight now ascertained what portion the lady's father would give, and he bargained for the uttermost crown. The mother made no hesitation in speaking boldly to a powerful person for a daughter, "to get for her one good marriage if he knew any." [A.D. 1450-1485.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 8, p. 123.

3467. MARRIAGE without Money. Themistocles. Two citizens courting his daughter, he preferred the worthy man to the rich one, and assigned this reason—he had rather she should have a man without money than money without a man.—PLUTARCH'S CICERO.

3468. MARRIAGE, Morals in. Samuel Johnson. "In religion men and women do not concern themselves much about difference of opinion; and ladies set no value on the moral character of men who pay their addresses to them; the greatest profligate will be as well received as the man of the greatest virtue, and this by a very good woman, by a woman who says her prayers three times a day." Our ladies endeavored to defend their sex from this charge, but he roared them down. "No, no; a lady will take Jonathan Wild as readily as St. Austin, if he has three-pence more; and, what is worse, her parents will give her to him. Women have a perpetual envy of our vices; they are less vicious than we, not from choice, but because we restrict them; they are the slaves of order and fashion; their virtue is of more consequence to us than our own, so far as concerns this world."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 522.

3469. ——. Needful. When a proposal was made to Oliver Cromwell that Charles [II.] should marry his daughter, the Protector objected his "debauched life" as an insuperable difficulty.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 14, p. 231.

3470. MARRIAGE, Name by. Charles II. Charles, while a wanderer on the Continent, had fallen in at the Hague with Lucy Walters, a Welsh girl of great beauty, but of weak understanding and dissolute manners. She became his mistress, and presented him with a son. A suspicious lover might have had his doubts; for the lady had several admirers, and was not supposed to be cruel to any. Charles, however, readily took her word, and poured forth on little James Crofts, as the boy was then called, an overflowing fondness, such as seemed hardly to belong to that easy but cool and careless nature. Soon after the Restoration the young favorite, who had learned in France the exercises then considered necessary to a fine gentleman, made his appearance at Whitehall. He was lodged in the palace, attended by pages, and permitted to enjoy several distinctions which had till then been confined to princes of the blood royal. He was married, while still in tender youth, to Anne Scott, heiress of the noble house of Buccleuch. He took her name, and received with her hand possession of her ample domains.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 233.

3471. MARRIAGE, Promoted by. By Government. Majorian, the Roman emperor, conceived that it was his interest to increase the number of his subjects, and that it was his duty to guard the purity of the marriage-bed; but the means which he employed to accomplish these salutary purposes are of an ambiguous and perhaps exceptionable kind. The pious maids, who consecrated their virginity to Christ, were restrained from taking the veil till they had reached their fortieth year. Widows under that age were compelled to form a second alliance within the term of five years, by the forfeiture of half their wealth to their nearest relations, or to the State. Unequal marriages were condemned or annulled. The punishment of confiscation and exile were deemed so inadequate to the guilt of adultery, that if the criminal returned to Italy, he might, by the express declaration of Majorian, be slain with impunity.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 36, p. 479.

3472. MARRIAGE, Proposal of. By Women. [Kadidjah became attached to Mahomet.] She did not dare, according to the Arabian usage, to speak herself to him of her feelings. She had it done by an old man attached to her house. The message which she sent by him ran as follows: "My cousin, the relationship that exists between our families, the precocious consideration that surrounds thee, thy wisdom and thy fidelity in the conduct of my caravans, combine to make me desire to be thine."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 64.

3473. MARRIAGE by Proxy. Anne of Brittainy. The young duchess, . . . besieged by contending suitors for her hand, was at length induced, by the counsels of Dunois, to favor the pretensions of Maximilian of Austria; and a marriage between them was secretly solemnized by proxy in the summer of 1490, all forms being carefully observed on the occasion which could tend to make the contract binding and irrevocable.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 12, § 13.

3474. ——. Prince Arthur. In 1499, when [Prince] Arthur had reached his twelfth year, the marriage ceremony was performed, the Spanish princess being represented by proxy. [She was Catherine of Aragon.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 235.

3476. MARRIAGE, Recklessness in. Princess Honoria. [See No. 3436.] Her impatience of long and hopeless celibacy urged her to embrace a strange and desperate resolution. The name of Attila was familiar and formidable at Constantinople; and his frequent embassies entertained a perpetual intercourse between his camp and the imperial palace. In the pursuit of love, or rather of revenge, the daughter of Placidia sacrificed every duty and every prejudice, and offered to deliver her person into the arms of a barbarian, of whose language she was ignorant, whose figure was scarcely human, and whose religion and manners she abhorred. By the ministry of a faithful eunuch she transmitted to Attila a ring, the pledge of her affection, and earnestly conjured him to claim her as a lawful spouse, to whom he had been secretly betrothed. These indecent advances were received, however, with coldness and disdain.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 35, p. 431.

3477. MARRIAGE of Relatives. Middle Ages. The subservency of . . . [Robert II.] to the domineering spirit of the pope had its natural effect in exciting the holy fathers to further exercises of authority. Robert had been excommunicated for marrying his relation; and his grandson, Philip I., was excommunicated for divorcing a lady who was his relation, to make way for a mistress. Of all the superstitions of these times, it was not the least prejudicial to the welfare of States that the marriage of relations, even to the seventh degree, was prohibited by the Church. Henry, the father of Philip I. of France, to whom almost all the sovereigns of Europe were related, was obliged to seek a wife from the barbarous empire of Russia.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 7, p. 123.

3478. MARRIAGE repeated. Julius Caesar. It is characteristic of the manners of the age that Julius Caesar had married four times, Augustus thrice, Tiberius twice, Gaius thrice, Claudius six times, and Nero thrice. Yet Nero was the last of the Cæsars, even of the adoptive line. No descendants had survived of the offspring of so many unions, and, as Merivale says, "a large proportion, which it would be tedious to calculate, were the victims of domestic jealousy and politic assassination."—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 1, p. 13.

3479. MARRIAGE, Repetition of. Condemned. The primitive ideas of the merit and holiness of celibacy were preached by the monks and entertained by the Greeks. Marriage was allowed as a necessary means for the propagation of mankind; after the death of either party the survivor might satisfy, by a second union, the weakness or the strength of the flesh; but a third marriage was censured as a state of legal fornication; and a fourth was a sin or a scandal as yet unknown to the Christians of the East.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 48, p. 602.

3480. MARRIAGE, Romantic. Garibaldi. Once, when in a melancholy mood, after seeing sixteen of his beloved Italian comrades perish by shipwreck, he thought to relieve his sadness by marrying. He caught sight in a window of a graceful female form. He knew not who she was, nor to what family she belonged; but something told him that she was the destined woman. A friend introduced him that very day, and ere many weeks had rolled by he was her husband. In many a rough campaign she marched by his side; on many a voyage she shared his cabin; and she died, at last, of fatigue and exposure in Italy, leaving three children to mourn her loss. The great, soft-hearted Garibaldi has ever since reproached himself bitterly for having taken her away from her safe and happy home to share the lot of a soldier of liberty. Over her dead body, he says, he prayed for forgiveness for the sin of taking her from home. She, however, had never repined, but really seemed to enjoy the life of battle and adventure which her husband led.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 495.

3481. MARRIAGE, Second. Samuel Johnson. A gentleman who had been very unhappy in marriage married immediately after his wife died. Johnson said [to Dr. Maxwell] it was the triumph of hope over experience.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 177.

3482. — — — Samuel Johnson. When I censured a gentleman of my acquaintance for marrying a second time, as it showed a disregard of his first wife, he said, "Not at all, sir. On the contrary, were he not to marry again, it might be concluded that his first wife had given him a disgust to marriage; but by taking a second wife he pays the highest compliment to the first, by showing that she made him so happy as a married man that he wishes to be so a second time."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 160.

3483. MARRIAGE, Secret. Spartan. The Spartan marriages were performed in secret; the husband, stole away, or forcibly carried away, his wife; she was dressed for some time in man's apparel, to conceal her; while the husband continued to sleep as usual in the public dormitories with his companions, and to see his wife only by stealth, till the birth of a child made him known at once as a husband and a father.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9, p. 94.

3484. MARRIAGE secured. Auction. Herodotus . . . relates a singular practice which prevailed among the Assyrians with respect to marriage, though it seems to have a natural foundation in the custom above mentioned, which prevailed in most of the ancient nations. In every village, says that author, they brought together once in the year all the young women who were marriageable, and the public crier, beginning with the most beautiful, put them up to auction one after another. The rich paid a high price for those whose figure seemed to them the most agreeable; and the money raised by the sale of these was assigned as a portion to the more homely. When it was their turn to be put up to sale, each woman was bestowed on the man who was willing to accept of her with the smallest portion; but no man was allowed to carry off the woman he had purchased, unless he gave security that he would take her to wife; and if afterward it happened that the husband for any cause put away his wife, he was obliged to pay back the money he had received with her.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 3, p. 24.

3485. MARRIAGE, Selection in. Russians. The Russians, who have borrowed from the Greeks the greatest part of their civil and ecclesiastical policy, preserved, till the last century, a singular institution in the marriage of the Czar. They collected, not the virgins of every rank and of every province—a vain and romantic idea—but the daughters of the principal nobles, who awaited in the palace the choice of their sovereign. It is affirmed that a similar method was adopted in the nuptials of Theophilus. With a golden apple in his hand, he slowly walked between two lines of contending beauties; his eye was detained by the charms of Icasia, and in the awkwardness of a first declaration, the prince could only observe that, in this world, women had been the cause of much evil. "And surely, sir," she pertly replied, "they have likewise been the occasion of much good." This affectation of unseasonable wit displeased the imperial lover; he turned aside in disgust; Icasia concealed her mortification in a convent; and the modest silence of Theodora was rewarded with the golden apple.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 48, p. 594.

3486. MARRIAGE, Sensational. Luther. The wedding ceremony took place in the customary manner. Bugenhagen pronounced them man and wife, and added God's blessing. The wedding-rings of Luther and Catharine, the gift of a friend, have been preserved in the Museum of Brunswick. They are artistically made, and bear the inscription, "What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." . . . In a fortnight thereafter the usual wedding festivities were held, to which Luther invited his parents and friends. From the university Luther received a finely engraved silver tankard, now in possession of the University of Greifswald. The electoral court furnished a roast of venison, and the city authorities a generous supply of wine. . . . And thus the unprecedented had happened—an expelled monk had married a runaway nun! Great was the talk and the commotion that ensued! Luther's enemies derisively reminded him of the old legend that of such a union Antichrist would be begotten. Many of his best friends, Melanchthon among the number, were troubled about his act.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 15, p. 134.

3487. MARRIAGE, A splendid. Prince Rupert. In 1613 the marriage of Elizabeth of England, the daughter of James I., was solemnized, in her sixteenth year, with the Prince Palatine, the Elector of Bohemia. If we may judge from contemporaneous chronicles, the beauty of this only surviving sister of Charles was singular; she was called the "Pearl of Britain" and the "Queen of Hearts;" while the charming symmetry of her form and features are said to have been enhanced by the exquisite play of soft expression over her face. It has been said that history borrows the colors of romance when she paints this fair young princess on the morning of her marriage, as she passed along to the chapel over a gallery raised for the purpose, glowing in all the lights of loveliness and majesty, arrayed in white, her rich dark hair falling over her shoulders, and on her head a crown of pure gold; one hand locked in that of her brother Charles, and the other leaning on the arm of the old Earl of Northampton; her train of noble bridesmaids followed on her steps. It is said that England had never seen the equal to the sumptuous splendor of this marriage; the bravery and riches were incomparable, the gold, the silver, the pearls, the diamonds and every variety of jewels. The king's, queen's, and prince's jewels were valued alone at £900,000 sterling. Then came magnificent masques, and the mock fight upon the Thames; and then some gay masque representing the marriage of the Thames and the Rhine; and at night fireworks blazing over London. For the marriage was very popular, and was supposed to be a good omen for the cause of Protestantism.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 9, p. 128.

3488. MARRIAGE, Surprise by. John Milton. In the early part of the summer of 1643 Milton took a sudden journey into the country, "nobody about him certainly knowing the reason, or that it was any more than a journey of recreation." He was absent about a month, and when he returned he brought back a wife with him. Nor was the bride alone. She was attended "by some few of her nearest relations," and there was feasting and celebration of the nuptials in the house in Aldersgate Street. . . . Milton, with a poet's want of caution, or indifference to money, and with a lofty masculine disregard of the temper and character of the girl he asked to share his life, came home with his bride in triumph, and held feasting in celebration of his hasty and ill-considered choice. It was a beginning of sorrows to him.—MILTON, BY M. PATTISON, ch. 5.

3489. MARRIAGE, Uncertain. Reign of Elizabeth. When Parker [Archbishop of Canterbury] was firm in resisting the introduction of the crucifix or of celibacy, Elizabeth showed her resentment by an insult to his wife. Married ladies were addressed at this time as "madam," unmarried ladies as "mistress;" but the marriage of the clergy was still unsanctioned by law, for Elizabeth had refused to revive the statute of Edward by which it was allowed, and the position of a priest's wife was legally a very doubtful one. When Mrs. Parker, therefore, advanced at the close of a sumptuous entertainment at Lambeth to take leave of the queen, Elizabeth feigned a momentary hesitation. "Madam," she said at last, "I may not call you, and mistress I am loath to call you; however, I thank you for your good cheer."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 703.

3490. MARRIAGE, Unendurable. John Milton. In his thirty-fifth year, just as the civil war was actually beginning, he went into the country, telling no one the object of the journey. A month after he returned home a married man, bringing his wife with him. She was a good enough country girl, the daughter of an old friend of Milton's father, but as unsuitable a wife for John Milton as any woman in England. She was rather stupid, very ignorant, fond of pleasure, accustomed to go to country balls and dance with gay young officers. Milton was a grave, austere student, absorbed in the weightiest public topics, and living only in his books and in his thoughts. The poor girl found his house so intolerably dull, that, after a short trial of it, she asked leave to go home for a short visit, and, being at home, she positively refused to go back. He was not less disgusted with her; and his sufferings leading him to study the great questions of marriage and divorce, he came to the conclusion that divorce ought to be about as free and about as easy as marriage. He published divers pamphlets on this subject, the substance of which is this: that when man and wife, after a fair and full trial, find they cannot live together in peace, and both deliberately choose to separate, there ought to be no legal obstacle to their doing so, provided always that proper provision be made for the support and education of the children.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 170.

3491. MARRIAGE, Unequal. Samuel Johnson. A young lady, who had married a man much her inferior in rank, being mentioned, a question arose how a woman's relations should behave to her in such a situation. . . . I contended that she ought to be treated with an inflexible steadiness of displeasure. . . . JOHNSON: "Madam, we must distinguish. Were I a man of rank, I would not let a daughter starve who had made a mean marriage; but having voluntarily degraded herself from the station which she was originally entitled to hold, I would support her only in that which she herself had chosen, and would not put her on a level with my other daughters. You are to consider, madam, that it is our duty to maintain the subordination of civilized society; and when there is a gross and shameful deviation from rank, it should be punished so as to deter others from the same perversion."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 241.

3492. MARRIAGE, Unfit for. Samuel Johnson. Marriage is the best state for man in general; and every man is a worse man in proportion as he is unfit for the married state.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 282.

3493. MARRIAGE, Unhappy. Shakespeare. Now we come to the great calamity of Shakespeare's life. One of his father's friends was Richard Hathaway, a substantial farmer near Stratford, who had a daughter, Anne, eight years older than Shakespeare. When he was a boy of eighteen and she a woman of twenty-six they were married ; and five months after their first child was born. No one who has much knowledge of human nature needs any evidence that such a marriage was a ceaseless misery and shame to him as long as he lived. The many passages of his works in which unfavorable views are given of the female character reveal the melancholy truth. The ill-starred couple had three children, Susanna, Hamnet, and Judith, all of whom were born before the father was twenty-one—the two last-named being twins. . . . There is a good reason to believe that from his twenty-first year he had never been a husband to his wife, and really had no home.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 27.

3494. MARRIAGE, Unsafe. Mary Queen of Scots. [She was regarded as accessory to her husband's assassination.] "Would you like to marry my sister of Scotland?" ironically asked Elizabeth of the Earl of Norfolk, who was believed to be smitten by the charms of his prisoner. "Madam," replied the earl, horrified at such an idea, "I shall never espouse a wife whose husband cannot lay his head with safety on his pillow."—LAMARTINE'S MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 38.

3495. MARRIAGE, Vow of. Captain Cook. During one of his visits to England he married a girl fifteen years of age, whom he had held at the baptismal font in her infancy, and whom he had then said he would marry. He was nineteen when he made this vow, and thirty-four when he fulfilled it. He was a sailor in a coal ship when he held the baby in his arms at the altar ; he was a rising naval officer when, to the same altar, he led the blooming bride.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 380.

3496. MARRIAGE, A wicked. Mary Queen of Scots. [Bothwell assassinated Darnley, her husband. See No. 2188.] She only refused Bothwell one thing—the tutelage and guardianship of her son, who was kept at Stirling. Violent and noisy quarrels took place about this at Holyrood, even on the evening before the marriage of the widow and her husband's assassin. The French ambassador heard the turmoil. Bothwell insisted, and the queen, determined to resist, called loudly for a dagger wherewith to kill herself. "On the day after the ceremony," writes the ambassador, "I perceived strange clouds on the countenances both of the queen and her husband, which she tried to excuse, saying that if I saw her sad it was because she had no reason to rejoice, desiring nothing but death."—LAMARTINE'S MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 30.

3497. MARRIAGE, A worthy. John Adams. A few days after John Adams had been presented to George III. and Queen Charlotte, his wife and daughter were obliged, by the established etiquette, to take part in a similar ceremony. Mr. Adams had an advantage over almost all the revolutionary fathers in possessing a wife who was fully his equal in understanding. The wives of Washington and Franklin were most estimable ladies, but they had no intellectual tastes, and would hardly have held their ground in a conversation upon literature or science. Mrs. Adams, however, was really a very superior woman. Besides having an ample share of Yankee sense and shrewdness, besides being an excellent manager and housekeeper, she was fond of books, possessed considerable knowledge, and wrote letters quite as sprightly and entertaining, and much more sensible and instructive, than those of Madame de Sévigné or Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, who are so famous for their letters. When we read her excellent epistles, we can hardly believe, what is nevertheless true, that she was born and bred in a country parsonage in New England, and never went to school one day in her life. She owed her excellent education wholly to her parents and relations, and to her own remarkable quickness of mind.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 186.

3498. MARRIAGES, Mixed. Romans. A just regard to the purity of descent preserves the harmony of public and private life ; but the mixture of foreign blood is the fruitful source of disorder and discord. Such had ever been the opinion and practice of the sage Romans ; their jurisprudence proscribed the marriage of a citizen and a stranger ; in the days of freedom and virtue a senator would have scorned to match his daughter with a king ; the glory of Mark Antony was sullied by an Egyptian wife ; and the Emperor Titus was compelled, by popular censure, to dismiss, with reluctance, the reluctant Berenice. This perpetual interdict was ratified by the fabulous sanction of the great Constantine.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 359.

3499. MARRIAGES, Roman. Customs. Experience has proved that savages are the tyrants of the female sex, and that the condition of woman is usually softened by the refinements of social life. In the hope of a robust progeny, Lycurgus had delayed the season of marriage ; it was fixed by Numa at the tender age of twelve years, that the Roman husband might educate to his will a pure and obedient virgin. According to the custom of antiquity, he bought his bride of her parents, and she fulfilled the coemption by purchasing, with three pieces of copper, a just introduction to his house and household deities. A sacrifice of fruits was offered by the pontiffs in the presence of ten witnesses ; the contracting parties were seated on the same sheep-skin ; they tasted a salt cake of far or rice ; and this confarreatio, which denoted the ancient food of Italy, served as an emblem of their mystic union of mind and body. But this union on the side of the woman was rigorous and unequal ; and she renounced the name and worship of her father's house to embrace a new servitude, decorated only by the title of adoption, a fiction of the law, neither rational nor elegant, bestowed on the mother of a family (her proper appellation), the strange characters of sister to her own children, and of daughter to her husband or master, who was invested with the plenitude of paternal power. By his judgment or caprice her behavior was approved or censured or chastised ; he exercised the jurisdiction of life and death ; and it was allowed that in the cases of adultery or drunkenness the sentence might be properly inflicted. She acquired and inherited for the sole profit of her lord ; and so clearly was woman defined, not as a person, but as a thing, that, if the original title were deficient, she might be claimed, like other movables, by the use and possession of an entire year.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 345.

3500. MARTYR, A false. Reign of James II. [Rochester, the Lord Treasurer, had sat in a tribunal which persecuted the Established Church ; to save his office he affected to doubt her orthodoxy. [See Office, Love of, No. 3874.] Yet he was extolled by the great body of churchmen as if he had been the bravest and purest of martyrs. The Old and New Testaments, the Martyrologies of Eusebius and of Fox, were ransacked to find parallels for his heroic piety. He was Daniel in the den of lions, Shadrach in the fiery furnace, Peter in the dungeon of Herod, Paul at the bar of Nero, Ignatius in the amphitheatre, Latimer at the stake.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 144.

3501. MARTYR, A sinful. Lord Churchill. The most remarkable letter was from Churchill. It was written with that natural eloquence which, illiterate as he was, he never wanted on great occasions, and with an air of magnanimity which, perfidious as he was, he could with singular dexterity assume. The Princess Anne, he said, had commanded him to assure her illustrious relatives at the Hague that she was fully resolved, by God's help, rather to lose her life than to be guilty of apostasy. As for himself, his places and the royal favor were as nothing to him in comparison with his religion. He concluded by declaring, in lofty language, that, though he could not pretend to have lived the life of a saint, he should be found ready, on occasion, to die the death of a martyr.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 240.

3502. MARTYRDOM coveted. Quakers in Massachusetts. Some of the Quakers were extravagant and foolish ; they cried out from the windows at the magistrates and ministers that passed by, and mocked the civil and religious institutions of the country. They riotously interrupted public worship ; and women, forgetting the decorum of their sex, and claiming a divine origin for their absurd caprices, smeared their faces, and even went naked through the streets. [Yet] . . . a fault against manners may not be punished by a crime against nature.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

3503. ———. Early Christians. We can more easily admire than imitate the fervor of the first Christians, who, according to the lively expression of Sulpicius Severus, desired martyrdom with more eagerness than his own contemporaries solicited a bishopric. . . . Some stories are related of the courage of martyrs, who actually performed what Ignatius had intended, who exasperated the fury of the lions, pressed the executioner to hasten his office, cheerfully leaped into the fires which were kindled to consume them, and discovered a sensation of joy and pleasure in the midst of the most exquisite tortures.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16, p. 41.

3504. MARTYRDOM, Devotion to. John Knox. Knox was the Savonarola of Edinburgh ; as overbearing, popular, and cruel as he of Florence, he stood alone between the people, the throne, and the Parliament as a fourth power, representing sacred sedition—a power which claimed a place side by side with the other powers of the State ; a man more to be feared by the queen because his virtue was, so to speak, a kind of fanatical conscience. To become a martyr or to make martyrs for what he believed to be the cause of God were to him indifferent. He was ready to give himself up to the death, and why should he hesitate to devote others to the scaffold ?—LAMARTINE'S MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 11.

3505. MARTYRDOM, Eminence by. Thomas Becket. After a stormy parley with him in his chamber, they withdrew to arm. Thomas was hurried by his clerks into the cathedral, but as he reached the steps leading from the transept to the choir, his pursuers burst in from the cloisters. "Where," cried Reginald Fitzurse, in the dusk of the dimly lighted minster—"where is the traitor, Thomas Becket ?" The primate turned resolutely back : "Here am I, no traitor, but a priest of God," he replied, and again descending the steps, he placed himself with his back against a pillar, and fronted his foes. All the bravery and violence of his old knightly life seemed to revive in Thomas as he tossed back the threats and demands of his assailants. "You are our prisoner," shouted Fitzurse, and the four knights seized him to drag him from the church. "Do not touch me, Reginald," cried the primate ; "pander that you are, you owe me fealty ;" and availing himself of his personal strength he shook him roughly off. "Strike, strike," retorted Fitzurse, and blow after blow struck Thomas to the ground. A retainer of Ranulf de Broc with the point of his sword scattered the primate's brains on the ground. "Let us be off," he cried, triumphantly ; "this traitor will never rise again." The brutal murder was received with a thrill of horror throughout Christendom ; miracles were wrought at the martyr's tomb, he was canonized, and became the most popular of English saints. The stately "martyrdom" which rose over his relics at Canterbury seemed to embody the triumph which his blood had won.—HIST. OF ENGLISH PEOPLE, § 138.

3506. MARTYRS, Fanatical. Donatists. Many fanatics were possessed with the horror of life and the desire of martyrdom, and they deemed it of little moment by what means or by what hands they perished, if their conduct was sanctified by the intention of devoting themselves to the glory of the true faith and the hope of eternal happiness. Sometimes they rudely disturbed the festivals and profaned the temples of paganism with the design of exciting the most zealous of the idolaters to revenge the insulted honor of their gods. They sometimes forced their way into the courts of justice, and compelled the affrighted judge to give orders for their immediate execution. They frequently stopped travellers on the public highways and obliged them to inflict the stroke of martyrdom, by the promise of a reward, if they consented, and by the threat of instant death, if they refused to grant so very singular a favor. When they were disappointed of every other resource, they announced the day on which, in the presence of their friends and brethren, they should cast themselves headlong from some lofty rock ; and many precipices were shown which had acquired fame by the number of religious suicides. In the actions of these desperate enthusiasts, who were admired by one party as the martyrs of God and abhorred by the other as the victims of Satan, an impartial philosopher may discover the influence and the last abuse of that inflexible spirit which was originally derived from the character and principles of the Jewish nation—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 21, p. 363.

3507. MARTYRS, First. English. [In 1555 John Rogers was burnt at the stake in Smithfield, Lawrence Saunders was burnt at Coventry, John Hooper was burnt at Gloucester, and Rowland Taylor was burnt at Hadleigh. These were four of the first Protestant martyrs burnt in England.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 6, p. 79.

3508. MARTYRS, Missionary. Jesuit Priests. Brebœuf was set apart on a scaffold. They (the Mohawks) cut his lower lip and his nose, applied burning torches to his body, burned his gums, and thrust hot iron down his throat. The delicate Lallemand was stripped naked, and enveloped from head to foot with bark full of rosin. Brought into the presence of Brebœuf, he exclaimed, "We are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and men!" The pine bark was set on fire, and when it was in a blaze boiling water was poured on the heads of both the missionaries. The voice of Lallemand was choked by the thick smoke; but the fire having snapped his bonds, he lifted his hands to heaven. Brebœuf was scalped while yet alive, and died after a torture of three hours; the sufferings of Lallemand were protracted for seventeen hours. The lives of both had been a continual heroism.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 20.

3509. MARTYRS tortured. By Nero. Imagine that awful scene, once witnessed, . . . in the square before St. Peter's at Rome! Imagine it, that we may realize how vast is the change which Christianity has wrought in the feelings of mankind! There, where the vast dome now rises, were once the gardens of Nero. They were thronged with gay crowds, among whom the emperor moved in his frivolous degradation, and on every side were men dying slowly on their cross of shame. Along the paths of those gardens on the autumn nights were ghastly torches, blackening the ground beneath them with streams of sulphurous pitch, and each of those living torches was a martyr in his shirt of fire. And in the amphitheatre hard by, in sight of twenty thousand spectators, famished dogs were tearing to pieces some of the best and purest of men and women, hideously disguised in the skins of bears or wolves. Thus did Nero baptize in the blood of martyrs the city which was to be for ages the capital of the world!—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 5, p. 39.

3510. MARTYRS, True. Syrian Doctors. Among the supplicants and captives Timour distinguished the doctors of the law, whom he invited to the dangerous honor of a personal conference. . . . To these doctors he proposed a captious question, which the casuists of Bokhara, Samarcand, and Herat were incapable of resolving. "Who are the true martyrs, of those who are slain on my side, or on that of my enemies?" But he was silenced, or satisfied, by the dexterity of one of the cadhis of Aleppo, who replied, in the words of Mahomet himself, that the motive, not the ensign, constitutes the martyr; and that the Moslems of either party, who fight only for the glory of God, may deserve that sacred appellation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65, p. 262.

3511. MARVELS, Age of. Age of Theseus. It is principally on the age of Theseus that the Greeks have indulged their vein for the marvellous. Everything is supernatural, and every great man is either a god or a demi-god. The most probable source of this I conceive to be that the princes, who had then become really powerful, and exercised a high control over their subjects, taking advantage of the superstitious character of the times, and of the people's credulity, assumed to themselves a divine origin, in order the better to support their new authority. Having at all times the priests under their influence, they could do this with great facility, by instituting religious rites in honor of their divine progenitors; and if they could thus prevail so far as to pass with their contemporaries for the offspring of the gods, it is no wonder that the succeeding ages should retain the same idea of them.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 8, p. 70.

3512. MASQUERADE, Deadly. Charles VI. The young monarch was unfortunately seized with a deprivation of his intellects, which broke out in the most dreadful fits of madness. The ignorance of men in those ages attributed this fatal but natural calamity to the effects of witchcraft. An Italian lady, the wife of his brother, the Duke of Orleans, was accused as the author of his misfortunes, and the suspicion was increased by a very strange accident. In a masquerade at court the king appeared in the garb of a wild man, covered with leaves, which were stuck with pitch upon a close habit of linen, and he led in chains four other satyrs, dressed in the same manner. The Duke of Orleans, who held a burning torch, approached accidentally too near these combustible knights; one of the habits took fire, and the four satyrs, who were four of the principal nobility, were burnt to death. The king escaped with life, but was seized with a dreadful fit of frenzy. To relieve him, they sent for a magician from Montpellier, and he became somewhat better. The fact was, his disease had lucid intervals, and in these he sometimes resumed the management of his kingdom—which was of the worst consequence to France, for no measure was ever pursued to an end or with stability.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 13.

3513. MASSACRE, Evidence of. Louis IX. The Oriental writers confess that Louis might have escaped, if he would have deserted his subjects; he was made prisoner, with the greatest part of his nobles; all who could not redeem their lives by service or ransom were inhumanly massacred; and the walls of Cairo were decorated with a circle of Christian heads. The king of France was loaded with chains. [Attack of Crusaders on Massoura.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 59, p. 43.

3514. MASSACRE, General. Goths. [The Goths invaded Thrace.] After a long resistance, Philippopolis, destitute of succor, was taken by storm. A hundred thousand persons are reported to have been massacred in the sack of that great city.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 10, p. 291.

3515. MASSACRE, Immense. London. Suetonius Paulinus, under the Emperor Nero, . . . [was sent against Britain.] The Britons, more exasperated than intimidated, were all in arms, and, headed by Boadicea, Queen of the Iceni, had attacked several of the Roman settlements. Suetonius hastened to the protection of London. The Britons, however, reduced it to ashes, massacred the inhabitants that remained in it, putting to death 70,000 of the Romans and their allies. Suetonius revenged these losses by a decisive victory, in which 80,000 Britons fell in the field. Boadicea, to escape slavery or an ignominious death, put an end to her own life by poison.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 5, p. 104.

3516. MASSACRE by Mob. Paris. A.D. 1418. On the 12th of June . . . the people broke open the prisons and private houses where the Armagnacs were confined, [and] massacred 1500 victims in one morning.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 5, p. 68.

3517. MASSACRE of Patriots. Boston. On the 5th of March a more serious difficulty occurred in Boston. An altercation had taken place between a party of citizens and the soldiers. A crowd gathered, surrounded Captain Preston's company of the city guard, hooted at them, and dared them to fire. At length the exasperated soldiers discharged a volley, killing three of the citizens, and wounding several others. This outrage, known as the Boston massacre, created a profound sensation. The city was ablaze with excitement. Several thousand men assembled under arms. Governor Hutchinson came out, promising that justice should be done, and trying to appease the multitude. The brave Samuel Adams spoke for the people. An immediate withdrawal of the troops from the city was demanded, and the governor was obliged to yield. Captain Preston and his company were arrested and tried for murder. The prosecution was conducted with great spirit, and two of the offenders were convicted of manslaughter.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 37, p. 294.

3518. MASSACRE prevented. Jamestown. The savages carefully concealed their murderous purpose. Until the very day of the massacre they continued on terms of friendship with the English. They came unmolested into the settlements, ate with their victims, borrowed boats and guns, made purchases, and gave not the slightest token of hostility. The attack was planned for the 22d of March, at midday. At the fatal hour the work of butchery began. Every hamlet in Virginia was attacked by a band of yelling barbarians. No age, sex, or condition awakened an emotion of pity. Men, women, and children were indiscriminately slaughtered, until 347 had perished under the knives and hatchets of the savages. But Indian treachery was thwarted by Indian faithfulness. . . . A converted red man, wishing to save an Englishman [of Jamestown] who had been his friend, went to him on the night before the massacre, and revealed the plot. The alarm was spread among the settlements, and thus the greater part of the colony escaped destruction. But the outer plantations were entirely destroyed.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 11, p. 112.

3519. MASSACRE, Punished by. By Russians. When Warsaw capitulated, in 1794, the Russian commander Suwaroff had put to the sword 20,000 wretched inhabitants of the suburb of Praga.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 17, p. 315.

3520. MASSACRE by Treachery. Roman. The punishment of a Roman city was blindly committed to the undistinguishing sword of the barbarians, and the hostile preparations were concerted with the dark and perfidious artifice of an illegal conspiracy. The people of Thessalonica were treacherously invited, in the name of their sovereign, to the games of the Circus; and such was their insatiate avidity for those amusements, that every consideration of fear or suspicion was disregarded by the numerous spectators. As soon as the assembly was complete, the soldiers, who had secretly been posted round the Circus, received the signal, not of the races, but of a general massacre. The promiscuous carnage continued three hours, without discrimination of strangers, of natives, of age or sex, of innocence or guilt; the most moderate accounts state the number of the slain at 7000, and it is affirmed by some writers that more than 15,000 victims were sacrificed to the manes of Boethic. [Theodosius was the emperor who commanded it].—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 29, p. 114.

3521. MASSACRE, Wholesale. Seleucia. [War between the Parthian and Roman empires.] The sack and conflagration of Seleucia, with the massacre of 300,000 of the inhabitants, tarnished the glory of the Roman triumph.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 8, p. 242.

3522. MASSACRES, Religious. French Revolution. [The Revolutionists, on the 2d of September, 1792, massacred 200 priests at the Church of De Carmes.] Throughout that night of horror the city which two hundred and twenty years before had been polluted by the massacre of St. Bartholomew, at the command of a crowned bigot, in the name of religion, was again polluted by a massacre as frightful, at the command of furious demagogues, in the name of Liberty. At the prison of Abbaye, after a few murders in the afternoon, a general slaughter took place as night drew on. [The prison of La Force was emptied in the same manner].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 12, p. 229.

3523. MASSES aroused, The. Revolution. That no act of his [Charles I.] should be wanting to justify the opposition of his enemies, he went next day to the House of Commons, attended by desperadoes—"soldiers of fortune"—armed with partisan, pistol, and sword, to seize the members denounced. This scene has been so often described that it were quite a work of supererogation to describe it again here. Let all be summed up in a word. Reconciliation between the king and the Parliament was now impossible. The privileges of the House had been violated in a manner in which no monarch had dared to violate them before. And such a parliament!—men of the most distinguished courage and intelligence in the kingdom. The members he sought had escaped through the window. They fled in haste to the city. Thither the most distinguished members of the House followed them. They were protected by the Common Council from the king, who himself followed them to the city, demanding their bodies; but in vain. He was his own officer, both of military and police; but as he went along, the growls of "Privilege, privilege—privilege of Parliament," greeted him everywhere. One of the crowd, bolder than the rest, approached his carriage, shouting, "To your tents, O Israel!" The king had given the last drop to fill up the measure of contempt with which he was regarded. He had struggled with his Parliament and he was unsuccessful. Here was a hint for such men to act upon ; and petitions from all parts of the land poured in, from vast bodies of the people, declaring their intention to stand by the Parliament : from counties, cities, towns, parishes, trades ; the porters petitioned ; the water men (water-rats, Charles called them) petitioned. And we may gather the state of domestic confusion from the fact that the women petitioned. The mind of the country was roused against the monarch. Meantime the exiled members were brought back in triumph to the House, amid the pealing of martial music, flags waving from the mastsheads of all the vessels on the river, the masts covered with shouting sailors, and the long procession of city barges—for at that day most great triumphal processions took place on the Thames ; and while the five members stepped into the House, the House rising to receive them, Charles fled to Hampton Court, nor did he see his palace at Whitehall again until he beheld it as a prisoner, and stepped from its banquetting house to the scaffold.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 4, p. 90.

3524. MASSES overlooked. By Historians. Nothing has yet been said of the great body of the people—of those who held the plough and tended the oxen ; who toiled at the looms of Norwich and squared the Portland stone for St. Paul's ; nor can very much be said. The most numerous class is precisely the class respecting which we have the most meagre information. In those times [of the Restoration] philanthropists did not yet regard it as a sacred duty, nor had demagogues yet found it a lucrative trade, to expatiate on the distress of the laborer. History was too much occupied with courts and camps to spare a line for the hut of the peasant or for the garret of the mechanic.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 385.

3525. MASSES, Power of the Stamp Act. The 1st of November came. On that day the Stamp Act was to take effect. During the summer great quantities of the stamped paper had been prepared and sent to America. Ten boxes of it were seized by the people of New York, and openly destroyed. In Connecticut the stamp-officer was threatened with hanging. In Boston houses were destroyed, and the stamps given to the winds and flames. Whole cargoes of the obnoxious paper were shipped to England, and every stamp officer in America was obliged to resign or leave the country. By the 1st of November there were scarcely stamps enough remaining to furnish after times with specimens. The day was kept as a day of mourning. The stores were closed ; flags were hung at half mast ; the bells were tolled ; effigies of the authors and abettors of the Stamp Act were borne about in mockery, and then burned. The people of New Hampshire formed a funeral procession and buried a coffin bearing the inscription of Liberty. A cartoon was circulated hinting at union as the remedy for existing evils. The picture represented a snake broken into sections. Each joint was labelled with the initials of a colony ; the head was marked "N. E." for New England, and the title was "Join or Die!" —RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 37, p. 291.

3526. ———. Boston Tea Party. On the 16th of December the dispute was settled in a memorable manner. There was a great town meeting, at which seven thousand people were assembled. Adams and Quincy spoke to the multitudes. Evening came on, and the meeting was about to adjourn when a war-whoop was heard, and about fifty men, disguised as Indians, passed the door of the Old South Church. The crowd followed to Griffin's wharf, where the three tea-ships were at anchor. Then everything became quiet. The disguised men quickly boarded the vessels, broke open the three hundred and forty chests of tea that composed the cargoes, and poured the contents into the sea. Such was the Boston Tea Party.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 37, p. 295.

3527. MATERIALISM corrected. Benjamin Franklin. He has been called the representative of materialism ; and yet when he thought on religion, his mind passed beyond reliance on sects to faith in God ; when he wrote on politics he founded the freedom of his country on principles that knew no change ; when he turned an observing eye on nature he passed always from the effect to the cause, from individual appearances to universal laws.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 23.

3528. MATERNITY, Miraculous. Reign of James II. [It was suspected that Catholic James intended to produce a spurious heir.] The folly of some Roman Catholics confirmed the vulgar prejudice. They spoke of the auspicious event as strange, as miraculous, as an exertion of the same Divine power which had made Sarah proud and happy in Isaac, and had given Samuel to the prayers of Hannah. Mary's mother, the Duchess of Modena, had lately died. A short time before her death she had, it was said, implored the Virgin of Loretta, with fervent vows and rich offerings, to bestow a son on James. The king himself had, in the preceding August, turned aside from his progress to visit the Holy Well, and had there besought Saint Winifred to obtain for him that boon without which his great designs for the propagation of the true faith could be but imperfectly executed. The imprudent zealots who dwelt on these tales foretold with confidence that the unborn infant would be a boy, and offered to back their opinion by laying twenty guineas to one. Heaven, they affirmed, would not have interfered but for a great end. One fanatic announced that the queen would give birth to twins, of whom the elder would be King of England, and the younger Pope of Rome. [Queen] Mary could not conceal the delight with which she heard this prophecy ; and her ladies found that they could not gratify her more than by talking of it. The Roman Catholics would have acted more wisely if they had spoken of the pregnancy as of a natural event, and if they had borne with moderation their unexpected good fortune. Their insolent triumph excited the popular suspicions. From the Prince and Princess of Denmark down to porters and laundresses, nobody alluded to the promised birth without a sneer. The wits of London described the new miracle in rhymes which, it may well be supposed, were not the most delicate. The rough country squires roared with laughter if they met any one simple enough to believe that the queen was really likely to be again a mother.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 287.

3529. MATERNITY, Passion of. *Indian Squaw. The squaw loves her child with instinctive passion; and if she does not manifest it by lively caresses, her tenderness is real, wakeful, and constant. No savage mother ever trusted her babe to a hireling nurse; no savage mother ever put away her own child to suckle that of another.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

3530. MATHEMATICS, Accuracy in. *Egyptians. The arts and sciences are indeed so intimately connected, that there can be no great progress in the one without a proportional advancement in the other; as, for example, architecture, which requires a knowledge of geometry and the laws of mechanics; the working of metals, dyeing, which presuppose an acquaintance with chemical principles. "When we see," says Millot, "the Egyptians surveying their lands with precision, distributing the waters of the Nile by numberless canals, measuring with exactness the increase of the river, making and employing various species of machinery, measuring time, and calculating the revolutions of the stars, we must suppose them to have attained a considerable proficiency in the science of mathematics. The Egyptians understood the division of the zodiac into twelve signs, which argues a considerable advancement in astronomy."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4, p. 42.

3531. MATHEMATICS, Deficiency in. *South Americans. The Abiponians, a tribe of South American Indians who inhabit a district in Paraguay, can go no further than three in counting.—APPLETON'S CYCLOPEDIA, "ABIPONIANS."

3532. MATHEMATICS, Genius for. *Zerah Colburn. During this first year of his exhibition he solved such questions as the following, in periods of time varying from three seconds to one minute: "How many seconds are there in 2000 years?" Answer: 63,072,000,000. "How many strokes will a clock strike in 2000 years?" Answer: 113,880,000. "What is the product of 12,225, multiplied by 1223?" Answer: 14,951,175. "What is the square of 1449?" Answer: 2,099,601. "In seven acres of corn, with 17 rows to each acre, 64 hills to each row, 8 ears to each hill, and 150 kernels to each ear, how many kernels are there?" Answer: 9,139,200. Practice gave him greater facility. The next year he performed such problems as these: "How many hours are there in 1811 years?" Answer (in twenty seconds): 15,864,360. "How many seconds in 11 years?" Answer (in four seconds): 346,896,000. "What sum, multiplied by itself, will produce 998,001?" Answer (in three seconds): 999. "How many hours in 38 years 2 months and 7 days?" Answer (in six seconds): 334,488. . . . The number 4,294,967,297 was proposed to him to find the factors. Now, certain French mathematicians had asserted that this was a prime number; but the German, Euler, had discovered that its factors are 641 and 6,700,417. This wonderful boy, then aged eight years, by the mere operation of his mind, named the factors in about twenty seconds.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 82.

3533. MATHEMATICS, Precocity in. *Zerah Colburn. [When a little boy six years of age, in his Vermont home, his father, having overheard him say, "Three times twelve are thirty-six," half in joke he asked him; "How much is 18 times 9?" The boy instantly gave the correct answer, 1261. "I could not have been more surprised," the father used to say, "if a man had sprung out of the earth and stood erect before me." . . . The boy who could not tell a 4 from a 9 possessed the power of multiplying four figures by four figures, with unerring certainty, in about ten seconds.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 79.

3534. MEANNESS, Hatred of. *Thackeray. [See Criticism, Mania for, No. 1310.] The tinker thinks that every pot is unsound. The cobbler doubts the stability of every shoe. So at last it grew to be the case with Thackeray. There was more hope that the city should be saved because of its ten just men, than for society, if society were to depend on ten who were not snobs. All this arose from the keenness of his vision into that which was really mean. But that keenness became so aggravated by the intenseness of his search that the slightest speck of dust became to his eyes as a foul stain. Publicola, as we saw, damned one poor man to a wretched immortality, and another was called pitilessly over the coals because he had mixed a grain of flattery with a bushel of truth. Thackeray tells us that he was born to hunt out snobs, as certain dogs are trained to find truffles.—TROLLOPE'S THACKERAY, ch. 2.

3535. MECHANICS despised. *Archimedes. King Hiero . . . entreated him to turn his art from abstracted notions to matters of sense, and to make his reasonings more intelligible to the generality of mankind, applying them to the uses of common life. The first that turned their thoughts to mechanics, a branch of knowledge which came afterward to be so much admired, were Eudoxus and Archytas, who thus gave a variety and an agreeable turn to geometry, and confirmed certain problems by sensible experiments and the use of instruments, which could not be demonstrated in the way of theorem. That problem, for example, of two mean proportional lines, which cannot be found out geometrically, and yet is so necessary for the solution of other questions, they solved mechanically, by the assistance of certain instruments called mesolabes, taken from conic sections. But when Plato inveighed against them, with great indignation, as corrupting and debasing the excellence of geometry by making her descend from incorporeal and intellectual to corporeal and sensible things, and obliging her to make use of matter, which requires much manual labor, and is the object of servile trades, then mechanics were separated from geometry, and, being a long time despised by the philosopher, were considered as a branch of the military art.—PLUTARCH'S MARCELLUS.

3536. MECHANICS disparaged. *Lacedæmonians. One of the greatest privileges that Lycurgus procured for his countrymen was the enjoyment of leisure, the consequence of his forbidding them to exercise any mechanic trade. It was not worth their while to take great pains to raise a fortune, since riches there were of no account; and the Helotes, who tilled the ground, were answerable for the produce.—PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

3537. MECHANICS, Hereditary. *East Indian. The tribe of mechanics is branched out into as many subdivisions as there are trades, and no man is allowed to relinquish the trade of his forefathers—a very singular system, which, as we formerly mentioned, prevailed likewise among the ancient Egyptians. Besides these four principal classes [viz., Bramins, soldiers, husbandmen and mechanics,] or tribes, there is a fifth, that of the pariahs, which is the outcast of all the rest. The persons who compose it are employed in the meanest offices of society. They bury the dead; they are the scavengers of the town; and so much is their condition held in detestation, that if any one of this class touches a person belonging to any of the four great castes, or tribes, it is allowable to put him to death upon the spot. All these classes, or castes, are separated from each other by insurmountable barriers; they are not allowed to intermarry, to live, or to eat together, and whoever transgresses these rules is banished as a disgrace to his tribe. —TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 23, p. 337.

3538. MECHANICS, Patriotism of. Carpenters of Boston. A.D. 1774. [The port was closed, the capital removed to Salem, and the city occupied by British troops.] All the while the sufferings of Boston grew more and more severe; yet in the height of distress for want of employment its carpenters refused to construct barracks for the [British] army. —BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 10.

3539. MECHANICS, Patriotism of. Carpenters of Philadelphia. A.D. 1774. [The Continental Congress convened in Philadelphia.] The members of Congress, meeting at Smith's tavern, moved in a body to select the place for their deliberations. Galloway, the Speaker of Pennsylvania, would have had them use the State House, but the carpenters of Philadelphia offered their plain but spacious hall; and from respect for the mechanics, it was accepted by a great majority. —BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 11.

3540. — Civil War. [They were of greatest service to Parliament in the war of the Revolution.] The men of London taken from the loom and anvil, from the shops of Ludgate or the wharves of Billingsgate, stood like a wall. . . . Prince Rupert himself led up the choice horse to charge them, and endured their storm of small shot, but could make no impression upon their stand of pikes. . . . The contempt of the Cavaliers for the "base mechanicals" was one great cause of the triumph of the Roundheads. . . . They had an ever-present belief that they were doing "the Lord's work;" and whether starving in a fortress or ridden down by men in steel, they would not be moved.

"With dread of death to flight, or foul retreat."
—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 2, p. 24.

3541. — Apprentices. [In 1642, at the time of the Revolution, the mechanics' apprentices in London were ardent in their endeavors for the destruction of despotism.] —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 30, p. 489.

3542. MECHANICS, Practical. James Watt. The mechanical dexterity he acquired was the foundation upon which he built the speculations to which he owes his glory, nor without this manual training is there the least likelihood that he would have become the improver and almost the creator of the steam-engine. —SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 4.

3543. MECHANICS, Taste for. Sir Isaac Newton. From childhood Newton exhibited a remarkable talent for mechanics. His favorite playthings were little saws, hammers, chisels, and hatchets, with which he made many curious and ingenious machines. There was a windmill in course of erection near his home. He watched the workmen with the greatest interest, and constructed a small model of the mill, which, one of his friends said, was "as clean and curious a piece of workmanship as the original." He was dissatisfied, however, with his mill, because it would not work when there was no wind; and therefore he added to it a contrivance by which it could be kept in motion by a mouse. He made a water-clock, the motive power of which was the dropping of water upon a wheel. Every morning, on getting out of bed, the boy wound up his clock by supplying it with the water requisite to keep it running for twenty-four hours. —CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 247.

3544. MECHANICS, Wages of. Thirteenth Century. The daily pay of carpenters, masons, and tylers was 3d. with keep, and 4d. one half penny without. —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 27, p. 408.

3545. MEDDLING, Destruction by. Flood. [West Indians to Columbus.] They said that there once lived in the island a mighty cacique, who slew his only son for conspiring against him. He afterward collected and picked his bones, and preserved them in a gourd, as was the custom of the natives with the relics of their friends. On a subsequent day the cacique and his wife opened the gourd to contemplate the bones of their son, when, to their astonishment, several fish, great and small, leaped out. Upon this the cacique closed the gourd, and placed it on the top of his house, boasting that he had the sea shut up within it, and could have fish whenever he pleased. Four brothers, however, who had been born at the same birth, and were curious intermeddlers, hearing of this gourd, came during the absence of the cacique to peep into it. In their carelessness they suffered it to fall upon the ground, where it was dashed to pieces; when, lo! to their astonishment and dismay, there issued forth a mighty flood, with dolphins, and sharks, and tumbling porpoises, and great spouting whales; and the water spread, until it overflowed the earth, and formed the ocean, leaving only the tops of the mountains uncovered, which are the present islands. —IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 6, ch. 10.

3546. MEDDLING reproved. Bishop Burnet. [The intimate friend of William Prince of Orange, whose invading army had just landed in England.] As soon as Burnet was on shore he hastened to the prince. An amusing dialogue took place between them. Burnet poured forth his congratulations with genuine delight, and then eagerly asked what were his Highness' plans. Military men are seldom disposed to take counsel with gownsmen on military matters, and William regarded the interference of unprofessional advisers, in questions relating to war, with even more than the disgust ordinarily felt by soldiers on such occasions. But he was at that moment in an excellent humor, and instead of signifying his displeasure by a short and cutting reprimand, graciously extended his hand, and answered his chaplain's question by another question: "Well, doctor, what do you think of predestination now?" The reproof was so delicate that Burnet, whose perceptions were not very fine, did not perceive it. He answered with great fervor that he should never forget the signal manner in which Providence had favored their undertaking.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 446.

3547. MEDIATION rejected. James II. Instead of becoming a mediator [between Catholics and Protestants,] he became the fiercest and most reckless of partisans. . . . The contest was terrible. The effect of the insane attempt to subjugate England by means of Ireland was that the Irish became hewers of wood and drawers of water to the English. The old proprietors, by their effort to recover what they had lost, lost the greater part of what they had retained. The momentary ascendancy of popery produced such a series of barbarous laws against popery as made the statute-book of Ireland a proverb of infamy throughout Christendom. Such were the bitter fruits of the policy of James.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 126.

3548. MEDIATOR, Temporizing. William Penn. [Magdalen College had refused to elect to the presidency the nominee of James II.] The king, greatly incensed and mortified by his defeat, quitted Oxford. . . . His obstinacy and violence had brought him into an embarrassing position. He had trusted too much to the effect of his frowns and angry tones, and had rashly staked, not merely the credit of his administration, but his personal dignity, on the issue of the contest. Could he yield to subjects whom he had menaced with raised voice and furious gestures? . . . The agency of Penn was employed. He had too much good feeling to approve of the violent and unjust proceedings of the government, and even ventured to express part of what he thought. James was, as usual, obstinate in the wrong. The courtly Quaker, therefore, did his best to seduce the college from the path of right. He first tried intimidation. Ruin, he said, impended over the society. The king was highly incensed. The case might be a hard one. Most people thought it so. But every child knew that his Majesty loved to have his own way, and could not bear to be thwarted. Penn therefore exhorted the fellows not to rely on the goodness of their cause, but to submit, or at least to temporize. Such counsel came strangely from one who had himself been expelled from the university for raising a riot about the surplice, who had run the risk of being disinherited rather than take off his hat to the princes of the blood, and who had been sent to prison for haranguing in conventicles. He did not succeed in frightening the Magdalen men. [See No. 1842.] —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 274.

employment. He meditated the design of again confiscating and again portioning out the soil of half the island, and showed his inclination so clearly that one class was soon agitated by terrors which he afterward vainly wished to soothe, and the other by hopes which he afterward vainly wished to restrain. But this was the smallest part of his guilt and madness. He deliberately resolved, not merely to give to the aboriginal inhabitants of Ireland the entire possession of their own country, but also to use them as his instruments for setting up arbitrary government in England.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 126.

3550. MEDICINE, Advance in. Reign of Charles II. Medicine had in England become an experimental and progressive science, and every day made some new advance, in defiance of Hippocrates and Galen. The attention of speculative men had been, for the first time, directed to the important subject of sanitary police. The great plague of 1665 induced them to consider with care the defective architecture, draining, and ventilation of the capital. The great fire of 1666 afforded an opportunity for effecting extensive improvements. The whole matter was diligently examined by the Royal Society; and to the suggestions of that body must be partly attributed the changes which, though far short of what the public welfare required, yet made a wide difference between the new and the old London, and probably put a final close to the ravages of pestilence in our country.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 381.

3551. MEDICINE, Aversion to. George Washington. His illnesses were of rare occurrence, but particularly severe. His aversion to the use of medicine was extreme; and even when in great suffering, it was only by the entreaties of his lady and . . . Dr. James Craik that he could be prevailed upon to take the slightest preparation of medicine.—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 2.

3552. MEDICINE discarded. Napoleon I. [Las Casas writes:] "The emperor has no faith in medicine, and never takes any. He had adopted a peculiar mode of treatment for himself. Whenever he found himself unwell, his plan was to run into an extreme the opposite of what had happened to be his habit at the time. This he calls restoring the equilibrium of nature. If, for instance, he had been inactive for a length of time, he would suddenly ride about sixty miles, or hunt for a whole day." . . . [He also said:] "My remedies are fasting and the warm bath." —ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 30.

3553. MEDICINE, School of. First. The treasures of Grecian medicine had been communicated to the Arabian colonies of Africa, Spain, and Sicily, and in the intercourse of peace and war a spark of knowledge had been kindled and cherished at Salerno, an illustrious city, in which the men were honest and the women beautiful. A school, the first that arose in the darkness of Europe, was consecrated to the healing art; the conscience of monks and bishops was reconciled to that salutary and lucrative profession; and a crowd of patients, of the most eminent rank and most distant climates, invited or visited the physicians of Salerno.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 56, p. 462.

3554. MEDITATION, Peculiar. Swedenborg. Swedenborg was gifted with peculiar powers of respiration. From early childhood, when on his knees at prayer, and afterward when engaged in profound meditation, he found that his natural respiration was for the time suspended. . . . He writes: "My respiration has been so formed by the Lord as to enable me to breathe inwardly for a long period of time, without the aid of the external air, my respiration being directed within, and my outward senses, as well as actions, still continuing in their vigor, which is only possible with persons who have been so formed by the Lord. I have also been instructed that my breathing was so directed, without my being aware of it, in order to enable me to be with spirits, and to speak with them."—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 8, p. 67.

3555. MEDIUM, Fraudulent. Counterfeiting. The account was as follows: "On the night of the 1st of February many gentlemen eminent for their rank and character were, by the invitation of the Rev. Mr. Aldrich, of Clerkenwell, assembled at his house, for the examination of the noises supposed to be made by a departed spirit, for the detection of some enormous crime. About ten at night the gentlemen met in the chamber in which the girl, supposed to be disturbed by a spirit, had, with proper caution, been put to bed by several ladies. . . . The supposed spirit had before publicly promised, by an affirmative knock, that it would attend one of the gentlemen into the vault under the church of St. John, Clerkenwell, where the body is deposited, and give a token of her presence there, by a knock upon her coffin; it was therefore determined to make this trial of the existence or veracity of the supposed spirit. While they were inquiring and deliberating, they were summoned into the girl's chamber by some ladies who were near her bed, and who had heard knocks and scratches. When the gentlemen entered the girl declared that she felt the spirit like a mouse upon her back, and was required to hold her hands out of bed. The company at one o'clock went into the church, and the gentlemen to whom the promise was made went with another into the vault. The spirit was solemnly required to perform its promise, but nothing more than silence ensued; the person supposed to be accused by the spirit then went down with several others, but no effect was perceived. . . . It is therefore the opinion of the whole assembly that the child has some art of making or counterfeiting a particular noise, and that there is no agency of any higher cause."—NOTE IN BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 112.

3556. MEEKNESS, Christian. Uncrowned. [The Crusaders having taken Jerusalem and made it a Latin kingdom, offered it to] Godfrey de Bouillon. That excellent prince accepted the high honor conferred upon him, but refused, in his pious humility, to wear a diadem of gold and jewels where his Redeemer's brows had been lacerated by a crown of thorns.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 7, § 17.

3557. MELANCHOLY, Characteristic. Aborigines. The red man was, at his best estate, an unsocial, solitary, and gloomy spirit. He was a man of the woods. He communed only with himself and the genius of solitude. He sat apart. The forest was better than his wigwam, and his wigwam better than the village.—RUPATH'S U. S., ch. 1, p. 45.

3558. MELANCHOLY, Depressed by. Charles V. The last years of Charles were the most tumultuous and the least successful. The load of cares, and the difficulties which surrounded him on every side, at length entirely overpowered him. The vigor of his mind was broken, his animal spirits were exhausted, and, in a state of despondency and melancholy dotage, he abdicated the empire, and renounced the world at the age of fifty-six. This celebrated resignation, though prompted by dejection of spirit, was conducted with some policy, and with a regard to the interest of those who were to come after him.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 19, p. 286.

3559. MELANCHOLY, Excusable. John Milton. Milton was, like Dante, a statesman and a lover; and, like Dante, he had been unfortunate in ambition and in love. He had survived his health and his sight, the comforts of his home, and the prosperity of his party. Of the great men by whom he had been distinguished at his entrance into life, some had been taken away from the evil to come; some had carried into foreign climates their unconquerable hatred of oppression; some were pining in dungeons; and some had poured forth their blood on scaffolds. Venal and licentious scribblers, with just sufficient talent to clothe the thoughts of a pander in the style of a bellman, were now the favorite writers of the sovereign and of the public. It was a loathsome herd, which could be compared to nothing so fitly as to the rabble of Comus, grotesque monsters, half bestial, half human, dropping with wine, bloated with gluttony, and reeling in obscene dances. Amid these that fair Muse was placed, like the chaste lady of the Masque, lofty, spotless, and serene, to be chattered at, and pointed at, and grinned at, by the whole rout of Satyrs and Goblins. If ever despondency and asperity could be excused in any man, they might have been excused in Milton.—MACAULAY'S MILTON, p. 35.

3560. MELANCHOLY inherited. Samuel Johnson. Mr. Michael Johnson [the father of Samuel] was a man of a large and robust body, and of a strong and active mind; yet, as in the most solid rocks veins of unsound substance are often discovered, there was in him a mixture of that disease, the nature of which eludes the most minute inquiry, though the effects are well known to be a weariness of life, an unconcern about those things which agitate the greater part of mankind, and a general sensation of gloomy wretchedness. From him, then, his son inherited, with some other qualities, "a vile melancholy," which in his too strong expression of any disturbance of the mind "made him mad all his life, at least not sober."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 4.

3561. ———. Samuel Johnson. Talking of constitutional melancholy, he observed: "A man so afflicted, sir, must divert distressing thoughts, and not combat with them." BOSWELL: "May not he think them down, sir?" JOHNSON: "No, sir. To attempt to think them down is madness. He should have a lamp constantly burning in his bed-chamber during the night, and if wakefully disturbed take a book, and read, and compose himself to rest. To have the management of the mind is a great art, and it may be attained in a considerable degree by experience and habitual exercise. . . . Let him take a course of chemistry or a course of rope-dancing, or a course of anything to which he is inclined at the time. Let him contrive to have as many retreats for his mind as he can, as many things to which it can fly from itself."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 277.

3562. MELANCHOLY, Natural. Samuel Johnson. The "morbid melancholy" which was lurking in his constitution, and to which we may ascribe those particularities, . . . gathered such strength in his twentieth year as to afflict him in a dreadful manner. While he was at Lichfield, in the college vacation of the year 1729, he felt himself overwhelmed with a horrible hypochondria, with perpetual irritation, fretfulness, and impatience, and with a dejection, gloom, and despair, which made existence misery. From this dismal malady he never afterward was perfectly relieved.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 11.

3563. MELANCHOLY, Philosophy of. Unfathomable. Heracitus, whose disposition [was] the reverse of that of Democritus, accounted everything a matter of melancholy. He seems to have been endowed with the austere spirit of a Carthusian; for, rejecting the chief magistracy of his native city, Ephesus, on account of the incorrigible vice of its inhabitants, he betook himself to the desert, and fed upon roots and water, making the beasts his companions in preference to man. He wrote a treatise on Nature, in which he made fire the origin of all things; but this fire he conceived to be endowed with mind, and to be properly the anima mundi, or the Divinity. His writings were purposely obscure, whence he got the epithet of . . . the dark philosopher. It is said that Euripides having sent this treatise on Nature to Socrates, the latter, with his accustomed modesty, gave it this character, that all that he could understand of it seemed good, and that what had surpassed his understanding might likewise be so.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 266.

3564. MELANCHOLY, Religious. George Fox the Quaker. A.D. 1644. The mind of Fox as it revolved the question of human destiny was agitated even to despair. . . . Abandoning his flocks and shoemaker's bench, he nourished his inexplicable grief by retired meditations, and . . . sought in the gloom of the forest for a vision of God. He questioned his life; but his blameless life was ignorant of remorse. He went to many "priests" for comfort, but found no comfort from them. . . . Some advised him to marry, others to join Cromwell's army. . . . His restless spirit drove him into the fields, where he walked many nights . . . in misery too great to be declared. Yet at times a beam of heavenly joy beamed upon his soul, and he reposed, as it were, serenely on Abraham's bosom.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 16.

3565. ———. Puritans. We may think of Cromwell standing in the market with his fellow-tradesmen, and striding through those fields, and by those roadsides, and by the course of the stream, then sedgy and swampy enough. What thoughts came upon him, for was he not fighting there the same battle Luther fought at Erfurth? He was vexed by fits of strange black hypochondria. Dr. Simcot, of Huntingdon, "in shadow of meaning, much meaning expressions," intimates to us how much he suffered. He was oppressed with dreadful consciousness of sin and defect. He groaned in spirit like Paul, like later saints—Bunyan, for instance. The stunted willows and sedgy water-courses, the flags and reeds, would often echo back the mourning words, "Oh, wretched man that I am!" What conception had he of the course lying before him? What knowledge had he of the intentions of Providence concerning him? Life lay before him all in shadow. For fifteen years he appears to have had no other concern than "to know Christ and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings."—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 44.

3566. MELANCHOLY resisted. Samuel Johnson. Johnson, upon the first violent attack of this disorder, strove to overcome it by forcible exertions. He frequently walked to Birmingham and back again, and tried many other expedients; but all in vain. His expression concerning it to me was, "I did not then know how to manage it." His distress became so intolerable, that he applied to Dr. Swinfin, physician in Lichfield. He mentioned to me now, for the first time, that he had been distressed by melancholy, and for that reason had been obliged to fly from study and meditation to the dissipating variety of life. Against melancholy he recommended constant occupation of mind, a great deal of exercise, moderation in eating and drinking, and especially to shun drinking at night. He said melancholy people were apt to fly to intemperance for relief, but that it sunk them much deeper in misery. He observed that laboring men who work hard and live sparingly are seldom or never troubled with low spirits.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 12.

3567. MELANCHOLY, Royal. Queen Elizabeth. From the death of Essex the queen, now in the seventieth year of her age, seemed to lose all enjoyment of life. She fell into profound melancholy; she reflected then with remorse on some past actions of her reign, and was at times under the most violent emotions of anguish and despair. Her constitution, enfeebled by age, very soon fell a victim to her mental disquietude; and perceiving her end approaching, she declared that the succession to the crown of England should devolve to her immediate heir, James VI. of Scotland.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 28, p. 394.

3568. MEMORIALS, Enduring. Language. It is one of the surprising results of moral power that language, composed of fleeting sounds, retains and transmits the remembrance of past occurrences long after every other has passed away. Of the labors of the Indians on the soil of Virginia there remains nothing so respectable as would be a common ditch for draining lands; the memorials of their former existence are found only in the names of the rivers and mountains.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 6.

3569. MEMORIALS, Odd. Old Shoes. [In 1612 Thomas Coryat,] having walked over many countries of Europe, hung up in his parish church as a memorial the one pair of shoes in which he had trudged nine hundred miles.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 22, p. 347.

3570. MEMORY, Blunders of. Goldsmith. One relates to a venerable dish of peas, served up at Sir Joshua's table, which should have been green, but were any other color. A wag suggested to Goldsmith, in a whisper, that they should be sent to Hammersmith, as that was the way to turn-em-green (Turnham Green). Goldsmith, delighted with the pun, endeavored to repeat it at Burke's table, but missed the point. "That is the way to make 'em green," said he. Nobody laughed. He perceived he was at fault. "I mean that is the road to turn 'em green." A dead pause and a stare; "whereupon," adds Beauclerc, "he started up disconcerted and abruptly left the table."—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 34, p. 201.

3571. MEMORY, Excellent. Samuel Johnson. He was uncommonly inquisitive; and his memory was so tenacious that he never forgot anything that he either heard or read. Mr. Hector remembers having recited to him eighteen verses, which, after a little pause, he repeated verbatim, varying only one epithet, by which he improved the line.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 9.

3572. MEMORY, Extraordinary. Poet Shelley. His powers of memory were extraordinary, and the rapidity with which he read a book, taking in seven or eight lines at a glance, and seizing the sense upon the hint of leading words, was no less astonishing. Impatient speed and indifference to minutiae were indeed among the cardinal qualities of his intellect. To them we may trace not only the swiftness of his imaginative flight, but also his frequent satisfaction with the somewhat less than perfect inartistic execution.—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 2.

3573. ——. William III. William III. had a memory that amazed all about him.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 5, p. 66.

3574. MEMORY, Marvellous. Napoleon I. He received all letters, read them, and never forgot their contents. . . . So retentive was his memory, that scenes over which he had once glanced his eye were never effaced from his mind. He recollected the respective produce of all taxes through every year of his administration.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 3.

3575. MEMORY, Patriotic. Abraham Lincoln. [He closed his first inaugural address, amid the threatenings of civil war, in these words:] "The mystic cord of memory, stretching from every battlefield and patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union, when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 6, p. 169.

3576. MEMORY trained. Abraham Lincoln. [He became a storekeeper and postmaster.] He was still employing every opportunity offered him to improve his mind. He had mastered grammar, and occupied his leisure time in general reading, taking care to write out a synopsis of every book he perused, so as to fix the contents in his memory.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 1, p. 26.

3577. MEN, Angelic. Swedenborg. The heaven of angels is formed from the human race, all angels having lived the life of men, and none having been so created; and as the perfection of heaven increases to eternity with the increase of regenerate men from the world, it follows that the earth will never cease to exist, nor men to live and be born upon it. The world is the seminary of heaven. Heaven depends upon the world for its growth, increase, and perfection. Heaven could not exist without worlds.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 12, p. 95.

3578. MEN vs. Animals. Napoleon I. The night after the battle of Bassano. . . . Napoleon rode over the plain, . . . covered with the bodies of the dying and the dead. . . . Suddenly a dog sprang from beneath the cloak of his dead master, and rushed to Napoleon, as if frantically imploring his aid, and then rushed back again to the mangled corpse, licking the blood from the face and the hands, and howling most piteously. Napoleon was deeply moved. . . . Many years afterward he remarked: "I know not how it is, but no incident upon any field of battle ever produced so deep an impression upon my feelings. This man, thought I, lies forsaken of all but his dog. . . . I had with tearless eyes beheld . . . thousands of my countrymen slain, and yet my sympathies were almost deeply and resistlessly moved by the mournful howling of a dog!"—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 6.

3579. MEN, Courting great. Samuel Johnson. I talked of the mode adopted by some to rise in the world, by courting great men, and asked him whether he had ever submitted to it. JOHNSON: "Why, sir, I never was near enough to great men to court them. You may be prudently attached to great men, and yet independent. You are not to do what you think wrong; and, sir, you are to calculate, and not pay too dear for what you get. You must not give a shilling's worth of court for sixpence worth of good. But if you can get a shilling's worth of good for sixpence worth of court, you are a fool if you do not pay court."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 141.

3580. MEN, Periods of Great. Discoverers. Copernicus, the son of a Prussian surgeon, was born in 1473, ten years before the birth of Luther, and thirteen years before the discovery of America. Great men appear to come in groups. About the same time were born the man who revolutionized science, the man who reformed religion, the man who added another continent to the known world, and the man who invented printing. So, in later times, Watt, the improver of the steam-engine, Hargrave and Arkwright, the inventors of the spinning machinery, began their experiments almost in the same year.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 204.

3581. MEN, Providential, Great. Cromwell. Doubtless, as we have often heard, great men are the outbirths of their time; there is a providence in their appearance, they are not the product of chance; they come, God-appointed, to do their work among men, and they are immortal till their work is done. We should not, perhaps, speak so much of the absolute greatness of the men of one age as compared with the men of another; they are all equally fitted to the task of the day. Let the man who most hates the memory of Cromwell ask not so much what the land and the law were with him, as what they must inevitably have been without him. Remove the leading man from any time, and you break the harmony of the time, you destroy the work of that age; for an age cannot move without its great men—they inspire it, they urge it forward, they are its priests and its prophets and its monarchs. The hero of a time, therefore, is the history of a time; he is the focus where influences are gathered, and from whence they shoot out. It has been said that all institutions are the projected shadow of some great man, he has absorbed all the light of his time in himself; perhaps he has not created, yet now he throws forth light from his name—clear, steady, practical light, that shall travel over a century; his name shall be the synonym of an epoch, and shall include all the events of that age. Thus it is with Cromwell.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 1, p. 20.

3582. ———. Charlemagne. [M. Guizot says:] "Why a great man comes at a particular epoch, and what force of his own he puts into the development of the world, no one can say. This is a secret of Providence; but, nevertheless, the fact is certain." Such a man does come to put an end to anarchy and social stagnation—a terrible and often a tyrannical power. Such a man was Charlemagne. He drove back the barbarian forces that were pressing forward against the establishment of European civilization by his power as a conqueror. He reduced the scattered elements of authority and justice into a system by his skill as an administrator. He gave the grape of the south to the shores of the Rhine, and otherwise extended the domain of fertility, as a physical improver. He raised up the real civilizing power of knowledge to render his triumphs of war and peace of permanent utility by his zeal as a patriot and his zeal as a student.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 6, p. 75.

3583. MEN, Imaginary. Americans. The earliest books on America contain tales as wild as fancy could invent or credulity repeat. The land was peopled with pygmies and with giants. The tropical forests were said to conceal tribes of negroes; and tenants of the hyperborean regions were white, like the polar bear or ermine. Jacques Cartier had heard of a nation that did not eat; and the pedant Lafitan believed, if not in a race of headless men, at least that there was a nation with the head not rising above the shoulder.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

3584. MEN, Large. King Frederick William. The ambition of the king was to form a brigade of giants, and every country was ransacked by his agents for men above the ordinary stature. These researches were not confined to Europe. No head that towered above the crowd in the bazaars of Aleppo, of Cairo, or of Surat could escape the crimps of Frederick William. One Irishman more than seven feet high, who was picked up in London by the Prussian ambassador, received a bounty of nearly £1300 sterling—very much more than the ambassador's salary. This extravagance was the more absurd because a stout youth of five feet eight, who might have been procured for a few dollars, would in all probability have been a much more valuable soldier.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 8.

3585. MEN, Misplaced. James II.—Raleigh. On a cold October morning, in 1619, a great crime was perpetrated. . . . That fine old English gentleman, Sir Walter Raleigh, was brought forth to the scaffold in Palace Yard. Perhaps the reader is scarcely able to repress the feeling, even now, of abhorrent indignation that such a miserable piece of loathsome corruption as James should have been able to order the death of so great and magnanimous a man. It was on the 29th of October, when the officers went into his room to tell him that all was in readiness for his execution, they found him smoking his last pipe and drinking his last cup of sack, remarking to those who came to fetch him that "it was a good liquor, if a man might stay by it." He said he was ready, and so they set forth.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 37.

3586. MEN, Self-made. William Pitt. [He was first vice-treasurer of Ireland, and shortly after promoted to be paymaster-general.] Pitt, without wealth or high birth, had made himself the marked man of his time . . . . In five years he raised a dispirited nation to an unprecedented height of honor and power.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 12, p. 179.

3587. MEN, Similarity in. Babes. A story is told, how many years since, before the age of railways, a nobleman and his lady, with their infant child, travelling in a wild neighborhood, were overtaken by a snow-storm and compelled to seek shelter in a rude shepherd's hut; when the nurse, who was in attendance upon her lord and lady, began undressing the infant by the side of the warm fire, the inhabitants of the hut gazed in awe and silence at the process. As the little one was disrobed of its silken frock and fine linen, and rich dress after dress was taken away, still the shepherd and his wife gazed with awe, until, when the process of undressing was completed, and the naked baby was being washed and warmed by the fire, when all the wrap-pages and outer husks were peeled off, the shepherd and his wife exclaimed, "Why, it's just like one of ours!" But it is a very difficult thing to understand that kings and queens and princes are just like one of us when their state robes are off; and thus the adventures of fugitive Charles [II.] derive their interest and sanctity from the supposed importance of the person, and the worship with which he is regarded arises from the sense of the place he fills, and his essential importance to the future schemes of Almighty Providence.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 13, p. 169.

3588. MERCY, Provision for. Abraham Lincoln. His doorkeepers had standing orders from him, that no matter how great might be the throng, if either senators or representatives had to wait, or to be turned away without an audience, he must see, before the day closed, every messenger who came to him with a petition for the saving of life.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 736.

3589. MERIT, Evidence of. Ruler. He who is born in purple is seldom worthy to reign; but the elevation of a private man, of a peasant, perhaps, or a slave, affords a strong presumption of his courage and capacity.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 52, p. 325.

3590. MERIT, Force of. Poet Terence. Terence made his first appearance when Cæcilius was at the height of his reputation. It is said that, when he offered his first play to the Ædiles, they sent him with it to Cæcilius for his judgment of the piece. Cæcilius was then at supper; and as the young bard was very meanly dressed, he was bid to sit behind on a low stool, and to read his composition. Scarcely, however, had he read a few sentences, when Cæcilius desired him to approach, and placed him at the table next to himself. His reputation arose at once to such a height that his "Eunuchus," on its first appearance, was publicly performed twice each day.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 3, p. 430.

3591. MERIT, Ignorance of. Saracens. [At the sacking of Madayn in Persia.] From the remote islands of the Indian Ocean a large provision of camphire had been imported, which is employed with a mixture of wax to illuminate the palaces of the East. Strangers to the name and properties of that odoriferous gum, the Saracens, mistaking it for salt, mingled the camphire in their bread, and were astonished at the bitterness of the taste. One of the apartments of the palace was decorated with a carpet of silk sixty cubits in length and as many in breadth; a paradise or garden was depicted on the ground; the flowers, fruits, and shrubs were imitated by the figures of the gold embroidery and the colors of the precious stones; and the ample square was encircled by a variegated and verdant border. The Arabian general persuaded his soldiers to relinquish their claim, in the reasonable hope that the eyes of the caliph would be delighted with the splendid workmanship of nature and industry. Regardless of the merit of art and the pomp of royalty, the rigid Omar divided the prize among his brethren of Medina; the picture was destroyed; but such was the intrinsic value of the materials, that the share of Ali alone was sold for 20,000 drams.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 187.

3592. MERIT, Nobility by. Napoleon I. [The Austrian] Emperor Francis . . . was extremely anxious to prove the illustrious descent of his prospective son-in-law. . . . Napoleon refused to have the account published, remarking, "I had rather be the descendant of an honest man than of any petty tyrant of Italy. I wish my nobility to commence with myself, and derive all my titles from the French people. I am the Rudolph of Hapsburg of my family. My patent of nobility dates from the battle of Montenotte."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 1.

3593. MERIT, Partial. Samuel Johnson. He talked very contemptuously of Churchill's poetry. . . . "No, sir, I called the fellow a blockhead at first, and I will call him a blockhead still. However, I will acknowledge that I have a better opinion of him now than I once had; for he has shown more fertility than I expected. To be sure, he is a tree that cannot produce good fruit; he only bears crabs. But, sir, a tree that produces a great many crabs is better than a tree which produces only a few."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 115.

3594. MERIT, Promotion by. Anglo-Saxons. The Saxons, who enjoyed the same liberty with all the ancient Germans, retained that political freedom in their new settlements to which they had been accustomed in their own country. Their kings, who were no more than the chiefs of a clan or tribe, possessed no greater authority than what is commonly annexed to that character in all barbarous nations. The chief, or king, was the first among the citizens, but his authority depended more on his personal abilities than on his rank. "He was even so far considered as on a level with the people that a stated price was fixed on his head, and a legal fine was levied on his murderer; which, although proportioned to his station, and superior to that paid for the life of a subject, was a sensible mark of his subordination to the community."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 6, p. 117.

3595. MERIT, Supremacy of. Napoleon I. [When twenty-six years of age he was made commander-in-chief of the army of Italy, with veteran officers under him.] There were many very beautiful and dissolute females in Nice, . . . who, trafficking in their charms, were living in great wealth and voluptuousness. . . . Their allurements were unavailing. . . . He had no religious scruples to interfere with his indulgences. . . . "I pursued a line of conduct in the highest degree irreproachable and exemplary. . . . My supremacy could be retained only by proving myself a better man than any other man in the army. Had I yielded to human weaknesses I should have lost my power."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 4.

3596. METAPHYSICS, Contempt for. Napoleon I. [After overcoming the Austrian army] he entered the celebrated university [at Pavia], accompanied by his military suite. With the utmost celerity he moved from class to class, asking questions with such rapidity the professors could hardly find time or breath to answer his questions. "What class is this?" he inquired, as he entered the first recitation room. "The class of metaphysics," was the reply. Napoleon, who had but very little respect for the uncertain deductions of mental philosophy, exclaimed, very emphatically, "Bah!" and took a pinch of snuff.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 5.

3597. METHOD, Regulated by. John Wesley. "John Wesley's conversation is good, but he is never at leisure. He is always obliged to go at a certain hour. This is very disagreeable to a man who loves to fold his legs and have out his talk, as I do."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 361.

3598. MIND vs. Body. Columbus. [He spent five months exploring the West Indies, amid great hardships and perils.] The moment he was relieved from all solicitude, and beheld himself in a known and tranquil sea, the excitement suddenly ceased, and mind and body sank exhausted by almost superhuman exertions. The very day on which he sailed from Mona he was struck with a sudden malady, which deprived him of memory, of sight, and all his faculties. He fell into a deep lethargy, resembling death itself. His crew, alarmed at this profound torpor, feared that death was really at hand. They abandoned, therefore, all further prosecution of the voyage, and spreading their sails to the east wind so prevalent in those seas, bore Columbus back, in a state of complete insensibility, to the harbor of Isabella [from whence he had sailed].—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 7, ch. 7.

3599. ——. William Prince of Orange. The audacity of his spirit was the more remarkable because his physical organization was unusually delicate. From a child he had been weak and sickly. In the prime of manhood his complaints had been aggravated by a severe attack of small-pox. He was asthmatic and consumptive. His slender frame was shaken by a constant hoarse cough. He could not sleep unless his head was propped by several pillows, and could scarcely draw his breath in any but the purest air. Cruel headaches frequently tortured him. Exertion soon fatigued him. The physicians constantly kept up the hopes of his enemies by fixing some date beyond which, if there were anything certain in medical science, it was impossible that his broken constitution could hold out. Yet, through a life which was one long disease, the force of his mind never failed, on any great occasion, to bear up his suffering and languid body.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 155.

3600. MIND, Entertainment of. Dr. Campbell. [Dr. Campbell is taken to dine with a citizen of London. He says:] I'll do so no more, for there is no entertainment but meat or drink with that class of people.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 113.

3601. MIND, Infirmities of. Universal. It is a very ancient remark, that folly has its corner in the brain of every wise man; and certain it is, that not the poets only, like Tasso, but the clearest minds—Sir Isaac Newton, Pascal, Spinoza—have been deeply tinged with insanity. . . . It was at least natural for Bradford and his contemporaries, while they acknowledged his [Roger Williams] power as a preacher, to esteem him unsettled in judgment.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 9.

3602. MIND, Surroundings of. Cromwell. Robert Cromwell, father of the future sovereign of England, brought up his family in poverty. . . . The poor, rough, unyielding nature of this moist country, the unbroken horizon, the muddy river, cloudy sky, and miserable trees . . . were calculated to sadden the disposition of a child. The character of the scenes in which we are brought up impresses our souls. Great fanatics generally proceed from sad and sterile countries. Mahomet sprang from the scorching valleys of Arabia; Luther from the frozen mountains of Lower Germany; Calvin from the inanimate plains of Picardy; Cromwell from the stagnant marshes of the Ouse. As is the place, so is the man.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 5.

3603. MIND, Undeveloped. Reign of James II. [The Roman Catholic country squire.] The disabilities under which he lay had prevented his mind from expanding to the standard, moderate as that standard was, which the minds of Protestant country gentlemen then ordinarily attained. Excluded when a boy from Eton and Westminster, when a youth from Oxford and Cambridge, when a man from Parliament and from the bench of justice, he generally vegetated as quietly as the elms of the avenue which led to his ancestral grange. His corn-fields, his dairy and his cider press, his greyhounds, his fishing-rod and his gun, his ale and his tobacco, occupied almost all his thoughts. With his neighbors, in spite of his religion, he was generally on good terms. They knew him to be unambitious and inoffensive.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 306.

3604. MIND undisturbed. Samuel Johnson. When a person was mentioned who said, "I have lived fifty-one years in this world without having had ten minutes of uneasiness," he exclaimed, "The man who says so lies: he attempts to impose on human credulity." The Bishop of Exeter in vain observed that men were very different. His Lordship's manner was not impressive, and I learned afterward that Johnson did not find out that the person who talked to him was a prelate; if he had, I doubt not that he would have treated him with more respect.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 516.

3605. MIND, Versatility of. Queen Elizabeth. Elizabeth could talk poetry with Spenser and philosophy with Bruno; she could discuss euphuism with Lilly, and enjoy the chivalry of Essex; she could turn from talk of the last fashions to pore with Cecil over despatches and treasury-books; she could pass from tracking traitors with Walsingham to settle points of doctrine with Parker, or to calculate with Frobisher the chances of a north-west passage to the Indies. The versatility and many-sidedness of her mind enabled her to understand every phase of the intellectual movement about her, and to fix by a sort of instinct on its higher representatives.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 710.

3606. MINDS, Narrow. Characteristic. Defoe, in general no illiberal judge, complained of the inconveniences of Bristol—its narrow streets, its narrow river, and "also another narrow—that is, the minds of the generality of its people."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 1, p. 7.

3607. MINISTERS constrained. Mahomet. Aboutaleb, dreading the calamities which would afflict the people through the civil war which the obstinacy of his nephew was about to provoke, besought the deputies to wait, and sent to call Mahomet. "Avoid then," said he to him in their presence, with a tone of reproach and paternal pain, "to bring upon thee and thine the calamities that now menace us." "Oh, my uncle," replied Mahomet, sadly, "I would wish it were in my power to obey thee without a crime; but though the sun were made to descend upon my right and the moon upon my left, to compel me to silence, and though death were set before me face to face, to intimidate me, I would not give up the work which I am ordered to attempt." In speaking these words he wept with regret at not being able to gratify his uncle, and being inevitably cast off by him in consequence. He made some steps to leave the assembly; but Aboutaleb, affected by his countenance and edified by his conviction, said to him, "Come back, my brother's son." Mahomet approached him. "Well," said the uncle to him, "go on prophesying what thou wilt, never—I vow it here before thyself and thy accusers—I shall I abandon thee to thine enemies."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 76.

3608. MINISTERS, Discreet. Pagans. [Julian the Apostate endeavored to elevate the pagan religion of the Romans. He said:] When they are summoned in their turn to officiate before the altar, they ought not, during the appointed number of days, to depart from the precincts of the temple; nor should a single day be suffered to elapse without the prayers and the sacrifice which they are obliged to offer for the prosperity of the State and of individuals. The exercise of their sacred functions requires an immaculate purity, both of mind and body; and even when they are dismissed from the temple to the occupations of common life, it is incumbent on them to excel in decency and virtue the rest of their fellow-citizens. The priest of the gods should never be seen in theatres or taverns. His conversation should be chaste, his diet temperate, his friends of honorable reputation; and if he sometimes visits the Forum or the Palace, he should appear only as the advocate of those who have vainly solicited either justice or mercy. His studies should be suited to the sanctity of his profession.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 23, p. 426.

3609. MINISTERS, Salary of. £50 to £72. [In 1688 eminent clergymen's income was £72. The lesser clergymen £50.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 3, p. 36.

3610. ———. Paid in Tobacco. [In 1754, in the colony of Virginia, tobacco] was the measure of value, and the principal currency. Public officers, ministers of the church, had their salaries paid at so many annual pounds of tobacco.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 13, p. 207.

3611. MINISTERS, Wives of. Duties in 1547. [Her duties were to see that his dairy was kept sweet, his wool converted into useful raiment, his strawberry plants trimmed and watered, and his bees lived in due season.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 29, p. 488.

3612. MINISTERS, Work of. Lay. It may be affirmed that not only was Methodism founded in the New World by local preachers—by Embury in New York, Webb in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, Strawbridge in Maryland, Neal in Canada, Gilbert in the West Indies, and Black in Nova Scotia—but that nearly its whole frontier march, from the extreme north to the Gulf of Mexico, has been led on by these humble laborers.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 2, p. 139.

3613. MINISTRY, Call to the. By a Text. Two of the early Methodists, whose names were Owen and Carpenter, had frequent conversations about their duty to proclaim the gospel. They agreed to settle the question by opening the Bible and following the lead of the first passage which presented itself. Owen opened the Bible, and the first sentence his eyes fell upon was, "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel." Carpenter said, "I cannot." Owen said, "I will;" the thing with him was settled.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 2, p. 334.

3614. ———. Methodists. [At the third Wesleyan Conference three tests were given to decide the question for those who felt called to preach the gospel.] "Have they gifts, grace, and usefulness? First: Do they know God as a pardoning God? Have they the love of God abiding in them? Do they desire and seek nothing but God? Are they holy in all manner of conversation? Second: Have they gifts (as well as grace) for the work? Have they (in some tolerable degree) a clear, sound understanding? Have they a right judgment in the things of God? Have they a just conception of salvation by faith? And has God given them any degree of utterance? Do they speak justly, readily, clearly? Third: Have they fruit? Are any truly convinced of sin, and converted to God by their preaching? As long as these three marks concur in any, we believe," affirmed the Conference, "that he is called of God to preach. These we receive as a sufficient proof that he is moved thereto by the Holy Ghost;" a decision which has never been essentially modified [by the Methodist Church].—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 316.

3615. MINISTRY, An early. Rev. Richard Watson. This eminent theologian of Wesleyan Methodism entered the ministry when sixteen years old. He was remarkable in childhood for the precocity of his faculties.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 3, p. 81.

3616. MINISTRY, Expelled from the. Rev. Samuel Johnson. It was resolved that, before the punishment was inflicted, Johnson should be degraded from the priesthood. The prelates who had been charged by the ecclesiastical commission with the care of the diocese of London cited him before them in the chapter house of Saint Paul's Cathedral. The manner in which he went through the ceremony made a deep impression on many minds. When he was stripped of his sacred robe, he exclaimed, "You are taking away my gown because I have tried to keep your gowns on your backs." The only part of the formalities which seemed to distress him was the plucking of the Bible out of his hand. He made a faint struggle to retain the sacred book, kissed it, and burst into tears. "You cannot," he said, "deprive me of the hopes which I owe to it." [He had written tracts against Romanism.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 99.

3617. MINORITY, Power of. James II. Then followed an auction, the strangest that history has recorded. On one side the king, on the other the Church, began to bid eagerly against each other for the favor of those whom up to that time king and Church had combined to oppress. The Protestant Dissenters, who, a few months before, had been a despised and proscribed class, now held the balance of power. The harshness with which they had been treated was universally condemned. The court tried to throw all the blame on the hierarchy. The hierarchy flung it back on the court. The king declared that he had unwillingly persecuted the separatists only because his affairs had been in such a state that he could not venture to disoblige the established clergy. The established clergy protested that they had borne a part in severities uncongenial to their feelings only from deference to the authority of the king.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 199.

3618. MINORITY, Power of. Cromwell. Cromwell having a design to set up himself, and bring the crown upon his own head, sent for some of the chief city divines, as if he made it a matter of conscience to be determined by their advice. Among these was the leading Mr. Calamy, who very boldly opposed the project of Cromwell's single government, and offered to prove it both unlawful and impracticable. Cromwell answered readily upon the first head of unlawful, and appealed to the safety of the nation being the supreme law. "But," says he, "pray, Mr. Calamy, why impracticable?" He replied, "Oh, it is against the voice of the nation; there will be nine in ten against you!" "Very well," says Cromwell; "but what if I should disarm the nine, and put the sword in the tenth man's hand—would not that do the business?"—NOTE IN TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30, p. 416.

3619. MINORITY, Presumptuous. Annexing England. The lure to James was the hand of the English king's daughter, Margaret Tudor. For five years the negotiations dragged wearily along. The bitter hate of the two peoples blocked the way, and even Henry's ministers objected that the English crown might be made by the match the heritage of a Scottish king. "Then," they said, "Scotland will annex England." "No," said the king, with shrewd sense; "in such a case England would annex Scotland, for the greater always draws to it the less." His steady pressure at last won the day. In 1502 the marriage treaty with the Scot king was formally concluded; and quiet, as Henry trusted, secured in the north.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 500.

3620. MIRACLE, Fraudulent. Weeping Virgin. At Loretto there was an image of the Virgin, which the Church represented as of celestial origin, and which . . . seemed to shed tears in view of the perils of the Papacy. Napoleon sent for the sacred image, exposed the deception, by which, through the instrumentality of glass beads, tears appeared to flow, and imprisoned the priests for deluding the people with trickery which tended to bring all religion into contempt.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 7.

3621. MIRACLES, False. Delphic Priests. The town of Delphi, famous for its oracle, was a tempting object of plunder, from the treasures accumulated in its temple. These were saved by the laudable artifice of the priests. After ordering the inhabitants of the town to quit their houses, and fly with their wives and children to the mountains, these men, from their skill in that species of legerdemain which can work miracles upon the rude and ignorant, contrived, by artificial thunders and lightnings, accompanied with horrible noises, while vast fragments of rock hurled from the precipices gave all the appearance of an earthquake, to create such terror in the assailing Persians [under Xerxes], that they firmly believed the divinity of the place had interfered to protect his temple, and fled with dismay from the sacred territory.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 1, p. 134.

3622. ———. Mahomet's. The votaries of Mahomet are more assured than himself of his miraculous gifts, and their confidence and credulity increase as they are further removed from the time and place of his spiritual exploits. They believe or affirm that trees went forth to meet him; that he was saluted by stones; that water gushed from his fingers; that he fed the hungry, cured the sick, and raised the dead; that a beam groaned to him; that a camel complained to him; that a shoulder of mutton informed him of its being poisoned; and that both animate and inanimate nature were equally subject to the apostle of God.—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 25.

3623. ———. Mahomet's. A mysterious animal, the Borak, conveyed him from the temple of Mecca to that of Jerusalem; with his companion Gabriel he successively ascended the seven heavens, and received and repaid the salutations of the patriarchs, the prophets, and the angels, in their respective mansions. Beyond the seventh heaven Mahomet alone was permitted to proceed; he passed the veil of unity, approached within two bow-shots of the throne, and felt a cold that pierced him to the heart when his shoulder was touched by the hand of God. After this familiar though important conversation he again descended to Jerusalem, remounted the Borak, returned to Mecca, and performed in the tenth part of the night the journey of many thousand years. According to another legend, the apostle confounded in a national assembly the malicious challenge of the Koreish. His resistless word split asunder the orb of the moon; the obedient planet stooped from her station in the sky, accomplished the seven revolutions round the Caaba, saluted Mahomet in the Arabian tongue, and, suddenly contracting her dimensions, entered at the collar, and issued forth through the sleeve of his shirt.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 118.

3624. MIRACLES by Martyrs. Catholic. [The disobedience of the Catholics of Tipasa in Africa toward the Arian bishop appointed over them, exasperated the] cruelty of Hunneric. A military count was despatched from Carthage to Tipasa; he collected the Catholics in the Forum, and, in the presence of the whole province, deprived the guilty of their right hands and their tongues. But the holy confessors continued to speak without tongues; and this miracle is attested by Victor, an African bishop, who published a history of the persecution within two years after the event. "If any one," says Victor, "should doubt of the truth, let him repair to Constantinople, and listen to the clear and perfect language of Restitutius, the sub-deacon, one of these glorious sufferers, who is now lodged in the palace of the Emperor Zeno, and is respected by the devout empress." At Constantinople we are astonished to find a cool, a learned, and unexceptionable witness, without interest and without passion. Æneas of Gaza, a Platonic philosopher, has accurately described his own observations on these African sufferers: "I saw them myself; I heard them speak; I diligently inquired by what means such an articulate voice could be formed without any organ of speech; I used my eyes to examine the report of my ears; I opened their mouth, and saw that the whole tongue had been completely torn away by the roots—an operation which the physicians generally suppose to be mortal." The testimony of Æneas of Gaza might be confirmed by the superfluous evidence of the Emperor Justinian, in a perpetual edict; of Count Marcellinus, in his chronicle of the times; and of Pope Gregory I., who had resided at Constantinople as the minister of the Roman pontiff.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 35, p. 557.

3625. MIRACLES, Modern. Pascal. Pascal was fully persuaded that miracles were still performed in this world. One of his nieces was afflicted, for three years and a half, with a fistula in the tear-gland of one of her eyes, which the most eminent surgeons of Paris pronounced incurable. The mother of the child, acting upon the advice of Pascal, took her to a church where was preserved what was called "the holy thorn"—that is, one of the thorns of Christ's crown of thorns. The fistula was then so bad that matter ran from it, not only through the eye, but from the nose and mouth. "Nevertheless," she says, "the child was cured, in a moment, by the touch of the holy thorn."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 103.

3626. MIRACLES, Monkish. Legendary. [The Egyptian and Syrian monks were considered the favorites of heaven, and were accustomed to cure inveterate diseases with a touch, a word,] or a distant message, and to expel the most obstinate demons from the souls or bodies which they possessed. They familiarly accosted, or imperiously commanded, the lions and serpents of the deserts; infused vegetation into a sapless trunk; suspended iron on the surface of the water; passed the Nile on the back of a crocodile, and refreshed themselves in a fiery furnace. These extravagant tales, which display the fiction, without the genius, of poetry, have seriously affected the reason, the faith, and the morals of the Christians.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 37, p. 540.

3627. MIRTH, ill-timed. Cromwell. [Trial of Charles I.] Another of his relations, Colonel Ingoldsby, entered the hall accidentally while the officers were signing the sentence of the Parliament, and refused to set his name to an act that his conscience disapproved. Cromwell rose from his seat, and clasping Ingoldsby in his arms, as if the death-warrant of the king was a camp frolic, carried him to the table, and guiding the pen in his hand, forced him to sign, with a laugh and a joke. When all had affixed their names, Cromwell, as if unable to contain his joy, snatched the pen from the fingers of the last, dipped it anew in the ink, and smeared the face of his next neighbor, either thinking or not thinking that in that ink he beheld the blood of his king.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 44.

3628. MISFORTUNE, Born to. Charles I. There were many unfortunate circumstances which combined to bring about the unhappy doom of Charles I. He was unfortunate in his own nature, in himself; it was unhappy that one with a nature so weak and a will so strong should be called upon to face men and circumstances such as he found arrayed against him. But we have always thought the most unfortunate in the life of Charles to have been that he was the son of his father. The name of James I. has become, speaking on the best authority, synonymous with every sentiment of contempt. It is quite doubtful whether a single feature of character or a single incident in his history can command unchallenged regard or respect; that about him which does not provoke indignation excites laughter. His conduct as sovereign of his own country, of Scotland—before he succeeded to the throne of England—was such as to awaken more than our suspicion, beyond doubt to rouse our abhorrence. He has been handed down through history as a great investigator of the mysteries of kingcraft; but the record of the criminal trials of Scotland shows that he chiefly exercised his sagacity among those mysteries for the purpose of procuring vengeance on those monsters of iniquity who had sneered at his person or undervalued his abilities. Whenever his own person was reflected on he followed the delinquent like a panther prowling for his prey; and, as Pitcairn has shown in his immense and invaluable work on the criminal trials of Scotland, he never failed in pursuing his victim to death.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 34.

3629. MISFORTUNE, Cruelty with. American Indians. The aged and infirm met with little tenderness [from the hunting tribes]. The hunters, as they roam the wilderness, desert their old men; if provisions fail, the feeble drop down and are lost, or life is shortened by a blow. . . . Those who lingered among them [with serious diseases], especially the aged, were sometimes neglected, and sometimes put to death.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

3630. MISFORTUNE, Fellowship in. Lucien Bonaparte. When Napoleon was imprisoned upon the rock of St. Helena, Lucien applied to the British Government for permission to share his captivity. He offered to go, with or without his wife and children, for two years. He engaged not to occasion any augmentation of the expense, and promised to submit to every restriction placed upon his brother.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 1.

3631. MISFORTUNE overruled. Oliver Goldsmith. [He intended to sail for Holland; . . . was diverted by jovial companions, and sailed for Bordeaux.] It seems that the agreeable companions with whom our greenhorn had struck up such a sudden intimacy were Scotchmen in the French service, who had been in Scotland enlisting recruits for the French army. In vain Goldsmith protested his innocence; he was marched off with his fellow-revellers to prison, whence he with difficulty obtained his release at the end of a fortnight. With his customary facility, however, at palliating his misadventures, he found everything turn out for the best. His imprisonment saved his life, for during his detention the ship proceeded on her voyage, but was wrecked at the mouth of the Garonne, and all on board perished.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 5, p. 45.

3632. MISFORTUNES, Effect of. Frederick the Great. [By the misfortunes of war and the loss of his mother.] the most cynical of men was very unhappy. His face was so haggard and his form so thin that when on his return from Bohemia he passed through Leipsic, the people hardly knew him again. His sleep was broken; the tears in spite of himself often started into his eyes; and the grave began to present itself to his agitated mind as the best refuge from misery and dishonor. . . . He always carried about with him a sure and speedy poison in a small glass case; and to the few in whom he placed confidence he made no mystery of his resolution.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 90.

3633. MISSION in Life. William Prince of Orange. [He had been invited to invade England, to rescue it from tyranny and Catholicism.] Hundreds of Calvinistic preachers proclaimed that the same power which had set apart Samson from the womb to be the scourge of the Philistine, and which had called Gideon from the threshing-floor to smite the Midianite, had raised up William of Orange to be the champion of all free nations and of all pure churches ; nor was this notion without influence on his own mind. To the confidence which the heroic fatalist placed in his high destiny and in his sacred cause is to be partly attributed his singular indifference to danger. He had a great work to do ; and till it was done, nothing could harm him. Therefore it was that, in spite of physicians, he recovered from maladies which seemed hopeless ; that bands of assassins conspired in vain against his life ; that the open skiff, to which he trusted himself in a starless night, on a raging ocean, and near a treacherous shore, brought him safe to land ; and that, on twenty fields of battle, the cannon-balls passed him to the right and left.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 170.

3634. MISSION misjudged. Strangers. [King Louis Philippe and his brothers visited America, and went West in disguise.] In a log-tavern of a single apartment, wherein the guests slept on the floor and the landlord and his wife on the only bedstead, the duke overheard the landlord, in the night, saying to his wife what a pity it was that three such promising young men should be roaming about the country without object, instead of buying land in that settlement and establishing themselves respectably.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 509.

3635. MISSIONARIES, Discoveries by. Catholic. Years before the Pilgrims anchored within Cape Cod, the Roman Church had been planted, by missionaries from France, in the Eastern moiety of Maine ; and Le Caron, an unambitious Franciscan, the companion of Champlain, had penetrated the lands of the Mohawks, had passed to the north into the hunting-grounds of the Wyandots, and, bound by his vows to the life of a beggar, had, on foot, or paddling a bark canoe, gone onward and still onward, taking alms of the savages, till he reached the rivers of Lake Huron.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 20.

3636. MISSIONARIES, Heroism of. Jesuits. Immediately on its institution their missionaries, kindled with a heroism which defied every danger and endured every toil, made their way to the ends of the earth ; they raised the emblem of man's salvation on the Moluccas, in India, in Japan, in Cochin China ; they penetrated Ethiopia, and reached the Abyssinians ; they planted missions among the Caffres ; in California, on the banks of the Marañon, in the plains of Paraguay, they invited the wildest of barbarians to the civilization of Christianity.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 20.

3637. MISSIONARIES, Zealous. Irish. Patrick, the first missionary of the island, had not been half a century dead when Irish Christianity flung itself with a fiery zeal into battle with the mass of heathenism which was rolling in upon the Christian world. Irish missionaries labored among the Picts of the Highlands and among the Frisians of the northern seas. An Irish missionary, Columba, founded monasteries in Burgundy and the Apennines. The Canton of St. Gall still commemorates in its name another Irish missionary, before whom the spirits of flood and fell fled wailing over the waters of the Lake of Constance. For a time it seemed as if the course of the world's history was to be changed ; as if the older Celtic race that Roman and German had swept before them had turned to the moral conquest of their conquerors ; as if Celtic and not Latin Christianity was to mould the destinies of the churches of the West.—HIST. OF ENGLISH PEOPLE, § 49.

3638. MISSIONARY, A false. Cortez. Six large vessels were speedily equipped, and three hundred men eagerly volunteered to follow a leader already known for his courage and skill. The orders given by Velasquez to the commander of the expedition enjoined it upon him to deal gently and liberally with the Mexicans, since the grand objects in view were, first, and above all, to convert them to Christianity ; secondly, to open with them a peaceful, honest commerce ; and, lastly, to get such a knowledge of the country and its waters as would be of use to future navigators.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 320.

3639. MISSIONS by Conquest. Failure. The king [of Portugal], entering warmly into his [Alfonso d'Albuquerque] views, gave him a secret commission as Governor-in-Chief of the Indies, with powers almost absolute, and with orders to go out merely as captain of one of the ships of a fleet, and, on reaching India, to produce his commission and assume the supreme command. He set sail in 1506, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, commanding one vessel of a fleet of fourteen sail. His commission expressly stated that the king's first object was the spread of Christianity, and that to this end all others were to be strictly secondary. [India was not Christianized by an armed fleet.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 313.

3640. MISSIONS destroyed. In Japan. Political tenets, it may be believed, had mingled themselves with religious notions, and the emperor was very justly apprehensive that this fervor shown by the Spaniards and Portuguese for the conversion of his subjects was but a preparative to their designs against the empire itself. . . . Still, however, the indulgence of the emperor allowed these foreigners a free trade till the year 1637, when a Spanish ship happened to be taken by the Dutch, near the Cape of Good Hope, on board of which were found letters from a Portuguese officer to the court of Spain, containing the project of a conspiracy for dethroning and putting to death the Emperor of Japan, and seizing the government. The Dutch were jealous of the lucrative trade carried on by the Spaniards in this country, and immediately conveyed intelligence of this conspiracy to the court of Japan. The Portuguese officer was seized, and confessed the whole design. He was immediately put to death, and the emperor, in a solemn assembly of his nobles, pronounced an edict forbidding, on pain of death, any of his subjects leaving the kingdom, and commanding that all the Spaniards and Portuguese should be instantly expelled from Japan ; that all Christian converts should be imprisoned, and offering a very high reward for the discovery of any priest or missionary who should remain in his dominions. The Christians actually rose in arms, and were mad enough to attempt resistance, but they were overpowered and expelled to a man.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 24, p. 250.

3641. MISSIONS develop Science. Columbus. [Discovery of unknown lands.] A deep religious sentiment mingled with his meditations, and gave them at times a tinge of superstition, but it was of a sublime and lofty kind; he looked upon himself as standing in the hand of Heaven, chosen from among men for the accomplishment of its high purpose; he read, as he supposed, his contemplated discovery foretold in Holy Writ, and shadowed forth darkly in the mystic revelations of the prophets. The ends of the earth were to be brought together, and all nations and tongues and languages united under the banners of the Redeemer. This was to be the triumphant consummation of his enterprise, bringing the remote and unknown regions of the earth into communion with Christian Europe; carrying the light of the true faith into benighted and pagan lands, and gathering their countless nations under the holy dominion of the church. . . . Columbus first conceived an enthusiastic idea, or rather made a kind of mental vow, which remained more or less present to his mind until the very day of his death. He determined that, should his projected enterprise be successful, he would devote the profits arising from his anticipated discoveries to a crusade for the rescue of the holy sepulchre from the power of the infidels.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 2, ch. 4, 5.

3642. MISSIONS, Successful. In Japan. The Spaniards, soon after they obtained the sovereignty of Portugal, availed themselves of the discovery of these islands, and began to carry on an immense trade to the coast of Japan. The Japanese were fond of this intercourse, and the emperor encouraged it; but this favorable disposition was nothing more than an incentive to the ambition of the Spaniards to aim at the absolute sovereignty of the country. For this purpose they began by their usual mode of employing missionaries to convert the idolatrous Japanese to the Christian religion. Legions of priests were sent over, and so zealous were they in their function, that toward the end of the sixteenth century they boasted that the number of their new converts amounted to no less than 600,000. [See Missions Destroyed.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 24, p. 250.

3643. MISSIONS to be sustained. Melville B. Coz. [He was about to embark as a missionary to Liberia, and die a martyr's death.] To a student of the Wesleyan University he remarked, "If I die in Africa, you must come and write my epitaph." "What shall it be?" asked his young friend. "Write," he replied, "'Let a thousand fall before Africa be given up.'" [In less than five months after his arrival, in 1833, he slept in an African grave.]—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH.

3644. MISSIONS, Zeal for. Dr. Thomas Coke. [A friend remonstrated with Dr. Thomas Coke when he proposed to go to India at his own expense and there establish Wesleyan missions, he being nearly seventy years old.] He replied: "I am now dead to Europe and alive for India. God Himself has said to me, Go to Ceylon! I would rather be set naked on its coast, and without a friend, than not to go. I am learning the Portuguese language continually."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 3, p. 330.

3645. MISTAKE, Encouraging. Columbus. The great mistake with Columbus and others who shared his opinions was not concerning the figure of the earth, but in regard to its size. He believed the world to be no more than ten thousand or twelve thousand miles in circumference. He therefore confidently expected that after sailing about three thousand miles to the westward he should arrive at the East Indies; and to do that was the one great purpose of his life.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 3, p. 55.

3646. MOB, Terrifying. Draft. On the 3d of March the Conscription Act was passed by Congress, and two months afterward the President ordered a general draft of 300,000 men. All able-bodied citizens between the ages of twenty and forty-five years were subject to the requisition. The measure was bitterly denounced by the opponents of the war, and in many places the draft-officers were forcibly resisted. On the 13th of July, in the city of New York, a vast mob rose in arms, demolished the buildings which were occupied by the provost marshals, burned the colored orphan asylum, attacked the police, and killed about a hundred people, most of whom were negroes. For three days the authorities of the city were set at defiance. On the second day of the reign of terror Governor [Horatio] Seymour arrived and addressed the mob in a mild-mannered way, promising that the draft should be suspended, and advising the rioters to disperse; but they gave little heed to his mellow admonition, and went on with the work of destruction. General Wool, commander of the military district of New York, then took the matter in hand; but the troops at his disposal were at first unable to overawe the insurgents. Some volunteer regiments, however, came trooping home from Gettysburg; the Metropolitan Police companies were compactly organized, and the combined forces soon crushed the insurrection with a strong hand. . . . On the 19th of August President Lincoln issued a proclamation suspending the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus throughout the Union.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 65, p. 522.

3647. MODESTY, Conspicuous. Benjamin Franklin. [When very young, he had remarkable success in his business enterprise and in gaining influential friends. See Success, Deserved.] The intelligent and highly cultivated Logan bore testimony to his merits before they had burst upon the world: "Our most ingenious printer has the clearest understanding, with extreme modesty. He is certainly an extraordinary man, of a singular good judgment, but of equal modesty."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 23.

3648. MODESTY of Genius. Isaac Newton. So little did he value the glory of his discoveries, that he was with difficulty induced to make them known to the world, having a mortal dread of being drawn into controversy. Some of his most brilliant discoveries remained unpublished for several years. And when, at last, his Principia had appeared, which contained the results of his studies, he had to be much persuaded before he would consent to issue a second edition.—PAR-TON'S NEWTON, p. 85.

3649. MODESTY, A Hero's. Garibaldi. When the successful villainy of Louis Napoleon had ruined the cause of Italian independence, Garibaldi was one of the hundreds of brave men who sought an asylum in the United States. At midsummer, in 1850, he reached New York, where, of course, he was at once solicited to make an exhibition of himself, or, as we say, "accept an ovation." He modestly asked to be excused. Such an exhibition, he said, was not necessary, and could not help the cause; nor would the American people, he thought, esteem him the less because he veiled his sorrows in privacy. All he asked was to be allowed to earn his living by honest labor, and remain under the protection of the American flag until the time should come for renewing the attempt which treason had frustrated only for a time. From being a general in command of an army, Garibaldi became a Staten Island candle-maker, and soon resumed his old calling of mariner. — CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 496.

3650. MODESTY unopposed. John Howard. It has been the lot of many philanthropists to encounter obloquy and opposition in their efforts to benefit mankind. It was Howard's happier fortune to enjoy, at all times, the approval of his countrymen, and to receive needful aid from persons in authority. He was so devoid of all pretence, and went about his work in such a quiet, earnest manner, and gave such unquestionable proofs of the benevolence of his motives, that the enmity of men whose evil practices he exposed was disarmed, and all others observed his proceedings with admiration. His rank, too, as a gentleman of independent property, greatly facilitated his labors, and when he had publicly received the thanks of the House of Commons, he had a kind of official character, which opened to him the doors of every jail the moment he presented himself. He pursued his investigations in a very business-like manner, carrying with him a rule with which to measure the dungeons, a pair of scales for weighing the allowance of food, and a memorandum book in which to record his facts. — CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 46.

3651. MONEY — AFFECTION. Restoration. When the commissioners of Parliament conveyed to Charles [II.] information of the abolition of the Commonwealth, Lord Grenville preceded them with the best proof of loyalty and affection — £4500 in gold and a bill of exchange for £25,000. — KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 14, p. 236.

3652. MONEY, Changed Value of. Decreased. [The relative value of money in the fifteenth century was fifteen times greater than at the present day.] — KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 8, p. 121.

3653. MONEY, Corrupted by. James II. Barillon [the French minister] received them civilly. Rochester [prime-minister of James II.], grown bolder, proceeded to ask for money. "It will be well laid out," he said; "your master cannot employ his revenues better. Represent to him strongly how important it is that the King of England should be dependent, not on his own people, but on the friendship of France alone." . . . Barillon hastened to communicate to Louis [XIV.] the wishes of the English Government; but Louis had already anticipated them. His first act, after he was apprised of the death of Charles, was to collect bills of exchange on England to the amount of 500,000 livres, a sum equivalent to about £37,500 sterling. [See Excuses, Ignominious, No. 1978.] — MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 425.

3654. MONEY, Dangers of. Spartans. Xenophon acquaints us that when Lysander had taken Athens he sent to Sparta many rich spoils and 470 talents of silver. The coming of this huge mass of wealth created great disputes at Sparta. Many celebrated Lysander's praises, and rejoiced exceedingly at this good fortune, as they called it; others, who were better acquainted with the nature of things, and with their constitution, were of quite another opinion; they looked upon the receipt of this treasure as an open violation of the laws of Lycurgus; and they expressed their apprehensions loudly, that, in process of time, they might, by a change in their manners, pay infinitely more for this money than it was worth. The event justified their fears. — PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

3655. MONEY debased. With Iron. [Lycurgus, the Lacedæmonian lawgiver, wishing to produce an equality of wealth,] stopped the currency of the gold and silver coin, and ordered that they should make use of iron money only; then to a great quantity and weight of this he assigned but a small value, so that to lay up 10 minæ a whole room was required, and to remove it nothing less than a yoke of oxen. When this became current, many kinds of injustice ceased in Lacedæmon. Who would steal or take a bribe, who would defraud or rob, when he could not conceal the booty; when he could neither be dignified by the possession of it, nor, if cut in pieces, be served by its use? For we are told that when hot they quenched it in vinegar to make it brittle and unmanageable, and consequently unfit for any other service. In the next place, he excluded unprofitable and superfluous arts; indeed, if he had not done this, most of them would have fallen of themselves, when the new money took place, as the manufacturers could not be disposed of. Their iron coin would not pass in the rest of Greece, but was ridiculed and despised, so that the Spartans had no means of purchasing any foreign or curious wares; nor did any merchant-ship unlade in their harbors. There were not even to be found in all their country either sophists, wandering fortune-tellers, keepers of infamous houses, or dealers in gold and silver trinkets, because there was no money. Thus luxury, losing by degrees the means that cherished and supported it, died away of itself; even they who had great possessions had no advantage from them, since they could not be displayed in public, but must lie useless, in unregarded repositories. — PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

3656. MONEY declined. Pension. Halifax . . . offered a pension to [Alexander] Pope, saying that nothing should be demanded of him for it. The young poet had not earned an independence, and was in feeble health. "I wrote," he says, "to Lord Halifax to thank him for his most obliging offer, saying that I had considered the matter over fully, and that all the difference that I could find in having and not having a pension was, that if I had one I might live more at large in town, and that if I had not, I might live happily enough in the country. So the thing dropped, and I had my liberty without a coach." — KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 26, p. 416.

3657. MONEY depreciated. "Clipped." The milled money disappeared almost as fast as it was coined, and the hammered money was clipped and pared more and more, till it was often not worth half or even a third of the sum for which it passed. At Oxford, indeed, a hundred pounds' worth of the current silver money, which ought to have weighed four hundred ounces, was found to weigh only a hundred and sixteen. Every month the state of things was becoming worse and worse. The cost of commodities was constantly rising, and every payment of any amount involved endless altercations. In a bargain not only had the price of the article to be settled, but also the value of the money in which it was to be paid.—FOWLER'S LOCKE, ch. 6.

3658. — — —. "Clipped and pared." All commercial transactions had become disarranged; no one knew what he was really worth, or what any commodity might cost him a few months hence. Macaulay, who has given a most graphic description of the financial condition of the country at this time, hardly exaggerates when he says, "It may be doubted whether all the misery which had been inflicted on the English nation in a quarter of a century by bad kings, bad ministers, bad parliaments, and bad judges was equal to the misery caused in a single year by bad crowns and bad shillings."—FOWLER'S LOCKE, ch. 6.

3659. — — —. Continental. The financial credit of the nation was sinking to the lowest ebb. Congress, having no silver and gold with which to meet the accumulating expenses of the war, had resorted to paper money. At first the expedient was successful, and the continental bills were received at par; but as one issue followed another, the value of the notes rapidly diminished, until, by the middle of 1780, they were not worth two cents to the dollar. To aggravate the evil, the emissaries of Great Britain executed counterfeits of the congressional money, and sowed the spurious bills broadcast over the land. Business was paralyzed for the want of a currency, and the distress became extreme; but Robert Morris and a few other wealthy patriots came forward with their private fortunes and saved the suffering colonies from ruin. The mothers of America also lent a helping hand; and the patriot camp was gladdened with many a contribution of food and clothing which woman's sacrificing care had provided.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 42, p. 343.

3660. MONEY disregarded. Samuel Adams. He was . . . two and forty years of age; poor, and so contented with poverty that men censured him as "wanting wisdom to estimate riches at their just value." But he was frugal and temperate; and his prudent and industrious wife, endowed with the best qualities of a New England woman, knew how to work with her own hands, so that the small resources, which men of the least opulent class would have deemed a very imperfect support, were sufficient for his simple wants. Yet such was the union of dignity with economy, that whoever visited him saw around him every circumstance of propriety.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 10.

3661. MONEY, Earning. Abraham Lincoln. I was about eighteen years of age. I belonged, you know, to what they call down South the "scrubs"—people who do not own slaves are nobody there. [He constructed a little flat-boat to take produce to market. Two men engaged him to take themselves and their trunks out into the stream to the steamboat.] I sculled them out to the steamboat. They got on board, and I lifted up their heavy trunks, and put them on deck. . . . Each of them took from his pocket a silver half dollar, and threw it on the floor of my boat. [He expected only two or three bits.] I could scarcely believe my eyes when I saw the money. . . . I could scarcely credit that I, a poor boy, had earned a dollar in less than a day; . . . the world seemed wider and fairer before me. I was a more hopeful and confident being from that time.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 754.

3662. MONEY expensive. Charles I. He was reckless in his extravagance, he would listen to no advice, his embarrassments increased daily; he did not like parliaments, and without parliaments how could he obtain a parliamentary grant? So he ordered the sheriffs of all the counties to demand of all persons of substance, within their respective limits, a free gift proportionate to the necessities of the king; the sheriffs also were ordered to take strict cognizance of all persons who refused to contribute, and the names of such given in to the Privy Council were marked out for perpetual harrying and hostility by the court. He did not gain much by this obnoxious and arbitrary scheme—only about £50,000, it is said; but it lost him the confidence and the affection of the entire nation.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 39.

3663. MONEY, Love of. Jews. Immediately after the conquest of Granada he [Ferdinand of Spain] expelled all the Jews from the kingdom—a most impolitic step, which deprived Spain of about 150,000 inhabitants. The greatest part of these took refuge in Portugal, and carried with them their arts, their industry, and their commerce; the rest sailed over into Africa, where they were still more inhumanly used than in Spain. The Moors of that country are said to have ripped open their bellies in order to search for the gold which they were supposed to have concealed in their bowels.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14, p. 219.

3664. MONEY, Meanness and. Henry III. [King Henry III. made the royal office a trade.] History presents him in scarcely any other light than that of an extortioner or a beggar. . . . The records of the exchequer abundantly show that for forty years "there were no contrivances for obtaining money so mean or unjust that he disdained to practise them." . . . The pope had more than an equal share of the spoil.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 24, p. 361.

3665. MONEY, Paper. Manufactured. [John Law, a Scotch adventurer who had made a fortune at the gaming-table, proposed to retrieve the immense public debt of France by the following system:] Indefinite issue of paper money, which was to be substituted for the precious metals as the circulating medium. Gold and silver, he argued, have no real, but only a conventional value; the supply of them is limited, and cannot be increased at pleasure. If, then, their value can be transferred to paper, which can easily be issued to any desired amount, it is evident that national wealth may be augmented to an almost inconceivable extent. A bank was opened in 1716, but at first only as a private enterprise. Its success was rapid and complete; and in December, 1718, the regent converted it into a royal bank, the State becoming the proprietor of the whole of its twelve hundred shares. — STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 22, § 4.

3666. MONEY, Paper. Assignats. To meet the urgency of the moment, the corporation of Paris contracted to take a certain portion of the [estates of the church, all of which had been confiscated, and] which was to be resold in course of time to private individuals; other municipalities followed this example; and as they were unable to pay in specie, they were allowed to issue bonds or promissory notes, secured upon the property, which the creditors of the State were to accept instead of money. It was thus that the famous system of assignats took its rise. These assignats were afterward issued upon the credit of the government, and, a forced currency being given to them, they were made to answer all the purposes of coin. But as the value of the assignats depended solely upon public credit, the subsequent rapid march of the Revolution reduced them at length to a state of utter depreciation. They were reissued from time to time in immense quantities, but became altogether worthless in the end, the amount in circulation far exceeding the whole value of the property which they professedly represented. — STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 26, § 4.

3667. — — — Bankruptcy. The assignats, which were still a legal tender, realized no more than the two hundredth part of their nominal value. At length, after the issue of paper money had reached the almost incredible amount of forty-five thousand millions (eighteen hundred millions sterling), it was found utterly impossible to maintain it in circulation; the assignats were refused by all classes, from the highest to the lowest, throughout France. The government now determined to withdraw them, and substituted for them a new kind of paper currency, called mandats territoriaux; these mandats were charged upon the landed estates belonging to the nation, and entitled the holder to a certain specified amount of that property, according to the valuation made in the year 1790. The assignats were suppressed, and the plate used for engraving them broken up, in March, 1796. The issue of the mandats was an improvement, since they represented a substantial value in land, for which they were exchangeable at any moment; but after a time they also fell into discredit, and could only be negotiated at an enormous discount. The measure led eventually to a bankruptcy of no less than thirty-three milliards of francs. — STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 27, § 12.

3668. — — — American Colonies. The first effect of the unreal enlargement of the currency appeared beneficial, and men rejoiced in the seeming impulse given to trade. It was presently found that specie was repelled from the country by the system; . . . far from remedying the scarcity of money, it excited a thirst for new issues. . . . Commerce was corrupted in its sources by the uncertainty attending the expressions of value in every contract. — BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 23.

3669. — — — Legal Tender. The fortunes of the war had been wholly on the side of the French and their allies. But New England was now thoroughly aroused. In order to provide the ways and means of war, a colonial congress was convened at New York. Here it was resolved to attempt the conquest of Canada by marching an army by way of Lake Champlain against Montreal. At the same time Massachusetts was to co-operate with the land forces by sending a fleet, by way of the St. Lawrence, for the reduction of Quebec. . . . Vexatious delays retarded the expedition until the middle of October. Meanwhile an Abnaki Indian had carried the news of the coming armament to Frontenac, Governor of Canada; and when the fleet came in sight of the town, the castle of St. Louis was so well garrisoned and provisioned as to bid defiance to the English forces. The opportunity was lost, and it only remained for Phipps to sail back to Boston. To meet the expenses of this unfortunate expedition, Massachusetts was obliged to issue bills of credit, which were made a legal tender in the payment of debt. Such was the origin of paper money in America. — RIDGPATH'S U. S., ch. 16, p. 149.

3670. MONEY, Power of. Political. [Essex having offended Queen Elizabeth, she refused to renew his patents for the valuable monopoly of sweet wines when they expired, saying,] In order to manage an ungovernable beast, he must be stinted of his provender. — KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 18, p. 285.

3671. — — — Samuel Johnson. In civilized society personal merit will not serve you so much as money will. Sir, you may make the experiment. Go into the street, and give one man a lecture on morality, and another a shilling, and see which will respect you most. If you wish only to support nature, Sir William Petty fixes your allowance at £3 a year; but as times are much altered, let us call it £6. This sum will fill your belly, shelter you from the weather, and even get you a strong lasting coat, supposing it to be made of good bull's hide. Now, sir, all beyond this is artificial, and is desired in order to obtain a greater degree of respect from our fellow-creatures. And, sir, if £600 a year procure a man more consequence, and, of course, more happiness, than £6 a year, the same proportion will hold as to £6000, and so on, as far as opulence can be carried. Perhaps he who has a large fortune may not be so happy as he who has a small one; but that must proceed from other causes than from his having the large fortune; for, ceteris paribus, he who is rich in a civilized society must be happier than he who is poor; as riches, if properly used (and it is a man's own fault if they are not), must be productive of the highest advantages. Money, to be sure, of itself is of no use, for its only use is to part with it. — BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 121.

3672. — — — Didius Julianus. [He had purchased the throne of the Roman Empire at auction.] He had reason to tremble. On the throne of the world he found himself without a friend, and even without an adherent. The guards themselves were ashamed of the prince whom their avarice had persuaded them to accept; nor was there a citizen who did not consider his elevation with horror, as the last insult on the Roman name. The nobility, whose conspicuous station and ample possessions exacted the strictest caution, dissembled their sentiments, and met the affected civility of the emperor with smiles of complacency and professions of duty. But the people, secure in their numbers and obscurity, gave a free vent to their passions. The streets and public places of Rome resounded with clamors and imprecations. The enraged multitude affronted the person of Julian, rejected his liberality, and, conscious of the impotence of their own resentment, they called aloud on the legions of the frontiers to assert the violated majesty of the Roman Empire.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 5, p. 129.

3673. MONEY, Pressure for. Regent Duc d'Orleans. There had been a very large annual deficit for fifteen successive years, which had been made up by selling offices and borrowing money. When the regent took the reins of power, he found, 1st, an almost incalculable debt; 2d, 800,000,000 francs then due; 3d, an empty treasury. Almost every one in Paris, from princes to lackeys, who had any property at all, held the royal paper, then worth one fourth its apparent value. What was to be done? They tried the wildest expedients. The coin was adulterated; new bonds, similar to those we call "preferred," were issued; men, enriched by speculating upon the necessities of the government, were squeezed until they gave up their millions. If a man was very rich, and not a nobleman, it was enough; the Bastille, the pillory, and confiscation extracted from him the wherewith to supply the regent's drunken orgies, the extravagance of his mistresses, and the pay of his troops. Servants accused their masters of possessing a secret hoard, and were rewarded for their perfidy with one half of it. Rich men, trying to escape from the kingdom with their property, were hunted down and brought back to prison and to ruin. Once they seized fourteen kegs of gold coin, hidden in fourteen pipes of wine, just as the wagons were crossing the line into Holland. One great capitalist escaped from the kingdom disguised as a hay-peddler, with his money hidden in his hay. The whole number of persons arrested on the charge of having more money than they wanted was 6000; the number condemned and fined was 4410, and the amount of money wrung from them was 400,000,000 francs.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 453.

3674. MONEY vs. Merit. Moez. Many fictitious descendants of Mahomet arose after his death. One of the Fatimite caliphs silenced an indiscreet question by drawing his cimeter; "This," said Moez, "is my pedigree; and these," casting a handful of gold to his soldiers—"and these are my kindred and my children."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 5, p. 166.

3675. MONEY vs. Religion. Dutch. A fleet was necessary for the reduction of Rochelle, where the Calvinists, who then suffered great persecution, were attempting to imitate the example of the Hollanders, and throw off their subjection to the crown of France. The cardinal found it impossible to fit out an armament with that celerity which was necessary, and he concluded a bargain with the Dutch to furnish a fleet for subduing their Protestant brethren. An opportunity thus offered of making money, the Dutch had no scruples on the score of conscience; and they fought for the Catholic religion as keenly as they had done half a century before for the Protestant.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 35, p. 443.

3676. MONEY, Rule of. Reign of William and Mary. The floating credits of commerce, aided by commercial accumulations, soon grew powerful enough to balance the landed interest: stock aristocracy competed with feudalism. So imposing was the spectacle of the introduction of the citizens and of commerce as the arbiter of alliances, the umpire of factions, the judge of war and peace, that it roused the attention of speculative men. . . . The gentle Addison . . . declared nothing to be more reasonable than that "those who have engrossed the riches of the nation should have the management of its public treasure, and the direction of its fleets and armies."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 19.

3677. MONEY, Serviceable. Incitement. The value of money has been settled by general consent to express our wants and our property, as letters were invented to express our ideas; and both these institutions, by giving a more active energy to the powers and passions of human nature, have contributed to multiply the objects they were designed to represent. The use of gold and silver is in a great measure factitious; but it would be impossible to enumerate the important and various services which agriculture and all the arts have received from iron, when tempered and fashioned by the operation of fire and the dexterous hand of man. Money, in a word, is the most universal incitement, iron the most powerful instrument, of human industry; and it is very difficult to conceive by what means a people, neither actuated by the one nor seconded by the other, could emerge from the grossest barbarism.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 260.

3678. MONEY, Throne for. Roman. After the atrocious murder of Pertinax, the Prætorian guards treated with Sulpicianus, the emperor's father-in-law, for the bestowment of the throne. . . . He had already begun to use the only effectual argument, and to treat for the imperial dignity; but the more prudent of the Prætorians, apprehensive that, in this private contract, they should not obtain a just price for so valuable a commodity, ran out upon the ramparts, and, with a loud voice, proclaimed that the Roman world was to be disposed of to the best bidder by public auction. This infamous offer, the most insolent excess of military license, diffused a universal grief, shame, and indignation throughout the city. It reached at length the ears of Didius Julianus, a wealthy senator, who, regardless of the public calamities, was indulging himself in the luxury of the table. His wife and his daughter, his freedmen and his parasites, easily convinced him that he deserved the throne, and earnestly conjured him to embrace so fortunate an opportunity. The vain old man hastened to the Prætorian camp, where Sulpicianus was still in treaty with the guards, and began to bid against him from the foot of the rampart. The unworthy negotiation was transacted by faithful emissaries, who passed alternately from one candidate to the other, and acquainted each of them with the offers of his rival. Sulpicianus had already promised a donative of 5000 drachms (above £160) to each soldier; when Julian, eager for the prize, rose at once to the sum of 6250 drachms, or upward of £200 sterling. The gates of the camp were instantly thrown open to the purchaser; he was declared emperor, and received an oath of allegiance from the soldiers, who retained humanity enough to stipulate that he should pardon and forget the competition of Sulpicianus. . . . Julian was conducted into a private apartment of the baths of the palace, and beheaded as a common criminal, after having purchased, with an immense treasure, an anxious and precarious reign of only sixty-six days.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 5, p. 127.

3679. MONEY, Use of. Samuel Johnson. A friend of ours was living at too much expense, considering how poor an appearance he made. "If," said he, "a man has splendor from his expense, if he spends his money in pride or in pleasure, he has value; but if he lets others spend it for him, which is most commonly the case, he has no advantage from it."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 359.

3680. ———. Maxim. It was a maxim with Alexander and Philip to procure empire with money, and not money by empire, and who, by pursuing that maxim, conquered the world. For it was a common saying that it was not Philip, but Philip's gold, that took the cities of Greece. As for Alexander, when he went upon the Indian expedition, and saw the Macedonians dragging after them a heavy and unwieldy load of Persian wealth, he first set fire to the royal carriages, and then persuaded the rest to do the same to theirs, that they might move forward to the war light and unencumbered.—PLUTARCH'S PAULUS ÆMILIUS.

3681. MONEY wanted. Richard I. [Richard I., the Crusader,] exhibited his royal spirit in one universal swoop of extortion and corruption, to raise money for his great adventure in the East. . . . He put up the crown demesnes for sale. He sold the public offices. He sold earldoms. He sold the claim which Henry had asserted to the right of homage for the crown of Scotland. . . . "I would sell London, if I could find a chapman," he exclaimed. . . . When this wholesale dealer returned after an absence of four years, he forcibly resumed the lands which he had sold, and turned out the officers who had purchased their places.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 21, p. 307.

3683. MONKERY, Early Progress of. Popular. [The popular monks,] whose reputation was connected with the fame and success of the order, assiduously labored to multiply the number of their fellow-captives. They insinuated themselves into noble and opulent families; and the specious arts of flattery and seduction were employed to secure those proselytes who might bestow wealth or dignity on the monastic profession. The indignant father bewailed the loss, perhaps, of an only son; the credulous maid was betrayed by vanity to violate the laws of nature; and the matron aspired to imaginary perfection, by renouncing the virtues of domestic life. Paula yielded to the persuasive eloquence of Jerom; and the profane title of mother-in-law of God tempted that illustrious widow to consecrate the virginity of her daughter Eustochium. By the advice, and in the company of her spiritual guide, Paula abandoned Rome and her infant son; retired to the holy village of Bethlehem; founded a hospital and four monasteries; and acquired, by her alms and penance, an eminent and conspicuous station in the Catholic Church. Such rare and illustrious penitents were celebrated as the glory and example of their age; but the monasteries were filled by a crowd of obscure and abject plebeians, who gained in the cloister much more than they had sacrificed in the world.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 37, p. 527.

3684. MONKERY, Origin of. Body subjugated.

It was a doctrine, both of the Stoic and Platonic philosophy, that in order to raise the soul to its highest enjoyment, and to a communion with superior intelligences, it was necessary to separate it from the body by mortifying and entirely disregarding that earthly vehicle, which checked its flight and chained it to the mean and sordid enjoyments of the senses. These prevailing notions of the heathen philosophy, joined to a mistaken interpretation put upon some of the precepts of the gospel, contributed to inspire some enthusiastic Christians with the same ideas. The first of these who thought of separating themselves from society were a few who, after Constantine had restored peace to the church, being now free from persecution, began to conceive that since they were no longer exposed to the persecutions of temporal power, they ought to procure for themselves voluntary grievances and afflictions. In that view they betook themselves to wilds and solitudes, where they spent their time in caves and hermitages in alternate exercises of devotion and in rigorous acts of penance and mortification. Some of them loaded their limbs with heavy irons; others walked naked till their bodies acquired a covering of hair like the wild beasts; and others chose still more nearly to ally themselves to the brute creation, by actually grazing with them in the fields.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 3, p. 82.

3685. MONKERY, Success of. Early in Fourth Century. The reputation which these persons acquired for superior sanctity, and the extraordinary blessings which were believed to attend their pious vows and prayers, naturally procured them many remuneratory donations from those who believed they had profited by their intercessions. Some of the holy men began to lead a very comfortable life; and still pretending to bestow all their superfluities in arms and charitable donations, they retained as much as to enable them to pass their time with much ease and satisfaction. Toward the end of the fourth century these monks or hermits had multiplied in such a manner that there was not a province in the East that was not full of them. They spread themselves likewise over a great part of Africa, and in the west they penetrated within the bishopric of Rome, and soon became very numerous over all Italy.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 3, p. 83.

3686. MONKS, Artistic. English. [Dunstan required that the monks should] dedicate the hours spared from the service of religion to the pursuits of learning and the arts. . . . They would be the artists of their time—the architects and the painters. [A.D. 958–975].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 10, p. 142.

3687. MONKS, Wealthy. Italy. St. Benedict, who introduced monachism into Italy, was the founder of that particular order called Benedictine, which has distinguished itself in most of the countries of Europe by the ambition of many of the brotherhood, as well as by the enormous wealth which they found means to accumulate; and, we ought to add, by the laborious learning which some of them displayed. Benedict was an Italian by birth; he had studied at Rome, and soon distinguished himself by his talents as well as superior sanctity. An affectation of singularity, probably, made him retire, when a very young man, to a cave at Subiaco, where he remained for some years. Some neighboring hermits chose him for their head, or superior; and the donations which they received from the devout and charitable very soon enabled them to build a large monastery. The reputation of Benedict increased daily, and he began to perform miracles, which attracted the notice of Totila, the Gothic king of Italy. The number of his fraternity was daily augmented, and it became customary for the rich to make large donations. . . . Benedict, finding his fraternity grow extremely numerous, sent colonies into Sicily and into France, where they thrive amazingly. Hence they transported themselves into England; and, in a very little time, there was not a kingdom of Europe where the Benedictines had not obtained a footing.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 3, p. 84.

3688. MONOMANIA, Rashness of. John Brown. On the quiet morning of October, 1859, with no warning whatever to the inhabitants, the United States arsenal at Harper's Ferry was found to be in the possession of an invading mob. . . . By the opening of the second day a force of 1500 men surrounded the arsenal, and when the insurgents surrendered, it was found that there had been but 22 in all. Four were still alive, including their leader, John Brown. . . . He conceived the utterly impracticable scheme of liberating the slaves of the South by calling on them to rise, putting arms in their hands. . . . Governor Wise stated that during the fight, while Brown held the arsenal, with one of his sons lying dead beside him, another gasping with a mortal wound, he felt the pulse of the dying boy, used his own musket, and coolly commanded his men, all amid a shower of bullets. . . . While of sound mind on most subjects, Brown had evidently lost his mental balance on the one topic of slavery.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, vol. 1, p. 155.

3689. MONOPOLIES encouraged. Reign of Charles I. [About 1630 Charles I. granted a patent to a company of soap-makers, who should be the sole manufacturers in England. They were to pay him £10,000 and £8 per ton upon all soap produced. The government obtained £200,000 by this and similar devices. Great opposition was aroused. The women petitioned against it. There was scarcely an industrial occupation, from the sale of coals to the collection of rags, that was not made the subject of a monopoly.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 26, p. 416.

3690. MONOPOLIES, Unpatriotic. Oliver Cromwell. [In 1650, while Cromwell was prosecuting his campaign against Charles II. in Scotland, he wrote the Speaker of the Parliament, urging the reformation of many abuses, adding,] If there be any one that makes many poor to make a few rich, that suits not a Commonwealth.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 9, p. 135.

3691. MONOPOLY abolished. Land. The ambition of the principal plebeians was now satisfied [by electing one of their number to the office of Prætor], and the patricians had in return some small gratification by these new offices. It remained now only that the populace should likewise be gratified, and this was done by the Licinian law, which enacted that no Roman citizen should possess above five hundred acres of land, and that the surplus should be distributed at a settled and low rate of price among the poorest of the people.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 6, p. 350.

3692. MONOPOLY, Commercial. Charles II. The Virginians soon found that they had exchanged a republican tyrant, with good principles, for a monarchical tyrant, with bad ones. King Charles II. was the worst monarch of modern times, and the people of Virginia had in him and his government a special cause of grief. The commercial system of the Commonwealth, so far from being abolished, was re-enacted in a more hateful form than ever. The new statute provided that all the colonial commerce, whether exports or imports, should be carried on in English ships. The trade between the colonies was burdened with a heavy tax for the benefit of the government, and tobacco, the staple of Virginia, could be sold nowhere but in England. This odious measure gave to English merchantmen a monopoly of the carrying trade of the colonies, and by destroying competition among the buyers of tobacco robbed the Virginians to that extent of their leading product. Remonstrance was tried in vain. The cold and selfish monarch only sneered at the complaints of his American subjects, and the commercial ordinances were vigorously enforced.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 12, p. 118.

3693. ———. Navigation Act of 1660. "No merchandise shall be imported into the plantation but in English vessels, navigated by Englishmen, under penalty of forfeiture." . . . None but native or naturalized subjects should become a merchant or factor in any English settlement—excluding the colonists from the benefits of foreign competition. [Later] a new law prohibited the importation of European commodities into the colonies, except in English ships from England, to the end that England might be made the staple, not only of colonial productions, but of colonial supplies. . . . The Navigation Act contained a pledge of the ultimate independence of America.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 11.

3694. MONOPOLY, Conscience vs. Peter Cooper. Happening to control a small interest in the great Cooper Iron Works at Trenton many years ago, [to Mr. Lester,] he said, "I do not feel quite easy about the amount we are making in the production of one thing in our works at Trenton. Working under one of our patents, we have a monopoly which seems to me something wrong, that we alone are manufacturing, etc. Everybody has to come to us for it, and we are making money too fast; it is not right." "Well," I replied, "you can get over that trouble very easily by reducing the price, even if you are not obliged to." "That is it," said he; "and it shall be done. The world needs this thing, and we are making them pay too high for it; if it were a mere matter of fancy, or luxury, or taste, I should feel differently about it; but as it is a very necessary article, I must do something about it."—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 18.

3695. MONOPOLY, Exasperating. Reign of Charles I. Every item almost was taxed. Hackney coaches were prohibited because sedan chairs appeared for the first time, Sir Sanders Duncombe having purchased from the king the right to carry people up and down in them.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 4, p. 84.

3696. MONOPOLY and Famine. Cleander. [During the reign of the Emperor Commodus] pestilence and famine contributed to fill up the measure of the calamities of Rome. The first could be only imputed to the just indignation of the gods; but a monopoly of corn, supported by the riches and power of the minister, was considered as the immediate cause of the second. [Cleander was the emperor's favorite].—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4, p. 109.

3697. MONOPOLY in Land. To the Plymouth Council. King James issued to forty of his subjects, . . . the most wealthy and powerful of the English nobility, a patent which, . . . in the history of the world, has but one parallel. . . . The territory, . . . from the Atlantic to the Pacific, . . . extended in breadth from the fortieth to the forty-eighth degree of north latitude; . . . that is to say, nearly all the inhabited British possessions to the north of the United States, all New England, New York, half of New Jersey, very nearly all of Pennsylvania, and the whole country to the west of these States, comprising, and at the time believed to comprise, more than a million of square miles. . . . The grant was absolute and exclusive.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 8.

3698. MONOPOLY of Manufactures. Act of Parliament. "After the first day of December, 1699, no wool or manufacture made or mixed with wool, being the produce or manufacture of any of the English plantations in America, shall be loaden upon any horse, cart, or other carriage, to be carried out of the English plantations to any other of the said plantations, or to any other place whatsoever." The policy was continued by every administration. "Should our . . . commercial control be denied," said the elder Pitt, seventy years afterward, "I would not suffer even a nail or a horseshoe to be manufactured in America."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 19.

3699. ——. Act of 1672. Parliament . . . resolved to exclude New England merchants from competing with the English in the markets of the Southern plantations. . . . America was [later] forbidden not merely to manufacture those articles which might compete with the English in foreign markets, but even to supply herself with those articles which her position enabled her to manufacture with success for her own wants.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 11.

3700. ——. New Amsterdam. A.D. 1629. The colonists were forbidden to manufacture any woollen or linen or cotton fabrics; not a web might be woven or a shuttle thrown, on penalty of exile. To impair the monopoly of the Dutch weavers was punishable as perjury.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

3701. MONOPOLY, Powers of. Senator Windom. [Garfield's Secretary of the Treasury,] in a letter to the Anti-monopoly League, at their public meeting at the Cooper Institute, on the 21st day of February, 1881: "I repeat to-day, in substance, words uttered seven years ago, that 'there are in this country four men who, in the matter of taxation, possess and frequently exercise powers which neither Congress nor any of our State Legislatures would dare to exert—powers which, if exercised in Great Britain, would shake the throne to its very foundation. These may at any time, and for any reason satisfactory to themselves, by a stroke of the pen, reduce the value of property in the United States by hundreds of millions. They may, at their own will and pleasure, disarrange and embarrass business, depress one city or locality and build another, enrich one individual and ruin his competitors, and, when complaint is made, coolly reply, "What are you going to do?"'"—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 54.

3702. MONOPOLY resisted. Governmental. The encroachment was, as usual, patiently borne, till it became serious. But at length the queen took upon herself to grant patents of monopoly by scores. There was scarcely a family in the realm which did not feel itself aggrieved by the oppression and extortion which this abuse naturally caused. Iron, oil, vinegar, coal, saltpetre, lead, starch, yarn, skins, leather, glass, could be bought only at exorbitant prices. The House of Commons met in an angry and determined mood. It was in vain that a courtly minority blamed the speaker for suffering the acts of the queen's Highness to be called in question. The language of the discontented party was high and menacing, and was echoed by the voice of the whole nation. . . . She, [Queen Elizabeth,] however, with admirable judgment and temper, declined the contest, put herself at the head of the reforming party, redressed the grievance.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 59.

3703. MOODS, Reaction of. William Cowper. It was, perhaps, while he was winding thread that Lady Austen told him the story of John Gilpin. He lay awake at night laughing over it, and next morning produced the ballad. It soon became famous, and was recited by Henderson, a popular actor, on the stage, though, as its gentility was doubtful, its author withheld his name.

He afterward fancied that this wonderful piece of humor had been written in a mood of the deepest depression. Probably he had written it in an interval of high spirits between two such moods.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 5.

3704. MORALITY, Conventional. Shelley's Father. Mr. Timothy Shelley was in no sense of the word a bad man; but he was everything which the poet's father ought not to have been. . . . His religious opinions might be summed up in Clough's epigram:

"At church on Sunday to attend
Will serve to keep the world your friend."

His morality in like manner was purely conventional, as may be gathered from his telling his eldest son that he would never pardon a mésalliance, but would provide for as many illegitimate children as he choose to have.—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 1.

3705. MORALITY denied. Roman Catholic. There was among the English a strong conviction that the Roman Catholic, where the interests of his religion were concerned, thought himself free from all the ordinary rules of morality—nay, that he thought it meritorious to violate those rules, if, by so doing, he could avert injury or scandal from the church of which he was a member. Nor was this opinion destitute of a show of reason. It was impossible to deny that Roman Catholic casuists of great eminence had written in defence of equivocation, of mental reservation, of perjury, and even of assassination. Nor, it was said, had the speculations of this odious school of sophists been barren of results. The massacre of Saint Bartholomew, the murder of the first William of Orange, the murder of Henry III. of France, the numerous conspiracies which had been formed against the life of Elizabeth, and, above all, the gunpowder treason, were constantly cited as instances of the close connection between vicious theory and vicious practice. It was alleged that every one of these crimes had been prompted or applauded by Roman Catholic divines.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 6.

3706. MORALITY, Philosophic. Socrates. Socrates founded all his morality on the belief of a God who delighted in virtue, and whose justice would reward the good and punish the wicked in an after state. Of consequence, he believed in the immortality of the soul. He held that there were intermediate beings between God and man, who presided over the different parts of the creation, and who were to be honored with an inferior worship. He believed that virtuous men were particularly favored by the Divinity, who more especially manifested his care of them by the constant presence and aid of a good genius, who directed all their actions and guarded them by secret monitions from impending evils; but on this subject, as he declined to express himself with precision, it has been reasonably conjectured that he alluded merely to the influence of conscience, which extends its power to the virtuous alone, and deserts the vicious, abandoning them to the just consequences of their crimes.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 267.

3707. MORALITY vs. Refinement. Rome. [Era of the destruction of Corinth and Carthage.] This was the era of the commencement of a taste for the fine arts at Rome, to which the knowledge of Asiatic luxuries had successfully paved the way. "How happy for mankind," says Abbé Millot, "could a nation be distinguished at once for its virtue and its refinement, and become polished and enlightened while it retained a purity of morals!" But this is a beautiful impossibility.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9, p. 384.

3708. MORALITY, Shallow. Clerical. [Rev. William Grimshaw, before his conversion, was curate of Haworth, in Yorkshire.] He had studied at Cambridge, and went from the university to his clerical duties, corrupt in his morals and unsound in his opinions. Content with the perfunctory performance of his parish duties, he considered himself a fair example of the clerical manners of the times; especially as it is said that he refrained, as much as possible, from gross swearing, unless in "suitable company," and when he got drunk would take care to sleep it off before he went home.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 258.

3709. MORALITY preserves the State. Romans. That the extinction of the liberties of the Roman people and the downfall of the commonwealth were owing to the corruption of the Roman manners, there cannot be the smallest doubt; nor is it difficult to point out in a few words the causes of that corruption. The extent of the Roman dominions toward the end of the republic proved fatal to its virtues. While confined within the bounds of Italy, every Roman soldier, accustomed to a life of hardship, of frugality, and of industry, placed his chief happiness in contributing in war to the preservation of his country, and in peace to the maintenance of his family by honest labor. A State of this kind, which knows no intervals of ease or of indolence, is a certain preservative of good morals, and a sure antidote against every species of corruption. But the conquest of Italy paved the way for the reduction of foreign nations; for an immense acquisition of territory—a flood of wealth—and an acquaintance with the manners, the luxuries, and the vices of the nations whom they subdued.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 6, p. 468.

3710. — — —. Romans. If the morals of the people be entire, the spirit of patriotism pervading the ranks of the State will excite to such exertions as may soon recover the national honor. Of this truth the Roman State afforded at one time a most striking example. When Hannibal was carrying everything before him in Italy, when the Roman name was sunk so low that the allies of the republic were daily dropping off, and the Italian States seemed to stand aloof and leave her to her fate, there was in the manners of the people, and in that patriotic ardor which can only exist in an uncorrupted age, a spirit of reconvalescence, which speedily operated a most wonderful change of fortune.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 6, p. 465.

3711. MORALS by Chastisement. Edmund Rich. Edmund, hand in hand with a brother Robert of his, begged his way as poor scholars were wont to the great school of Western Christendom. Here a damsel, heedless of his tonsure, wooed him so pertinaciously that Edmund consented at last to an assignation; but when he appeared it was in company of grave academical officials who, as the maiden declared in the hour of penitence which followed, "straightway whipped the offending Eve out of her."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 164.

3712. MORALS degraded. Aristocracy. For years had it been whispered that the House of Austria should unite itself firmly with the House of Bourbon, and now the Empress Maria Theresa, herself a hereditary queen, a wife and mother, religious even to bigotry, by an autograph letter caressed endearingly the Marchioness de Pompadour, once the French king's [Louis XV.] mistress, now the procuress of his pleasures, to win her influence for the alliance.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 12.

3713. MORALS examined. Athenian Officials. The Areopagus, by an inquiry termed dokimasia, inquired into the life and morals of all who held offices in the State, and such as could not stand the scrutiny were not only incapacitated for employ, but declared infamous. Such was the award likewise against a son who should refuse to support his indigent parents.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 10.

3714. MORALS, Exceptional. New England Colonies. One might dwell there "from year to year and not see a drunkard, or hear an oath, or meet a beggar." The consequence was universal health—one of the chief elements of public happiness. The average duration of human life, as compared with Europe, was doubled. . . . They are the parents of one third of the whole white population of the United States. . . . Each family has multiplied on the average to one thousand souls.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

3715. MORALS, Grounds of. Diverse. The philosophers of Greece deduced their morals from the nature of man, rather than from that of God. They meditated, however, on the Divine nature, as a very curious and important speculation; and in the profound inquiry they displayed the strength and weakness of the human understanding.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 35.

3716. MORALS, Importance of. Politics. No nation has afforded a more striking example than the Romans have done of the necessity of good morals to the preservation of political liberty and the happiness of the people. This is a doctrine of so much importance, that it cannot be too seriously considered nor attended to. Unlike, in this respect, to many other political truths which are interesting only to statesmen, and those who conduct the machine of government, this truth is of importance to be known and considered by every single individual of the community; because the error or fault is in the conduct of individuals, and can only be amended by a conviction brought home to the mind of every private man, that the reformation must be begun by his own virtuous and patriotic endeavors. . . . Virtue is necessary, and indispensably necessary, to the existence of every government, whatever be its form; and no human institution where men are assembled together to act in concert, however limited be their numbers, or however extensive, however wise may be their governors, however excellent their laws, can possess any measure of duration without that powerful cement, virtue in the principles and morals of the people. Quid leges sine moribus vane proficiunt, is a sentiment equally applicable to all governments whatever.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 6, p. 464.

3717. MORALS, Rule in. Thales taught, "Neither the crimes of bad men, nor even their thoughts, are concealed from the gods. Health of body, a moderate fortune, and a cultivated mind are the chief ingredients of happiness. Parents may expect from their children that obedience which they themselves paid to their parents. Stop the mouth of slander by prudence. Take care not to commit the same fault yourself which you censure in others."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 261.

3718. MORTALITY remembered. Agincourt. [At the battle of Agincourt, the English being but one to ten against the French, before the action began] they knelt down, invoking the protection of God; and each man put a small piece of earth into his mouth, in remembrance that they were formed of dust and to dust should return. [They gained a complete victory, with small loss to themselves, but with a terrible destruction of the French.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 11, ch. 4.

3719. MORTIFICATION by Failure. Reign of James II. [Lord Castlemaine was English minister to Rome, where he was very ostentatious. See Macaulay in context.] In the midst of these festivities Castlemaine had to suffer cruel mortifications and humiliations. The pope treated him with extreme coldness and reserve. As often as the ambassador pressed for an answer to the request which he had been instructed to make in favor of Petre [that the rule prohibiting Jesuits from preferment might be relaxed], Innocent [XIII.] was taken with a violent fit of coughing, which put an end to the conversation. The fame of these singular audiences spread over Rome. Pasquin was not silent. All the curious and tattling population of the idlest of cities—the Jesuits and the prelates of the French faction only excepted—laughed at Castlemaine's discomfiture.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 248.

3720. MORTIFICATION, Hateful. James II. [Forty thousand pounds had been collected for the exiled Huguenots by Protestant Englishmen. The Roman Catholic king had called for the money under political pressure.] The king was bitterly mortified by the large amount of the collection which had been made in obedience to his own call. He knew, he said, what all this liberality meant. It was mere Whiggish spite to himself and his religion.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 73.

3721. MOTHER, An honored. Nero. The Senate accepted the initiative of the Prætorians, and by sunset Nero was securely seated on the throne of the Roman world. The dream of Agrippina's life was accomplished. She was now the mother, as she had been the sister and the wife, of an emperor; and that young emperor, when the tribune came to ask him the watchword for the night, answered in the words —Optimæ Matri! "To the Best of Mothers!"—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 2, p. 20.

3722. MOTHER, A humiliating. Byron's. The worst enemy he ever had was his mother.

She was an ignorant, foolish woman, disagreeable in her appearance, very fat and awkward, capricious, and of a violent temper. She indulged him most injuriously, often permitting him to absent himself from school for a week at a time, and when she was angry with him, her rage was such as to render her helpless, and the boy would run away from her and laugh at her. . . . Dr. Glennie, the master of his school, . . . denied him the privilege of going home on Saturday; whereupon Mrs. Byron, indignant at being deprived of the society of her son, would go to the school, and pour out such a storm of invective in the doctor's parlor that the boys in the school-room would hear her, to the great shame of the young lord. The schoolmaster once overheard a boy say to him: "Byron, your mother is a fool." "I know it," was his sad reply.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 291.

3723. MOTHER, Influence of a. Francis I. [When Francis I. of France] had reached his twenty-first year, he was still in complete subjection to his mother.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 14, § 1.

3724. MOTHER, A patriotic. Spartan. The Persians still continued to maintain a formidable armament upon the sea, and the operations of the Greeks were now exerted to clear the Ægean and Mediterranean of their hostile squadrons. The united fleet of Greece was commanded by Aristides and Pausanias; the latter a man of high birth and authority, uncle to one of the Spartan kings, and regent during his nephew's minority, but himself infamous for betraying his country. He had privately despatched letters to Xerxes, offering to facilitate to him the conquest of Greece, and demanding his daughter in marriage as a reward of this signal service. Fortunately his letters were intercepted. The traitor fled for protection to the temple of Minerva, a sanctuary from which it was judged impossible to force him. His mother showed an example of virtue truly Lacedæmonian. She walked to the gate of the temple, and laying down a stone before the threshold, silently retired; the signal was understood and venerated; the Ephori gave immediate orders for building a wall around the temple, and within its precincts the traitor was starved to death.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 1, p. 138.

3725. ———. Sam Houston's Mother. [He enlisted in the ranks, during the war with England, and his friends deemed him disgraced and ruined.] But his mother gave her consent as she stood in the door of her cottage, and handed her boy the musket: "There, my son, take this," she said, "and never disgrace it; for remember, I had rather all my sons should fill one honorable grave than that one of them should turn his back on an enemy. Go, and remember, too, that while the door of my cottage is open to all brave men, it is always shut against cowards." He was soon promoted to be a sergeant.—LESTER'S HOUSTON, p. 21.

3726. MOTHER, Power of a. Napoleon I. He was thus induced, in his day of power, to bring back a wayward nation of thirty millions from cheerless, brutalizing, comfortless unbelief, to the consoling, ennobling, purifying influences of Christianity. When, at the command of Napoleon, the church-bells began again to toll the hour of prayer on every hillside and through every valley of France; . . . when the young in their nuptials and the aged in their death were blessed by the solemnities of gospel ministrations, it was a mother's influence which inspired a dutiful son to make the magic change which thus, in an hour, transformed France from a pagan to nominally a Christian land. Honor to Letitia, the mother of Napoleon!—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 4.

3727. ———. Napoleon I. Napoleon ever regarded his mother with the most profound respect and affection. He repeatedly declared that the family were entirely indebted to her for that physical, intellectual, and moral training which prepared them to ascend the lofty summits of power to which they finally attained. . . . He often said, "My opinion is, that the future good or bad conduct of a child depends entirely upon its mother." One of his first acts on attaining power was to surround his mother with every luxury which wealth could furnish. . . . He established schools for female education, remarking that France needed nothing so much to promote its regeneration as good mothers.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 1.

3728. MOTHER, Pride of a. Cornelia. At this period arose Tiberius and Caius Gracchus, two brothers, of plebeian blood by their father's side, but ennobled by civic honors, and on their mother's side, by descent from the illustrious Scipio Africanus. Their mother, Cornelia, was wont to stimulate their ambition by this generous reproach: "Why, my sons, must I ever be called the daughter of Scipio, rather than the mother of the Gracchi?"—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1, p. 385.

3729. MOTHER revenged, A. Hannah Dustin. A.D. 1697. [She was captured at Haverhill, N.H., her home burned, and babe killed. See No. 117. She] and her nurse and a boy from Worcester find themselves on an island in the Merrimac, just above Concord, in a wigwam occupied by two Indian families. The mother planned escape. "Where would you strike," said the boy, Samuel Leonardson, to his master, "to kill instantly?" and the Indian told him where and how to scalp. At night, while the household slumbers, the captives, two women and a boy, each with a tomahawk, strike vigorously and fleetly, and with wise division of labor; and of the twelve sleepers ten lie dead; of one squaw the wound was not mortal; one child was spared from design. The love of glory next asserted its power; and the gun and tomahawk of the murderer of her infant, and a bag heaped full with scalps, were choicely kept as the trophies of the heroine. The three . . . descended to the English settlements.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

3730. MOTHER, A ruling. Of Roman Emperor Alexander. The pride and avarice of his mother cast a shade on the glories of his reign; and by exacting from his riper years the same dutiful obedience which she had justly claimed from his unexperienced youth, Mameæ exposed to public ridicule both her son's character and her own. [See Woman, Dominion of, No. 6052.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6, p. 184.

3731. MOTHER, Sorrowful. King Philip's War. Writes Mary Rowlandson: . . . "Some in the house were fighting for their lives; others wallowing in blood; the house on fire over our heads. . . . I took my children to go forth, . . . bullets flying thick; one went through my side and through my poor child in my arms." . . . An Indian massacre followed. "There remained nothing to me but one poor wounded babe. Down I must sit in the snow, with my sick child, the picture of death, in my lap. Not the least crumb of refreshing came within either of our mouths from Wednesday to Saturday night, except only a little cold water. . . . One Indian, then a second, and then a third would come and tell me, Your master will quickly knock your child on the head."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 12.

3732. MOTHER, Hostility to a Step. Milton's Daughters. He was left again a widower. Six years later he married his third wife, who was twenty-eight years younger than himself, who survived him for the long period of fifty-five years. This last marriage was embittered by ceaseless contentions between his daughters and his wife, of which Milton lays the blame upon his daughters. He says his wife was good and kind to him in his blind old age, but that his daughters were undutiful and inhuman—not only neglecting him and leaving him alone, but plotting with his maid-servant to cheat him in the marketing. . . . He died in 1674, aged sixty-six years. His property, which amounted to £1500 sterling, became the subject of a lawsuit between the widow and the daughters of the poet. They had quarrelled over his dying-bed, and they quarrelled over his freshly made grave.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 170.

3733. MOTIVES, Higher. Mahomet. [After the conquest of Mecca.] The fugitives and auxiliaries complained that they who had borne the burden were neglected in the season of victory. "Alas!" replied their artful leader, "suffer me to conciliate these recent enemies, these doubtful proselytes, by the gift of some perishable goods. To your guard I intrust my life and fortunes. You are the companions of my exile, of my kingdom, of my paradise."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 139.

3734. MOTIVES, Morality in. Samuel Johnson. The morality of an action depends on the motive from which we act. If I fling half a crown to a beggar, with intention to break his head, and he picks it up and buys victuals with it, the physical effect is good; but, with respect to me, the action is very wrong. So, religious exercises, if not performed with an intention to please God, avail us nothing. As our Saviour says of those who perform them from other motives, "Verily, they have their reward."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 109.

3735. MOUNTAINS, Benefits of. Africa. The cause of the periodical inundation of the Nile has been satisfactorily explained by Pliny . . . and nearly in similar terms by Dr. Pococke. The north winds, says this writer, which begin to blow about the end of May, drive the clouds formed by the vapors of the Mediterranean to the southward, as far as the mountains of Ethiopia, where, being stopped in their course, and condensed on the summits of those mountains, they fall down in violent rains, which continue for some months.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4, p. 35.

3736. MOURNING in Bereavement. Graded. [Numa, one of the first kings of Rome,] fixed the time of mourning according to the different ages of the deceased. He allowed none for a child that died under three years of age; and for one older, the mourning was only to last as many months as he lived years, provided those were not more than ten. The longest mourning was not to continue above ten months, after which space widows were permitted to marry again; but she that took another husband before that term was out was obliged by his decree to sacrifice a cow with calf.—PLUTARCH'S NUMA.

3737. MOURNING, National. Assassination of Lincoln. In the great cities of the land all business instantly stopped; no man had the heart to think of gain; flags drooped half-mast from every winged messenger of the sea, from every church-spire, from every tree of liberty, and from every public building. . . . Gradually as the day wore on emblems of mourning were hung from every house throughout the town, and before the sun had set every city . . . was enshrouded in the shadow of national grief. . . . None deplored the crime . . . with more sincerity than those who had been involved in the guilt of the rebellion.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 21, p. 702.

3738. MOURNING, Respectful. Death of Washington. The news arrived in France. Napoleon immediately issued the following order of the day to the army: "Washington is dead. That great man fought against tyranny. He established the liberty of his country. His memory will be ever dear to the freemen of both hemispheres, and especially to the French soldiers, who, like him and the American troops, have fought for liberty and equality. As a mark of respect, the First Consul orders that for ten days black crape be suspended from all the standards and banners of the Republic."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 16.

3739. MULTITUDE, Fickleness of the. Oliver Cromwell. [On Cromwell's return to London from his successful campaign in Ireland,] he was received with every honor that Parliament and city could bestow, and by the enthusiastic acclamations of the people. He did not despise popular applause, but he knew something of its intrinsic value. Some one said, "What a crowd come to see your Lordship's triumph!" He replied, "If it were to see me hanged, how many more there would be!"—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 9, p. 132.

3740. MULTITUDE, Unreasoning. Sheep. [Cato the Censor said] the Roman people were like sheep, for as those can scarce be brought to stir singly, but all in a body readily follow their leaders, just such are ye. The men whose counsel you would not take as individuals lead you with ease in a crowd.—PLUTARCH'S CATO THE CENSOR.

3741. MURDER, Atrocious. By Alexander. Philotas, a worthy favorite of Alexander, the only remaining son of his oldest and ablest general Parmenio, had received some vague information of a treasonable design against the life of Alexander, but delayed to mention it, probably from giving no credit to the informer. On the report reaching his ears from a different quarter, Alexander, who was told at the same time that Philotas had been informed of the design and refused to communicate it, immediately conceived the unworthy suspicion that his silence arose from his own concern in the conspiracy. On no other grounds Philotas was put to the torture, and, in the agony of pain, uttering something that bore the appearance of confessing his offence, which was nothing more than a venial piece of negligence, he was, by the command of Alexander, stoned to death. But this was not enough. The aged Parmenio, whom the king concluded to be either an accomplice in the crime of his son, or at least to be incapable of ever forgiving his punishment, was, by the same command, assassinated in his tent.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4, p. 191.

3742. MURDER of the Innocents. King Richard III. Edward IV., at the age of forty-two, [was] poisoned, as is supposed, by his brother Richard, Duke of Gloucester. He left two sons, the eldest Edward V., a boy of thirteen years of age. Gloucester, named Protector of the kingdom, gave orders that the two princes, for security, should be lodged in the Tower. . . . The Duke of Buckingham, the slavish instrument of an ambitious tyrant, had wrought upon a mob of the meanest of the populace to declare that they wished Richard, Duke of Gloucester, to accept the crown; this was interpreted to be the voice of the nation. The crafty tyrant, with affected scruples and with much appearance of humility, was at length prevailed on to . . . accept the crown. His elevation had been purchased by a series of crimes, and was now to be secured by an act of accumulated horror. Three assassins, by the command of Richard, entered at midnight the apartment of the Tower where the princes lay asleep, and smothering them in the bed-clothes, buried them in a corner of the building.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14, p. 227.

3743. MURDERESS murdered. Agrippina. [The mother of Nero. She murdered her husband, and was assassinated by order of her son, whom her crimes had elevated to the throne.] The door was darkened by the entrance of Anicetus, with the trierarch Herculeus and the naval centurion Obaritus. "If you have come to inquire about my health," said the undaunted woman, "say that I have recovered. If to commit a crime, I will not believe that you have my son's orders; he would not command a matricide." Returning no answer, the murderers surrounded her bed, and the trierarch struck her on the head with his stick. "Strike my womb," she exclaimed, as the centurion drew his sword; "it bore a Nero." These were her last words before she sank down slain with many wounds.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 3, p. 27.

3744. MUSIC, Artin. Samuel Johnson. GOLD-SMITH: "The greatest musical performers have but small emoluments. Giardini, I am told, does not get above seven hundred a year." JOHNSON: "That is, indeed, but little for a man to get who does best that which so many endeavor to do. There is nothing, I think, in which the power of art is shown so much as in playing on the fiddle. In all other things we can do something at first. Any man will forge a bar of iron, if you give him a hammer; not so well as a smith, but tolerably. A man will saw a piece of wood, and make a box, though a clumsy one; but give him a fiddle and a fiddlestick, and he can do nothing."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 208.

3746. MUSIC, Imaginary. Dunstan. Quick-witted, of tenacious memory, a ready and fluent speaker, gay and genial in address, an artist, a musician, he was at the same time an indefatigable worker at books, at building, at handicraft. As his sphere began to widen we see him followed by a train of pupils, busy with literature, writing, harping, painting, designing. One morning a lady summons him to her house to design a robe which she is embroidering, and, as he bends with her maidens over their toil, his harp, hung upon the walls, sounds without mortal touch tones which the excited ears around frame into a joyous antiphon.—HIST. ENG. PEOPLE, § 74.

3747. MUSIC, Love of. Sixteenth Century. Music was the especial art of the Elizabethan days. In every household there was the love of music, and in many families it was cultivated as an essential part of education. The plain tune of the Church did not unfit the people for the madrigals of the fireside—exquisite compositions, which tell how much of the highest enjoyments of a refined taste belonged to an age which we are too apt to consider very inferior to our own in the amenities of life.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 250.

3748. MUSIC a Necessity. Vandal. [Gelimor, the King of the Vandals in Africa, sought refuge from the Romans on an inaccessible mountain in Numidia. From the poverty of the rude Moors he greatly suffered. Pharas, one of the Roman generals, urged him by letter to accept the clemency of the emperor.] "I am not insensible," replied the King of the Vandals, "how kind and rational is your advice. But I cannot persuade myself to become the slave of an unjust enemy, who has deserved my implacable hatred. Him I had never injured either by word or deed; yet he has sent against me, I know not from whence, a certain Belisarius, who has cast me headlong from the throne into this abyss of misery. Justinian is a man; he is a prince; does he not dread for himself a similar reverse of fortune? I can write no more; my grief oppresses me. Send me, I beseech you, my dear Pharas—send me a lyre, a sponge, and a loaf of bread." From the Vandal messenger Pharas was informed of the motives of the singular request. It was long since the King of Africa had tasted bread; a defluxion had fallen on his eyes, the effect of fatigue or incessant weeping; and he wished to solace the melancholy hours by singing to the lyre the sad story of his own misfortunes. The humanity of Pharas was moved; he sent the three extraordinary gifts.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4, p. 137.

3749. MUSIC, Opposed to. Puritans. They held that "sweet music at the first delighteth the ears, but afterward corrupteth and depraveth the mind."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 250.

3750. MUSIC a political Power. Popular Song. [In 1687 Lord Wharton published a song ridiculing King James II. and Tyrconnel, the lord-deputy.] "The whole army," says Burnet, "and at last the people of both city and country, were singing it perpetually." Wharton afterward boasted that he had rhymed James out of his dominions. He had produced a song like many other songs, of wondrous popularity, with little intrinsic merit. It was whistled and sung in every street in 1688.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 26, p. 416.

3751. MUSIC, Power of. Mary Queen of Scots. Love for the art had unfortunately led to an undue preference for the artist. There is in music an attractive language without words, which unconsciously creates sympathy, and which gives the musician a powerful influence over the imagination of women of cultivated minds. The delicious, impassioned, or heroic notes of the voice or of the instrument seem to breathe a soul in unison with those sublime or touching chords. The music and the musician become, as it were, one. Rizzio, after having merely furnished her with amusement in times of sadness, ended by becoming her confidant, and her favor speedily became manifest to all. The musician, rapidly elevated by her from his servile position to the summit of credit and honors, became, under the name of secretary, the reigning favorite and the minister of her policy.—LAMARTINE'S MARY, p. 12.

3752. MUSIC in Strife. Charles XII. He had a fleet blockading the port of Copenhagen, and an army thundering at its gates. "What is that whistling noise I hear overhead?" asked the king, as he was disembarking on the Danish shore. "It is the musket-balls, sire," said an officer. "Good!" said the king; "that shall be my music henceforth."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 436.

3753. MUSIC, Taste for. Italians. In Italy, writes Steele, a cobbler may be heard working to an opera tune; and "there is not a laborer or handicraft man that, in the cool of the evening, does not relieve himself with solos and sonatas." But, "on the contrary, our honest countrymen have so little inclination to music, that they seldom begin to sing till they are half drunk."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 27, p. 431.

3754. MUSIC unappreciated. General Grant. [At Bangkok in Siam.] A guard of honor presented arms, the band played the "Star-Spangled Banner," which was the first time they had heard that air in the East, all the other bands they had encountered laboring under the delusion that our national air was "Hail Columbia." As the general does not know one tune from another, it never made much difference so far as he was concerned.—GENERAL GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 364.

3755. MUSIC, Undignified. Alcibiades. In the course of his education, he willingly took the lessons of his masters, but refused learning to play upon the flute, which he looked upon as a mean art, and unbecoming a gentleman. "The use of the plectrum upon the lyre," he would say, "has nothing in it that disorders the features or form; but a man is hardly to be known by his most intimate friends when he plays upon the flute. Besides, the lyre does not hinder the performer from speaking or accompanying it with a song; whereas the flute so engages the mouth and the breath that it leaves no possibility of speaking."—PLUTARCH'S ALCIBIADES.

3756. MUTINY, Courage against. Julius Cæsar. His soldiers . . . had deserved admirably well, but they were unfortunately overconscious of their merits. Ill-intentioned officers had taught them to look for extravagant rewards. Their expectations were not fulfilled; and when they supposed that their labors were over, they received orders to prepare for a campaign in Africa. . . . They mutinied. . . . The soldiers of the favored Tenth . . . demanded speech of Cæsar. He bade them come to him, and, with his usual fearlessness, told them to bring their swords. . . . [Instead of calling them "brothers-in-arms," as usual, he called them "citizens," which was a dismissal from service.] Again passionately they implored to be allowed to continue with him. He relented, but not entirely. "Let all go who wish to go," he said; "I will have none serve with me who serve unwillingly." "All, all!" they cried; "not one of us will leave you"—and not one went. The mutiny was the greatest peril, perhaps, to which Cæsar had ever been exposed. No more was said.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 14.

3757. MUTINY, Cruel. Sir Henry Hudson. In the summer of 1610 a ship, called the Discovery, was given to Hudson; and with a vision of the Indies flitting before his imagination, he left England, never to return. The route to China was at last revealed. So believed the great captain and his crew; but sailing farther to the west, the inhospitable shores narrowed on the more inhospitable sea, and Hudson found himself environed, with the terrors of winter, in the frozen gulf (Hudson's Bay) of the North. With unfaltering courage he bore up until his provisions were almost exhausted; spring was at hand, and the day of escape had already arrived when the treacherous crew broke out in mutiny. They seized Hudson and his only son, with seven other faithful sailors, threw them into an open shallop, and cast them off among the icebergs. The fate of the illustrious mariner has never been known.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 8, p. 93.

3758. MUTINY by Disappointment. Second Voyage. [A little colony was planted in the West Indies.] Bernard Diaz de Pisa, a man of some importance, who had held a civil office about the court, had come out with the expedition as comptroller; he seems to have presumed upon his official powers, and to have had early differences with the admiral. Disgusted with his employment in the colony, he soon made a faction among the discontented, and proposed that they should take advantage of the indisposition of Columbus to seize upon some or all of the five ships in the harbor, and return in them to Spain. It would be easy to justify their clandestine return, by preferring a complaint against the admiral, representing the fallacy of his enterprises, and accusing him of gross deceptions and exaggerations in his accounts of the countries. [The conspiracy was discovered in due season.]—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 6, ch. 7.

3759. MUTINY, Reform by. British Navy. On the 15th of April [1797] Lord Bridport, who had taken the command of the Channel fleet, made the signal to prepare for sea. The sailors of his flagship, the Royal George, instead of weighing anchor ran up the shrouds and gave three cheers. The shouts were echoed from every ship at Spithead. Those cheers, so often the prelude of victory, were sounds well calculated to strike terror into the heart of the boldest captain. They were the signals of mutiny. . . . Although the commands of the admiral to put to sea were set at naught—although every officer saw that his power of compelling obedience was gone, not a hand was raised in offence, not a voice was heard in disrespect. [Thirty-two delegates, two from each ship, met in Lord Howe's cabin to deliberate. On the 17th every seaman was sworn to sustain the common cause ;] on the fore-yard-arms of every ship ropes were reeved, ready for the execution of summary punishment upon any deserter. [Two petitions were drawn up—one to the House of Commons and one to the Admiralty, setting forth their just demands with temper and discretion.] The pay and pensions of the army had been increased, while the seamen had been neglected. [The sailors received only fourteen ounces to the pound in the provisions served out to them, two ounces being retained as the perquisite of the purser. They had short quantities in every article measured. Their food was bad. They demanded reform and also pay while in hospital from wounds received during action, until discharged. The mutiny succeeded. The reforms were made.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 19.

3760. MUTINY of Sailors. British Navy. [On the 22d of May, 1797, the fleet at the Nore were joined by four men-of-war and a sloop which deserted from the fleet blockading the Texel. Their acts were those of a foreign enemy. The red flag—the pirate's signal, which implied no quarter would be given—was hoisted. Merchant vessels were intercepted. The mutineers had not the support of the other fleets, and they were not united among themselves. Soon all the vessels returned to their duties without gaining any concessions from the government. The leader of the revolt was executed.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 19, p. 340.

3761. MYSTERIES, Inexplicable. Samuel Johnson. I introduced the subject of second-sight, and other mysterious manifestations, the fulfilment of which, I suggested, might happen by chance. JOHNSON: "Yes, sir, but they have happened so often, that mankind have agreed to think them not fortuitous." I talked to him a great deal of what I had seen in Corsica, and of my intention to publish an account of it. He encouraged me by saying, "You cannot go to the bottom of the subject; but all that you tell us will be new to us. Give us as many anecdotes as you can."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 142.

3762. MYSTICISM, Methods of. Monkery. A holy abbé, superior of thousands of monks, explained: "When you are alone in your cell, shut the door and sit in a corner. Elevate your imagination above all transitory and vain things; rest your beard and your chin upon your breast; turn your eyes and thoughts toward the middle of your belly where the navel is placed, and search for the seat of the soul. All will at first appear to you disorder, obscurity, confusion. But if you persevere night and day, you will experience a delicious pleasure. From the moment the soul discovers the place of the heart, it enjoys a mystic and ethereal illumination."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 226.

3763. MYTHS, Origin of. West Indians. When ever Columbus approached a populous village, he placed the cavalry in front, for the horses inspired a mingled terror and admiration among the natives. Las Casas observes that at first they supposed the rider and his horse to be one animal, and nothing could exceed their astonishment at seeing the horsemen dismount, a circumstance which shows that the alleged origin of the ancient fable of the centaurs is at least founded in nature. On the approach of the army the Indians generally fled with terror, and took refuge in their houses.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 6, ch. 9.

3764. NAME abandoned. In Scotland. [The Earl of Argyre was captured after a vain attempt to rebel against James II.] The man who bore the chief part in the arrest was named Riddell. On this account the whole race of Riddells was, during more than a century, held in abhorrence by the great tribe of Campbell. Within living memory, when a Riddell visited a fair in Argyreshire, he found it necessary to assume a false name.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 519.

3765. NAME, Aid of a. Alexander. Pyrrhus, taking up arms, . . . marched against Berea. The night before he set out he dreamed that Alexander the Great called him, and that when he came to him he found him sick in bed, but was received with many obliging expressions of friendship, and a promise of sudden assistance. Pyrrhus said, "How can you, sir, who are sick, be able to assist me?" Alexander answered, "I will do it with my name;" and at the same time he mounted a Nisean horse, and seemed to lead the way.—PLUTARCH'S PYRRHUS.

3766. NAME, Change of. Robert. [Robert, son of Richard II., was] sometimes styled "Robert the Magnificent," and more commonly "Robert the Devil."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 13, p. 168.

3767. NAME, A detested. Jeffreys. Jeffreys had done his work, and returned to claim his reward. He arrived at Windsor from the West, leaving carnage, mourning, and terror behind him. The hatred with which he was regarded in Somersetshire has no parallel in our history. It was not to be quenched by time or by political changes, was long transmitted from generation to generation, and raged fiercely against his innocent progeny. When he had been many years dead, when his name and title were extinct, his granddaughter, the Countess of Pomfret, travelling along the western road, was insulted by the populace, and found that she could not safely venture herself among the descendants of those who had witnessed the bloody assizes. But at the court Jeffreys was cordially welcomed. He was a judge after his master's own heart.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 610.

3768. NAME, Difference in. Unimportant. When the ambassadors of Antiochus [the Great] represented to the Achæans how numerous the king's forces were, and, to make them appear still more so, reckoned them up by all their different names, "I supped once," said Flaminius, "with a friend; and upon my complaining of the great number of dishes, and expressing my wonder how he could furnish his table with such a vast variety, 'Be not uneasy about that,' said my friend, 'for it is all hog's flesh; and the difference is only in the dressing and the sauce.' In like manner, I say to you, my Achæan friend, be not astonished at the number of Antiochus' forces, at these pikemen, these halberdiers and cuirassiers; for they are all Syrians, only distinguished by the trifling arms they bear."—PLUTARCH'S FLAMINIUS.

3769. NAME falsified. Conquerors. The odious name of conquerors was softened into the mild and friendly appellation of the guests of the Romans; and the barbarians of Gaul, more especially the Goths, repeatedly declared that they were bound to the people by the ties of hospitality, and to the emperor by the duty of allegiance and military service.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 315.

3770. NAME, A fearful. Richard I. If heroism be confined to brutal and ferocious valor, Richard Plantagenet will stand high among the heroes of the age. The memory of Cœur de Lion, of the lion-hearted prince, was long dear and glorious to his English subjects; and, at the distance of sixty years, it was celebrated in proverbial sayings by the grandsons of the Turks and Saracens, against whom he had fought; his tremendous name was employed by the Syrian mothers to silence their infants; and if a horse suddenly started from the way, his rider was wont to exclaim, "Dost thou think King Richard is in that bush?"—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 49, p. 32.

3771. NAME, A helpful. "Washington." At Rome he was strongly tempted to turn painter; and it was there also that he was the recipient of attentions more flattering than he could account for until just as he was going away. "Tell me, sir," said a great Roman banker, who had paid him particular honor, "are you a relative of General Washington?" He thus learned that he had been indebted for unexpected invitations and other civilities to his supposed relationship to our first President. Mr. Irving, after telling this anecdote, used sometimes to add to it another. An English lady and her daughter paused in a gallery of art before a bust of Washington. "Mother," said the daughter, "who was Washington?" "Why, my dear, don't you know? He wrote the Sketch Book."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 721.

3772. NAME, Posthumous. Cæsar. [The authority of] Cæsar was so formidable in Rome, that it supported his friends even after he was dead. And a simple boy rose to the first eminence of power by adopting his name, which served as a charm against the envy and the influence of Antony.—PLUTARCH.

3773. NAME, A terrible. General Jackson. In the latter part of 1817 the Seminole Indians on the frontiers of Georgia and Alabama became hostile. Some bad negroes and treacherous Creeks joined the savages in their depredations.

General Gaines, commandant of a post on Flint River, was sent into the Seminole country, but after destroying a few villages his forces were found inadequate to conquer the red man. General Jackson was then ordered to collect from the adjacent States a sufficient army and reduce the Seminoles to submission. Instead of following his directions, that stern and self-willed man mustered 1000 riflemen from West Tennessee, and in the spring of 1818 overran the hostile country with little opposition. The Indians were afraid to fight the man whom they had named the Big Knife.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 52, p. 418.

3774. NAMES, Burdened with. The Welsh. Henry [VIII.] himself, it will be remembered, was of Welsh descent; and he strongly recommended it to the Welsh to adopt the mode of most civilized nations, in taking family names, instead of their manner of adding their father's, and, perhaps, their grandfather's name to their own Christian one, as Morgan ap Williams, or Richard ap Morgan ap Williams.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 26.

3775. NAMES, Coincidence in. Bacon. In the middle of the thirteenth century, however, arose a genius of singular eminence, who, piercing at once through the thickest cloud of ignorance and barbarism, seemed formed to enlighten Europe. This was Roger Bacon, an English Franciscan friar, who in variety and extent of genius is entitled most deservedly to the highest rank in the annals of European literature. He was acquainted with all the ancient languages, and familiar with the works of their best authors. At that time, when every pretender to knowledge drew his creed of science from the works of Aristotle, and servilely adhered to his dogmas and opinions, the genius of Roger Bacon saw the insufficiency of that philosophy; and he began to apply himself with indefatigable industry to that method of investigation by experiment, and by the observation of nature, which was afterward, at the distance of four centuries, so happily pursued and so strenuously recommended by an illustrious philosopher of the same name, Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam. In the "Opus Majus" of Roger Bacon he declares that if it had been in his power, he would have burnt the whole works of Aristotle quia eorum studium non est nisi temporis amissio, et causa erroris, et multiplicatio ignorantie. Accordingly, this great man, applying himself to the improvement of philosophy by observation and experiment, distinguished himself by some of the most important discoveries in astronomy, in optics, in chemistry, in medicine, and in mechanics.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 16, p. 246.

3777. NAMES, Influence of. Government. The title of king had armed the Romans against his life. Augustus was sensible that mankind is governed by names; nor was he deceived in his expectation that the Senate and people would submit to slavery, provided they were respectfully assured that they still enjoyed their ancient freedom. A feeble Senate and enervated people cheerfully acquiesced in the pleasing illusion, as long as it was supported by the virtue, or even by the prudence, of the successors of Augustus.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 3, p. 87.

3778. NAMES, Memorizing. Samuel Johnson. Nothing is more common than to mistake surnames when we hear them carelessly uttered for the first time. To prevent this, he used not only to pronounce them slowly and distinctly, but to take the trouble of spelling them—a practice which I have often followed, and which I wish were general.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 489.

3779. NAMES, Unimportant. Victory. Blake did not trouble himself with governing troublesome people; his work lay in fighting England's enemies and maintaining England's honor on the seas. First we find him in conflict again with an old land foe, Prince Rupert, who had also betaken himself to the waters. Blake followed him to the Tagus, trailing after him the Commonwealth's men-of-war with their homely names of the Tiger, the Tenth Whelp, John, Signet; homely vessels no doubt, but they succeeded in scattering Rupert's vessels with their finer names, and the prince, with the fragments of his fleet, hurried away to the West Indies.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 205.

3780. NATION, Characterized. Indian. The Indians were strongly marked with national peculiarities. The most striking characteristic of the race was a certain sense of personal independence, wilfulness of action, freedom from restraint. To the red man's imagination the idea of a civil authority which should subordinate his passions, curb his will, and thwart his purposes was intolerable. Among this people no common enterprise was possible unless made so by the concurrence of free wills. If the chieftain entered the war-path, his kinsman and the braves of other tribes followed him only because they chose his leadership. His authority and right of command extended no further than to be foremost in danger, most cunning in savage strategy, bravest in battle. So of all the relations of Indian life.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 1, p. 44.

3781. NATION, A conceited. England. [A Venetian traveller says] they think there are no other men than themselves, and no other world but England; and whenever they see a handsome foreigner, they say that he looks like an Englishman.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 254.

3782. NATION, A degenerate. Mohammedans. Othman was succeeded by Ali, the son-in-law of Mahomet. This prince, whose name is to this day revered by the Mohammedans, inherited, in many respects, the genius of his father-in-law. . . . The genius of the Arabians, fired by enthusiasm and invigorated by conquest, seemed now in the train of carrying everything before it. It is wonderful what may be achieved by a people who are once in the track of glory. Nations, in fact, seem to have their ages of brilliancy, when all is life, and vigor, and enterprise; and these perhaps preceded, and again to be followed by, an era of inanimation, weakness, and degeneracy. In this splendid period of the history of the Saracens, their conquests were incredible. Within half a century from the first opening of the career of Mahomet they had raised an empire more extensive than what remained, at this time, of the dominion of the Romans.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 1, p. 54.

3783. ———. Moors. Spain was at this time chiefly possessed by the Moors. The Christians occupied about a fourth part of the country, and that the most barren of the whole. . . . The Moors possessed the rest of the country, comprehending Portugal. Their capital . . . was the city of Cordova, a most delightful residence, which they had adorned with every embellishment of art and magnificence. These Arabians were at this time, perhaps, the most refined and polished people in the world. Luxury and pleasure at length corrupted the princes of the Moors, and their dominions, in the tenth century, were split among a number of petty sovereigns.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 7, p. 125.

3784. ———. England, 1756. Effeminacy, vanity, luxury, rapacity, universally prevailed. Religion was despised. The principle of honor was lost or totally corrupted. The national capacity was lowered. The national spirit of defence was impaired.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 14, p. 212.

3785. NATION, Heterogeneous. Rome. Romulus . . . built his city, having sent for persons from Heturia, who (as is usual in sacred mysteries), according to stated ceremonies and written rules, were to order and direct how everything was to be done. First, a circular ditch was dug about what is now called the Comitum, or Hall of Justice, and the first-fruits of everything that is reckoned either good by use or necessary by nature were cast into it; and then each bringing a small quantity of the earth of the country from whence he came, threw it in promiscuously. This ditch had the name of Mundus, the same with that of the universe.—PLUTARCH'S ROMULUS.

3786. NATION, An inconsiderate. Feared. [William Pitt and Edmund Burke were England's famous statesmen.] In 1791 Pitt invited Burke to dine with him. After dinner Burke was earnestly representing the danger which threatened the country from French [revolutionary] principles, when Pitt said, "Never fear, Mr. Burke; depend on it, we shall go on as we are till the day of judgment." "Very likely, sir," replied Burke; "it is the day of no judgment that I am afraid of."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 11, p. 207.

3787. NATION, Prospective. New France. In the month of January, 1524, Verrazzani left the shores of Europe. His fleet consisted at first of four vessels, but three of them were damaged in a storm, and the voyage was undertaken with a single ship called the Dolphin. . . . The whole coast of New Jersey was explored, and the hills marked as containing minerals. The harbor of New York was entered, and its safe and spacious waters noted with admiration. At Newport, R. I., Verrazzani anchored for fifteen days, and a trade was again opened with the Indians. Before leaving the place the French sailors repaid the confidence of the natives by kidnapping a child and attempting to steal a defenceless Indian girl. Sailing from Newport, Verrazzani continued his explorations northward. The long and broken line of the New England coast was traced with considerable care. . . . Passing to the east of Nova Scotia, the bold navigator reached Newfoundland in the latter part of May. In July he returned to France, and published an account, still extant, of his great discoveries. The name of New France was now given to the whole country whose sea-coast had been traced by the adventurous crew of the Dolphin.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 5, p. 70.

3788. NATION rescued, A. Battle at Leuthen. [Frederick the Great against the Austrians, after suffering great disasters. His enemies combined against Prussia. Great was the valor shown and the victory won. See No. 1236.] The soldiers knew how the rescue of their nation hung on that battle; and as a grenadier on the field of carnage began to sing, "Thanks be to God," the whole army, in the darkness of evening, standing amid thousands of the dead, uplifted the hymn of praise.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 12.

3789. NATION, Shameful. Spain. The guns of the enemy rolled no more round the British coast till Cromwell was dead and Charles Stuart came back; and then, indeed, even London herself heard them thundering up the Medway and the Thames. Turks, pirates, and corsairs—these were swept away of course; but in those days Spain herself was but a kingdom of robbers and buccaneers. Waves of golden romance, what imagination does not kindle over the stories of the Spanish Main! The power of Spain was there—Spain, the bloodiest power of Europe; Spain, the land of the Inquisition; Spain, the disgraced, degraded land of every superstition. Against her Cromwell declared war. Alliance with France, hostility to Spain, and we have seen how the immortal Blake and his fire-ships scoured those distant seas. That great sea-king!—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 217.

3790. NATIONS contrasted. Athenians—Lacedæmonians. The manners of the Athenians formed a most striking contrast to those of the Lacedæmonians. It is, in fact, hardly possible to find a greater dissimilarity even in nations inhabiting the most opposite extremes of the earth. The Athenian found, either in his relish for serious business or in his taste for pleasure, a constant occupation. The arts at Athens met with the highest encouragement. The luxury of the rich perpetually employed the industry of the poor; and the sciences were cultivated with the same ardor as the arts; for the connection of mental enjoyments with moderate gratification of sense is the refinement of luxury. But in the pleasures of the Athenians, unless, indeed, in the most corrupted times of the commonwealth, decency was most scrupulously observed. We have seen those rigid restraints on the conduct of magistrates. An archon convicted of drunkenness was, for the first offence, condemned to pay a heavy fine, and for a second was punished with death. This general decency of character was much heightened by a certain urbanity of manners, which eminently distinguished the Athenians above all the other States of Greece.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 10, p. 107.

3791. NATIONS, Union of. Commonwealth. Henry IV. devised a grand scheme, which consisted in the formation of a confederacy or commonwealth of nations, embracing within itself, on a perfectly equal footing, the three prevailing forms of Christianity—the Catholic, the Lutheran, and the Reformed—and guaranteeing the free enjoyment of those political institutions which each member might prefer. The association was to comprise six hereditary monarchies—France, Spain, Great Britain, Denmark, Sweden, and Savoy, or Northern Italy; six elective monarchies—the empire, Poland, Hungary, Venice, Bohemia, and the Papal States; and three republics—the Netherlands, Switzerland, and the Italian Republic, containing Genoa, Lucca, and other small provinces. . . . The equilibrium thus established was to be maintained by a federal council or diet, the decisions of which were to be final in all cases of dispute between the associated States.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 18, § 13.

3792. NATIONS, Vanishing. Algonquins. It appears that their original seat was on the Ottawa River. At the beginning of the seventeenth century the Algonquins numbered fully a quarter of a million. The tribes of this great family were nomadic in their habits, roaming from one hunting ground and river to another, according to the exigencies of fishing and the chase. Agriculture was but little esteemed. They were divided into many subordinate tribes, each having its local name, dialect, and traditions. When the first European settlements were planted the Algonquin race was already declining in numbers and influence. Wasting diseases destroyed whole tribes. Of all the Indian nations, the Algonquins suffered most from contact with the white man. Before his aggressive spirit, his fiery rum, and his destructive weapons, the warriors were unable to stand. The race has withered to a shadow; only a few thousands remain to rehearse the story of their ancestors.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 1, p. 42.

3793. NATURE vs. Art. Samuel Johnson. BOSWELL: "I am well assured that the people of Otaheite who have the bread tree, the fruit of which serves them for bread, laughed heartily when they were informed of the tedious process necessary with us to have bread—ploughing, sowing, harrowing, reaping, threshing, grinding, baking." JOHNSON: "Why, sir, all ignorant savages will laugh when they are told of the advantages of civilized life. Were you to tell men who live without houses how we pile brick upon brick, and rafter upon rafter, and that after a house is raised to a certain height a man tumbles off a scaffold and breaks his neck, he would laugh heartily at our folly in building; but it does not follow that men are better without houses. No, sir," holding up a slice of a good loaf, "this is better than the bread-tree."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 216.

3794. NATURE, Demands of. Isaac Newton. Early in his college career Newton would spend a whole night in the solution of a mathematical problem, and would greet him [his friend] in the morning with a joyful salutation, seeming to be as much refreshed by his success as if he had spent the night in sleep. He would leave his dinner untasted on the table, hour after hour, while he brooded over some mathematical difficulty, and at length order the dishes to be removed, not being aware that he had no dinner. Nature will not suspend her laws even in favor of her most illustrious interpreter. The bloom faded from his cheeks; his digestion became impaired, and a serious illness threatened his life. He took warning, as he remarked, and "learned to go to bed betimes."—PARTON'S NEWTON, p. 79.

3795. NATURE depreciated. Samuel Johnson. We walked in the evening in Greenwich Park. He asked me, I suppose, by way of trying my disposition, "Is not this very fine?" Having no exquisite relish of the beauties of nature, and being more delighted with "the busy hum of men," I answered, "Yes, sir; but not equal to Fleet Street." JOHNSON: "You are right, sir."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 127.

3797. NATURE misinterpreted. Providence. It was the fashion of the times to attribute every remarkable event to the particular will of the Deity; the alterations of nature were connected, by an invisible chain, with the moral and metaphysical opinions of the human mind; and the most sagacious divines could distinguish, according to the color of their respective prejudices, that the establishment of heresy tended to produce an earthquake, or that a deluge was the inevitable consequence of the progress of sin and error.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26, p. 2.

3798. NATURE, Relief in. Edmund Burke. It is still a touching picture to the historic imagination to follow him from the heat and violence of the House, where tipsy squires derided the greatest genius of his time, down to the calm shades of Beaconsfield, where he would with his own hands give food to a starving beggar, or medicine to a peasant sick of the ague; where he would talk of the weather, the turnips, and the hay with the team-men and the farm-bailiff; and where, in the evening stillness, he would pace the walk under the trees, and reflect on the state of Europe and the distractions of his country.—MORLEY'S BURKE, ch. 6.

3799. NATURE, Secrets of. Reign of Charles II. The great work of interpreting nature was performed by the English of that age as it had never before been performed in any age by any nation. The spirit of Francis Bacon was abroad—a spirit admirably compounded of audacity and sobriety. There was a strong persuasion that the whole world was full of secrets of high moment to the happiness of man, and that man had, by his Maker, been intrusted with the key which, rightly used, would give access to them. There was, at the same time, a conviction that in physics it was impossible to arrive at the knowledge of general laws except by the careful observation of particular facts.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 381.

3800. NAVIGATION undeveloped. A.D. 300. So imperfect in those times was the art of navigation, that orators have celebrated the daring courage of the Romans, who ventured to set sail with a side-wind, and on a stormy day.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13, p. 412.

3801. NAVY, A formidable. Invincible Armada. Queen Elizabeth, who openly espoused the cause of the Hollanders, had, by one of her admirals, Sir Francis Drake, taken and plundered some of the Spanish settlements in America. To revenge these injuries, Philip [II.] prepared for an invasion of the kingdom of England, and equipped the Invincible Armada, the most formidable naval armament that had ever been raised by any single nation. This immense armament consisted of 150 large ships of war, manned by 20,000 soldiers and upward of 8000 seamen, besides 2000 galley-slaves, and armed with 3000 pieces of cannon. To co-operate with this prodigious naval force, 30,000 men were to be conveyed in transports from Flanders, and a general insurrection was expected of all the Catholics in Britain to depose Elizabeth, and place her cousin, Mary of Scotland, upon the throne of England.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 26, p. 369.

3802. NAVY, Need of. Peter the Great. He next turned his attention to the creation of a navy. His father, in pursuance of the same design, had caused one ship to be built for him in Holland; but that one ship, the whole navy of Russia, had been burnt, and in all the empire there were but two men capable of navigating a ship. Peter sought out these two men, one of whom proved to be a man of great ability; and him the czar promoted to the post of chief constructor. Workmen were brought from Holland; a navy-yard was established; and soon the first vessel was launched.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 429.

3803. NECESSITY, Law of. Captain John Smith. Descending James River as far as Hampton Roads, he landed with his five companions, went boldly among the natives, and began to offer them hatchets and copper coins in exchange for corn. The Indians only laughed at the proposal, and then mocked the half-starved foreigners by offering to barter a piece of bread for Smith's sword and musket. Finding that good treatment was only thrown away, the English formed the desperate resolution of fighting. He and his men fired a volley among the affrighted savages, who ran yelling into the woods. Going straight to their wigwams, he found an abundant store of corn, but forbid his men to take a grain until the Indians should return to attack them. Sixty or seventy painted warriors, headed by a priest who carried an idol in his arms, soon came out of the forest, and made a violent onset. The English not only stood their ground, but made a rush, wounded several of the natives, and captured their idol. A parley now ensued; the terrified priest came and humbly begged for his fallen deity, but Smith stood grimly with his musket across the prostrate idol, and would grant no terms until six unarmed Indians had loaded his boat with corn. Then the image was given up, beads and hatchets were liberally distributed among the warriors, who ratified the peace by performing a dance of friendship, while Smith and his men rowed up the river with a boat-load of supplies.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 9, p. 98.

3804. NECROMANCY, Proof of. Familiar Spirit. Dr. John Dee, an astrologer and magician, who went on casting nativities and raising spirits till the days of James I., had come into repute in the middle of the sixteenth century; and he got into trouble, according to his own account, through being suspected of "endeavoring, by enchantments, to destroy Queen Mary." In June, 1555, some persons were apprehended, "that did calculate the king's and queen's and my lady Elizabeth's nativity; whereof one Dee and Davy are accused, that they should have a familiar spirit." The familiar spirit was believed in, because one of their accusers had "immediately upon the accusation both his children stricken, the one with present death and the other with blindness."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 7, p. 97.

3805. NEGRO, Blood of the. Boston Massacre. [British soldiers provoked a quarrel in the streets of Boston, and were despised and insulted by the mob.] Three persons were killed, among them Attucks, the mulatto. . . . who at the time was quietly leaning on a long stick. . . . Eight were wounded, two of them mortally. Of all the eleven, not more than one had had any share in the disturbance.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 43.

3806. NEGROES in War. American Colonies. [In Parliament, A.D. 1775, Lyttelton, formerly Governor of South Carolina, favored coercion, and] explained the inherent weakness of the Southern colonies, and with obvious satisfaction intimated that "if a few regiments were sent there, the negroes would imbrue their hands in their masters' blood."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 51.

3807. NERVOUSNESS evinced. Samuel Johnson. Such was the heat and irritability of his blood, that not only did he pare his nails to the quick, but scraped the joints of his fingers with a penknife, till they seemed quite red and raw.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 439.

3808. NEUTRALITY enforced. French Revolution. [When Louis XVI. was captured by the revolutionists and returned to Paris, placards were posted announcing.] Whoever shall applaud the king shall be flogged; whoever shall insult him shall be hanged.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 10, p. 203.

3809. NEUTRALITY, Nominal. Alabama. Most destructive of all the Confederate vessels was the famous Alabama, built at Liverpool. Her commander was Captain Raphael Semmes, the same who had cruised in the Sumter. A majority of the crew of the Alabama were British subjects; her armament was entirely British; and whenever occasion required the British flag was carried. In her whole career, involving the destruction of sixty-six vessels and a loss of $10,000,000, to the merchant service of the United States, she never entered a Confederate port, but continued abroad, capturing and burning. Early in the summer of 1864 Semmes entered the harbor of Cherbourg, France, and was there discovered by Captain Winslow, commander of the steamer Kearsarge. The French Government gave the Confederate captain orders to leave the port, and on the 19th of June he went out to give his antagonist battle. Seven miles from the shore the two ships closed for the death-struggle; and after a desperate battle of an hour's duration the Alabama was shattered and sunk. Semmes and a part of his officers and crew were picked up by the English yacht Deerhound and carried to Southampton.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 66, p. 533.

3810. NEWS, Fatal. Dr. Valentine Mott. The barber of Dr. Mott at once began to speak of the awful news of that morning. The doctor, who had heard nothing of it, was overwhelmed with the intelligence. He turned as pale as death. Rising from his chair, he staggered to an adjoining room in search of his wife. "My dear," said he, "I have received such a shock; President Lincoln has been murdered." Having uttered these words, he sat down, still deadly pale, and so feeble that he could scarcely keep his seat. He was soon seized with acute pains in the back, and appeared to be overtaken, all at once, with the weakness usually attached to fourscore. From that time he continued to grow feebler every hour, and after lingering ten days breathed his last—a victim of the same blow that robbed the nation of its chief.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 527.

3811. NEWS, Writer of. Devices in A.D. 1709. His brain, which was his estate, had as regular and different products as other men's land. From the beginning of November until the opening of the campaign he writ pamphlets and letters to members of Parliament or friends in the country. But sometimes he would relieve his ordinary readers with a murder, and lived comfortably for a week or two upon strange and lamentable accidents. A little before the armies took the field his way was to open your attention with a prodigy; and a monster well writ was two guineas at the lowest price. This prepared his readers for the great and bloody news from Flanders in June and July.—KNIGHT'S ENG., ch. 26, p. 403.

3812. NEWSPAPERS, Colonial. American. In 1740 the number of newspapers in the English colonies on the Continent had increased to eleven, . . . one in South Carolina, one in Virginia, three in Pennsylvania, . . . one in New York, and the remaining five in Boston. The sheet at first used was but of the foolscap size; and but one, or even half of one, was issued weekly. The papers sought support rather by modestly telling the news of the day than by engaging in conflicts; they had no political theories to enforce, no revolutions in faith to hasten.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 23.

3813. NEWSPAPERS deprecated. By Addison. [At the opening of the eighteenth century] newspapers multiplied. But even Addison could not see that they were capable of becoming great instruments of public good. He says the people are made politicians by the publication of State matters by the press; and adds, "One cannot but be sorry that such a pernicious machine is erected among them."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 4, p. 61.

3814. NEWSPAPERS, Primitive. Reign of Charles II. At the close of his reign no newspaper was suffered to appear without his allowance, and his allowance was given exclusively to the London Gazette. The London Gazette came out only on Mondays and Thursdays. The contents generally were a royal proclamation, two or three Tory addresses, notices of two or three promotions, an account of a skirmish between the imperial troops and the Janissaries on the Danube, a description of a highwayman, an announcement of a grand cock-fight between two persons of honor, and an advertisement offering a reward for a strayed dog. The whole made up two pages of moderate size. . . . The most important parliamentary debates, the most important State trials recorded in our history, were passed over in profound silence.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 362.

3815. NEWSPAPERS, Directed by. The Tatler. [The prospectus of the Tatler, which appeared on the 12th of April, 1709, "professed to teach 'politic persons what to think.'"]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 26.

3816. NIGHT, Activity at. Hanno the Carthaginian. [Voyage of African discovery.] He observed from his fleet, that in the daytime there was nothing to be seen upon the land, but all was stillness and silence; but in the night he heard the sound of various musical instruments, and saw a great number of fires lighted along the coast; and we know that such is the appearance of a great part of the western coast of Africa at this day, that the savages in the daytime retire into the woods to avoid the heat of the sun; that they light great fires in the night to disperse the beasts of prey; and that they are extremely fond of music and dancing.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 8, p. 359.

3817. NIGHT, Desire for. Wellington. [At the battle of Waterloo his army was beginning to give way.] As he saw his lines melting away he repeatedly looked at his watch, and then fixed his gaze on the distant hills; and as he wiped the perspiration which mental anguish had extorted from his brow, he exclaimed, "Would to heaven that Blucher or night would come!"—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 27.

3818. NOBILITY of Appearance. Numitor. [Romulus was taken prisoner in battle.] When the youth was conducted to his house, Numitor was greatly struck with his appearance, as he was very remarkable for size and strength; he observed, too, his presence of mind and the steadiness of his looks, which had nothing servile in them, nor were altered with the sense of his present danger; and he was informed that his actions and whole behavior were suitable to what he saw.—PLUTARCH'S ROMULUS.

3819. NOBILITY honored. Confession. Pompey had resolved to chastise the Himerians for attempting to support his enemies, when the orator Sthenis told him he would act unjustly if he passed by the person that was guilty, and punished the innocent. Pompey asked him who was the guilty person, and he answered, "I am the man. I persuaded my friends, and compelled my enemies, to take the measures they did." Pompey, delighted with his frank confession and noble spirit, forgave him first, and afterward all the people of Himera.—PLUTARCH'S POMPEY.

3820. NOBILITY, Patriotic. Sylla. Sylla . . . came to Præneste, where at first he tried the inhabitants, and had them executed singly. But afterward, finding he had not leisure for such formalities, he collected them to the number of twelve thousand, and ordered them to be put to death, excepting only one who had formerly entertained him at his house. This man with a noble spirit told him he would never owe his life to the destroyer of his country; and voluntarily mixing with the crowd, he died with his fellow-citizens.—PLUTARCH'S SYLLA.

3821. NOBILITY recognized. Louis IX. [Louis IX. was captured by the Saracens.] He displayed in his adversity an unshaken firmness, dignity, and magnanimity, which extorted the admiration even of his savage captors. The Saracen sultan soon showed himself disposed to treat for the king's liberation, and demanded as his ransom the restitution of Damietta, and the payment of 1,000,000 bezants of gold. These terms were accepted without hesitation by Louis; and his noble character made such an impression upon the sultan, that he voluntarily remitted 200,000 bezants of the stipulated sum.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 9, § 4.

3822. NON-RESISTANCE, Christian. Primitive. Faithful to the doctrine of the apostle, who in the reign of Nero had preached the duty of unconditional submission, the Christians of the three first centuries preserved their conscience pure and innocent of the guilt of secret conspiracy or open rebellion. While they experienced the rigor of persecution, they were never provoked either to meet their tyrants in the field, or indignantly to withdraw themselves into some remote and sequestered corner of the globe.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20, p. 255.

3823. NON-RESISTANCE, Evasion of. Samuel Johnson. JOHNSON: "I do not see, sir, that fighting is absolutely forbidden in Scripture; I see revenge forbidden, but not self-defence." BOSWELL: "The Quakers say it is—'Unto him that smiteth thee on one cheek, offer him also the other.'" JOHNSON: "But stay, sir; the text is meant only to have the effect of moderating passion; it is plain that we are not to take it in a literal sense. We see this from the context, where there are other recommendations, which I warrant you the Quaker will not take literally; as, for instance, 'From him that would borrow of thee, turn thou not away.' Let a man whose credit is bad come to a Quaker, and say, 'Well, sir, lend me £100;' he'll find him as unwilling as any other man. No, sir; a man may shoot the man who invades his character, as he may shoot him who attempts to break into his house."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 495.

3824. NON-RESISTANCE taught. Reign of James II. The cradle of the heir apparent of the crown was surrounded by Jesuits. Deadly hatred of that church of which he would one day be the head would be studiously instilled into his infant mind, would be the guiding principle of his life, and would be bequeathed by him to his posterity. This vista of calamities had no end. It stretched beyond the life of the youngest man living, beyond the eighteenth century. . . . The greatest Anglican doctors of that age had maintained that no breach of law or contract, no excess of cruelty, rapacity, or licentiousness, on the part of a rightful king, could justify his people in withstanding him by force.

Some of them had delighted to exhibit the doctrine of non-resistance in a form so exaggerated as to shock common-sense and humanity. They frequently and emphatically remarked that Nero was at the head of the Roman Government when Saint Paul inculcated the duty of obeying magistrates. The inference which they drew was that, if an English king should, without any law but his own pleasure, persecute his subjects for not worshipping idols, should fling them to the lions in the Tower, should wrap them up in pitched cloth and set them on fire to light up Saint James' Park, and should go on with these massacres till whole towns and shires were left without one inhabitant, the survivors would still be bound meekly to submit, and to be torn in pieces or roasted alive without a struggle.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 364.

3825. NONSENSE against Nonsense. Samuel Johnson. Mrs. Thrale disputed with him on the merit of Prior. He attacked him powerfully; said he wrote of love like a man who had never felt it; his love-verses were college verses. . . . Mrs. Thrale stood to her gun with great courage, in defence of amorous ditties, which Johnson despised, till he at last silenced her by saying, "My dear lady, talk no more of this. Nonsense can be defended but by nonsense."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 162.

3826. NOVELS, Contempt for. Napoleon I. His contempt for works of fiction—the whole class of novels and romances—amounted almost to indignation. He never could endure to see one reading such a book. . . . Once, when emperor, in passing through the saloons of his palace, he found one of the maids of honor with a novel in her hands. He took it from her, gave her a severe lecture for wasting her time in such frivolous reading, and cast the volume into the flames. When he had a few moments for diversion, he not unfrequently employed them in looking over a book of logarithms, in which he always found recreation.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 10.

3827. NOVELS, Reading of. Excitement. [The Windsor blacksmith] got hold of Richardson's novel of "Pamela; or Virtue Rewarded," and used to read it aloud in the long summer evenings, seated on his anvil, and never failed to have a large and attentive audience. When the happy turn of fortune arrived which brings the hero and heroine together, and sets them living long and happily according to the most approved rules, the congregation were so delighted as to raise a great shout, and procuring the church keys, actually set the parish bells ringing.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 5, p. 88.

tants applied to Parliament for permission to put up rails and to plant trees.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 334.

3829. NUMBER, Small. Ridiculed. [When Lucullus, with a small army, encamped before the army of Tigranes, he] made use of that celebrated expression, that if they came as ambassadors there were too many of them; if as soldiers, too few.—PLUTARCH'S LUCULLUS.

3830. NUMBERS, Disparity of. Cortez. Velasquez, the Spanish Governor of Cuba, jealous of the fame of Cortez, had despatched a force to Mexico to arrest his progress and to supersede him in command. The expedition was led by Panfilo de Narvaez, the same who was afterward Governor of Florida. His forces consisted of more than 1200 well-armed and well-disciplined soldiers, besides 1000 Indian servants and guides. But the vigilant Cortez had meanwhile been informed by messengers from Vera Cruz of the movement which his enemies at home had set on foot against him, and he determined to sell his command only at the price of his own life and the lives of all his followers. He therefore instructed Alvarado, one of his subordinate officers, to remain in the capital with a small force of 140 men; and with the remainder, numbering less than 200, he hastily withdrew from the city, and proceeded by a forced march to encounter De Narvaez on the sea-coast. On the night of the 26th of May, 1520, while the soldiers of the latter were quietly asleep in their camp near Vera Cruz, Cortez burst upon them with the fury of despair, and before they could rally or well understand the terrible onset, compelled the whole force to surrender. Then, adding the general's skill to the warrior's prowess, he succeeded in inducing the conquered army to join his own standard; and with his forces thus augmented to six times their original numbers, he began a second time his march toward the capital.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 4, p. 60.

3831. NUMBERS, Disparity in. Soldiers. Followed, as it is said, by 2,000,000 men, Xerxes, the descendant of Cyrus, invaded Greece. Thirty thousand soldiers, under the command of Alexander, the son of Philip, who was intrusted by the Greeks with their glory and revenge, were sufficient to subdue Persia.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 8, p. 227.

3832. — — —. Maxentius—Constantine. At the head of about 40,000 soldiers, he marched to encounter an enemy whose numbers were at least four times superior to his own. But the armies of Rome, placed at a secure distance from danger, were enervated by indulgence and luxury. Habituated to the baths and theatres of Rome, they took the field with reluctance, and were chiefly composed of veterans who had almost forgotten, or of new levees who had never acquired, the use of arms and the practice of war. The hardy legions of Gaul had long defended the frontiers of the empire against the barbarians of the North; and in the performance of that laborious service their valor was exercised and their discipline confirmed. There appeared the same difference between the leaders as between the armies.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 14, p. 475.

3833. NUMBERS an Obstacle. Artaxerxes' Assembly. To suppress the idolaters, reunite the schismatics, and confute the unbelievers, by the infallible decision of a general council, the pious Artaxerxes summoned the Magi from all parts of his dominions. These priests, who had so long sighed in contempt and obscurity, obeyed the welcome summons, and on the appointed day appeared, to the number of about 80,000. But as the debates of so tumultuous an assembly could not have been directed by the authority of reason or influenced by the art of policy, the Persian synod was reduced, by successive operations, to 40,000 to 4000, to 400, to 40, and at last to seven Magi, the most respected for their learning and piety.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 8, p. 231.

3834. NUMBERS without Victory. Agincourt. [At the battle of Agincourt there were probably ten times as many French as English. The men-at-arms of the former] wore heavy coats of steel reaching to their knees, and heavy leg armor. . . . The English archers, without armor, in jackets and loose hose, some even barefoot, went boldly on to meet the mailed chivalry. . . . The enormous numbers of the French were the chief cause of their destruction. . . . The rear divisions, after the overthrow of the first and second divisions, took to flight. In three hours this terrible fight was over. . . . The English loss was 1600. . . . Of the chivalry of France the flower perished. . . . Eight thousand gentlemen of France perished in that field of carnage, of whom 120 were nobles bearing banners. [See No. 471.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 4, p. 63.

3835. OATH of Allegiance. To Mahomet. Seventy-three men and two women of Medina held a solemn conference with Mahomet, his kinsman, and his disciples, and pledged themselves to each other by a mutual oath of fidelity. They promised, in the name of the city, that if he should be banished, they would receive him as a confederate, obey him as a leader, and defend him to the last extremity, like their wives and children. "But if you are recalled by your country," they asked, with a flattering anxiety, "will you not abandon your new allies?" "All things," replied Mahomet, with a smile, "are now common between us; your blood is as my blood, your ruin as my ruin. We are bound to each other by the ties of honor and interest. I am your friend and the enemy of your foes." "But if we are killed in your service, what," exclaimed the deputies of Medina, "will be our reward?" "Paradise," replied the prophet. "Stretch forth thy hand." He stretched it forth, and they reiterated the oath of allegiance and fidelity.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 126.

marry her to one of his chiefs, she has died within the year; would he have me send her corpse?"—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 186.

3837. OATH evaded. Romans. [Having been promised relief from their oppressions, they fought for their rulers; but the promise was broken.] The people, thus repeatedly and shamefully deceived, were determined to be no longer the dupes of promises. The Senate, apprehensive of their spirit, had ordered the consuls not to disband them, but to lead them without the walls, on pretence that the enemy were still in the field. The soldiers, at the time of their enrolment, took an oath not to desert their standards till they were formally disbanded; but this oath they eluded by taking their standards along with them.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 3, p. 315.

3838. OATH of Fidelity. Soldier's. [The Roman soldier.] On his first entrance into the service an oath was administered to him with every circumstance of solemnity. He promised never to desert his standard, to submit his own will to the commands of his leaders, and to sacrifice his life for the safety of the emperor and the empire. The attachment of the Roman troops to their standards was inspired by the united influence of religion and of honor. The golden eagle, which glittered in the front of the legion, was the object of their fondest devotion; nor was it esteemed less impious than it was ignominious to abandon that sacred ensign in the hour of danger.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 12.

3839. OATH, A horrible. Conspirators. [A conspiracy was formed to murder the Roman consuls.] The youths thus engaged were brought to confer with the Aquilii, and all agreed to take a great and horrible oath, by drinking together of the blood and tasting the entrails of a man sacrificed for that purpose. This ceremony was performed in the house of the Aquilii; and the room chosen for it (as it was natural to suppose) was dark and retired.—PLUTARCH'S PUBLICOLA.

3840. OATH, A sacred. Harold II. [Saxon king of England.] William [of Normandy] exacted more. He had caused all the bones and relics of saints that were preserved in the Norman monasteries and churches to be collected into a chest, which was placed in the council-room, covered over with a cloth of gold. On the chest of relics, which were thus concealed, was laid a missal. The duke then solemnly addressed his titular guest and real captive, and said to him, "Harold, I require thee, before this noble assembly, to confirm by oath the promises which thou hast made me, to assist me in obtaining the crown of England after King Edward's death, to marry my daughter Adela, and to send me thy sister, that I may give her in marriage to one of my barons." Harold, once more taken by surprise, and not able to deny his former words, approached the missal, and laid his hand on it, not knowing that the chest of relics was beneath. . . . When Harold rose from his knees the duke made him stand close to the chest, and took off the pall that had covered it, and showed Harold upon what holy relics he had sworn; and Harold was sorely alarmed at the sight. [See No. 3836.]—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 284.

3841. OATH, A test. Reign of Charles II. The terrors of popery were now revived, and the loudest complaints resounded from all quarters of the kingdom. A bill was brought into Parliament for imposing a test oath on all who should enjoy any public office. They were obliged to take the sacrament in the established church, and to abjure the doctrine of transubstantiation; and, in consequence of this new law, to which the king was obliged to give his consent, his brother James, Duke of York, lost his office of high admiral.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30, p. 421.

3842. OATHS, Strange estimate of. Jovius. By his advice and example [the Prætorian prefect] the principal officers of the State and army were obliged to swear that, without listening, in any circumstances, to any conditions of peace, they would still persevere in perpetual and implacable war against the enemy of the republic. This rash engagement opposed an insuperable bar to all future negotiation. The ministers of Honorius were heard to declare that if they had only invoked the name of the Deity, they would consult the public safety, and trust their souls to the mercy of Heaven; but they had sworn by the sacred head of the emperor himself; they had touched, in solemn ceremony, that august seat of majesty and wisdom; and the violation of their oath would expose them to the temporal penalties of sacrilege and rebellion.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 276.

3843. OBEDIENCE, Absolute. Carmathians. In a daring inroad beyond the Tigris, Abu Taher advanced to the gates of the capital with no more than 500 horse. By the special order of Moctader, the bridges had been broken down, and the person or head of the rebel was expected every hour by the commander of the faithful. His lieutenant, from a motive of fear or pity, apprised Abu Taher of his danger, and recommended a speedy escape. "Your master," said the intrepid Carmathian to the messenger, "is at the head of 80,000 soldiers; three such men as these are wanting in his host;" at the same instant, turning to three of his companions, he commanded the first to plunge a dagger into his breast, the second to leap into the Tigris, and the third to cast himself headlong down a precipice. They obeyed without a murmur. "Relate," continued the imam, "what you have seen; before the evening your general shall be chained among my dogs." Before the evening the camp were surprised, and the menace was executed. [The Carmathians were a fanatical tribe of Arabs.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 52, p. 324.

3844. OBEDIENCE, Angry. Black Prince. Accordingly, in January, 1369, [Charles V.] addressed a formal summons to [Edward the "Black Prince," and] the hero of Poitiers and Navarrete, citing him to appear before him in the court of peers, and answer the complaints and accusations of his Gascon vassals. "We will not fail," replied Edward, "to obey the order of the King of France; we will proceed to Paris, but it shall be with bassinet on our head; and 60,000 men to bear us company."—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 10, § 16.

3845. OBEDIENCE, Ministerial. Mahomet. [Mahomet was at one time almost universally reprobated.] He preached all day when every man, woman, and child flouted him as an impostor. One day he returned home silent, prostrated, discouraged, wrapped his head in his cloak, lay down upon a mat, and fell asleep. Inspiration, still more obstinate than the popular indifference, revisited him during his slumber. He heard a voice crying from his heart to him, "O thou who envelopest thyself in thy mantle to sleep, arise, and go preach." He arose with the day, and went out to preach as if he had the day before made a harvest of converts.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 80.

3846. ———. Nathan Bangs. [When Rev. Nathan Bangs, D.D.,] was a young preacher, he became despondent because of the numerous difficulties he experienced and the absence of desired success, and resolved to abandon the ministry. A significant dream relieved him. He thought he was working with a pickaxe on the top of a basaltic rock. His muscular arm brought down stroke after stroke for hours, but the rock was hardly indented. He said to himself at last, "It is useless; I will pick no more." Suddenly a stranger of dignified mien stood by his side and spoke to him. "You will pick no more?" "No more." "Were you not set to this task?" "Yes." "And why abandon it?" "My work is vain; I make no impression on the rock." Solemnly the stranger replied, "What is that to you? Your duty is to pick, whether the rock yields or not. Your work is in your own hands; the result is not. Work on!" He resumed his task. The first blow was given with almost superhuman force, and the rock flew into a thousand pieces. He awoke, pursued his way back with fresh zeal and energy, and a great revival followed. From that day he never had even a "temptation" to give up his commission.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 3, p. 485.

3847. OBEDIENCE, Monkish. Egyptian. The actions of a monk, his words, and even his thoughts, were determined by an inflexible rule, or a capricious superior; the slightest offences were corrected by disgrace or confinement, extraordinary fasts, or bloody flagellation; and disobedience, murmur, or delay were ranked in the catalogue of the most heinous sins. A blind submission to the commands of the abbot, however absurd, or even criminal, they might seem, was the ruling principle, the first virtue of the Egyptian monks; and their patience was frequently exercised by the most extravagant trials. They were directed to remove an enormous rock; assiduously to water a barren staff that was planted in the ground, till, at the end of three years, it should vegetate and blossom like a tree; to walk into a fiery furnace, or to cast their infant into a deep pond; and several saints, or madmen, have been immortalized in monastic story by their thoughtless and fearless obedience.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 37, p. 529.

3848. OBEDIENCE, Outward. Loyalty. [In 1691 James II. was urged by the loyal Highlanders who had continued in arms for him after the accession of William of Orange to send them re-enforcements. His Majesty replied that] his abilities to assist were exhausted by the pressing necessities of Ireland. If they could stand out no longer he recommended "an outward compliance."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 9, p. 132.

3849. OBEDIENCE, Perfect. Aboubeker. Aboubeker, the successor of Mahomet, before pursuing along to Lebanon and the sea his mission and his conquest, wrote to Amrou, one of the most submissive of his disciples ; he ordered him to levy a number of warriors among the tribes, and to conduct them to Damascus, to swell the torrent of Islamism. Amrou, who governed in peace his shepherd tribes, received this order with pain ; but he did not hesitate to obey. "I am," said he, in his answer to the caliph, "one of the arrows of Islamism ; God has placed the bow in thy hand ; it is for thee to launch the arrow to what destination thou mayest choose."

—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 165.

3850. OBSCURITY desired. Napoleon. [When Louisiana was ceded to the United States by France,] the upright and conscientious Marbois . . . was especially anxious . . . that no ambiguous clauses should be introduced into the treaty. He communicated his troubles on this point to the First Consul, advising him that it seemed impossible to construct the treaty so as to free it from obscurity on the important matter of boundaries. Far from exhibiting any sympathy with his faithful minister's solicitude on this point, Bonaparte quietly informed him that "if an obscurity did not already exist, it would perhaps be good policy to put one in the treaty. . . . The acquisition of Spanish America may have been expected, or at least dreamed of by him.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 10.

3851. OBSERVATION, Acute. Blacksmith. [Charles II. was seeking to escape to France.] This secret, so long and miraculously kept, was only in danger of being betrayed at the moment when the young king, still disguised, was flying toward the coast to place the seas between his head and the sword of Cromwell. His horse having loosened a shoe, a farrier to whom he applied to fasten it, with the quick intelligence of his trade, examined the iron, and said, in a low and suspicious tone, "These shoes were never forged in this country, but in the north of England." But the smith proved as discreet and faithful as the servant. Charles, remounting his horse without discovery, galloped toward the beach, where a skiff was waiting for him. The Continent a second time protected him from the pursuit of Cromwell.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 54.

3852. OBSTINACY, Depraved. Appetite. [Cardinal Wolsey said of Henry VIII. when on his death-bed :] Rather than he will miss or want any part of his will or appetite, he will put the loss of one half of his realm in danger. . . . I have often kneeled before him in his privy chamber on my knees the space of an hour or two, to persuade him from his will and appetite, but I could never bring to pass to dissuade him therefrom.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 17, p. 279.

3853. OBSTINACY, Extraordinary. James II. It is probable a motion for opening a negotiation with James would have been made in the Convention, and would have been supported by the great body of Tories, had he not been on this, as on every other occasion, his own worst enemy. Every post which arrived from Saint Germain brought intelligence which damped the ardor of his adherents. He did not think it worth his while to simulate regret for his past errors, or to promise amendment. He put forth a manifesto telling his people that it had been his constant care to govern them with justice and moderation, and that they had been cheated into ruin by imaginary grievances. The effect of his folly and obstinacy was that those who were most desirous to see him restored to his throne on fair conditions felt that, by proposing at that moment to treat with him, they should injure the cause which they wished to serve.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 567.

3854. OBSTINACY, Immovable. James II. The obstinate and imperious nature of the king gave great advantages to those who advised him to be firm, to yield nothing, and to make himself feared. His mode of arguing, if it is to be so called, was one not uncommon among dull and stubborn persons, who are accustomed to be surrounded by their inferiors. He asserted a proposition ; and as often as wiser people ventured respectfully to show that it was erroneous, he asserted it again, in exactly the same words, and conceived that, by doing so, he at once disposed of all objections. "I will make no concessions," he often repeated ; "my father made concessions, and he was beheaded."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 57.

3855. OBSTINACY, Political. James II. On the great day on which the bishops [who refused to join the king in the overthrow of the Protestant Church] were acquitted, and on which the invitation was despatched to the Hague [inviting William, Prince of Orange, to invade England,] James returned from Hounslow to Westminster in a gloomy and agitated mood. He made an effort that afternoon to appear cheerful ; but the bonfires, the rockets, and, above all, the waxen popes who were blazing in every quarter of London, were not likely to soothe him. . . . Soon it began to be clear that defeat and mortification had only hardened the king's heart. The first words which he uttered when he learned that the objects of his revenge had escaped him were, "So much the worse for them." Within a week these words, which he, according to his fashion, repeated many times, were fully explained. He blamed himself, not for having prosecuted the bishops, but for having prosecuted them before a tribunal where questions of fact were decided by juries, and where established principles of law could not be utterly disregarded even by the most servile judges.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 385.

3856. OBSTRUCTION, Legislative. On the Land Act. A few senators, who retained their senses, saw the uselessness of the opposition, and retired. Bibulus was of duller and tougher metal. As the vote was about to be taken, he and his tribesmen rushed to the rostra. The tribunes pronounced their veto. Bibulus said that he had consulted the sky ; the gods forbade further action being taken that day, and he declared the assembly dissolved. Nay, as if a man like Cæsar could be stopped by a shadow, he proposed to sanctify the whole remainder of the year, that no further business might be transacted in it. Yells drowned his voice. The mob rushed upon the steps ; Bibulus was thrown down, and the rods of the licitors were broken ; the tribunes who had betrayed their order were beaten.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 13.

3857. OCCUPATION, Changes in. Peter Cooper. At first blush, this frequent change of business would seem to indicate instability of purpose. He was thirty-three years old when he bought the glue factory, and had been in business for himself nine years, changing from carriage-maker to woollen-carder, and from woollen-carder to inventor, then becoming a cabinet-maker, only to continue the business one year, when he sold out to open a grocery store, continuing it only twelve months, and finally sold out this business to carry on a glue factory. Six changes in nine years have very seldom made anybody rich, but the proof of his wisdom was evident enough, for every movement was for the better. He had been steadily increasing his accumulations. This last change was to be permanent.—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 16.

3858. OCEAN God's Barrier, The. A Saracen. [In the conquest of Africa they reached the Atlantic.] The career, though not the zeal, of Akbah was checked by the prospect of a boundless ocean. He spurred his horse into the waves, and raising his eyes to heaven, exclaimed, with the tone of a fanatic, "Great God! if my course were not stopped by this sea, I would still go on, to the unknown kingdoms of the West, preaching the unity of thy holy name, and putting to the sword the rebellious nations who worship any other gods than Thee." Yet this Mohammedan Alexander, who sighed for new worlds, was unable to preserve his recent conquests.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 242.

3859. OCEAN, Enchanted by the. Alexander. At last Alexander, after having spent full nine months in coming down the rivers, arrived at the ocean, where, gazing with the utmost eagerness upon that vast expanse of waters, he imagined that this sight, worthy of so great a conqueror as himself, greatly overpaid all the toils he had undergone, and the many thousand men he had lost to arrive at it. He then offered sacrifices to the gods, and particularly to Neptune; threw into the sea the bulls he had slaughtered, and a great number of golden cups.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 16.

3860. ODIUM, Accidental. Earl of Strafford. Encouraged by these experiments of their power [in reforming legislative abuses], a heavier blow was yet meditated against the sovereign [Charles I.] in the impeachment of his favorite minister. . . . By a concurrence of accidents this nobleman labored under the odium of all the three nations of the British empire. The Scots regarded him as the adviser of all the measures obnoxious to that country; the Irish, whom he had governed as lord lieutenant, had found him extremely arbitrary; and with the English, at least the Parliamentary leaders, it was sufficient cause of hatred that, having begun public life as an assertor of popular claims, he had in maturer age become the chief friend and counsellor of the king.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 29, p. 402.

3861. ODIUM braved, John Adams. One of the most honorable actions of his life was defending the British soldiers who participated in what is called the "Boston Massacre." An altercation having arisen between the soldiers and some of the town's people, it ended in the soldiers firing upon the crowd, as they alleged, in self-defence. Being put upon their trial for murder, John Adams braved the obloquy of defending them. It was honorable to the people of Boston that they should have recognized the right of those soldiers, odious as they were, to a fair trial, and respected the motives of their favorite in volunteering to defend them.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 176.

3862. ODORS cleansed. Scotch. Perhaps the most curious item memorializing the famous conflict is in the [Worcester] corporation records, with reference to the poor Scotch soldiers: "Paid for pitch and rosin to perfume the Hall after the Scots, two shillings." Indeed, that fine old Hall needed perfuming and cleansing, for it was drenched with blood, but rather the blood of the English than the Scotch; for it was within its walls that the English Cavaliers made a last and desperate resistance, and they were all cut to pieces or made prisoners. This was the last and great decisive conflict; the defeat of Worcester settled the royal cause [of Charles I.], and doomed it, with its chief and his adherents, to banishment, until the strong victor who had scattered the royal rabble at Worcester should himself be conquered by death.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 13, p. 168.

3863. ODORS, Dangerous. Smell of Camels. The Arabs disdained the naked bravery of their ancestors. Instead of wagons, they were attended by a long train of camels, mules, and asses; the multitude of these animals, whom they bedecked with flags and streamers, appeared to swell the pomp and magnitude of their host; and the horses of the enemy were often disordered by the uncouth figure and odious smell of the camels of the East. Invincible by their patience of thirst and heat, their spirits were frozen by a winter's cold, and the consciousness of their propensity to sleep exacted the most rigorous precautions against the surprises of the night.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53, p. 370.

3864. OFFICE, Annoyance in. Romans. Pompey did not think it beneath him to appear at the levee of Cicero. The custom was to wait in the vestibule or ante-chamber till the great man made his appearance; to pay him some compliment, couched either in wishes for his health or panegyric on his talents, or congratulation on any promotion which might have occurred, and afterward to accompany him—either walking in his train, or attending by the side of his litter—to the senate-house or to the forum, and thence to reconduct him home. The lower ranks and the more servile and parasitical courtiers, who had many such visits to pay, must have necessarily begun very early in the morning. Juvenal humorously describes them as setting out by starlight, and does not even give them time to tie their garters. These visits Pliny calls ante-lucana officia. They were sometimes so troublesome to the great man to whom they were paid, that it was not unusual for him to go out by a back door, and so give his visitors the slip.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 4, p. 444.

3865. OFFICE, Appointment to. By James II. He now proclaimed that he had only been too gracious when he had condescended to ask the assent of the Scottish estates to his wishes. There was a Scottish Act of Supremacy which gave to the sovereign such a control over the Church as might have satisfied Henry VIII. Accordingly, papists were admitted in crowds to offices and honors. The Bishop of Dunkeld, who, as a lord of Parliament, had opposed the government, was arbitrarily ejected from his see, and a successor was appointed. Queensberry was stripped of all his employments, and was ordered to remain at Edinburgh till the accounts of the treasury during his administration had been examined and approved. As the representatives of the towns had been found the most unmanageable part of the Parliament, it was determined to make a revolution in every burgh throughout the kingdom. A similar change had recently been effected in England by judicial sentences, but in Scotland a simple mandate of the prince was thought sufficient. All elections of magistrates and of town councils were prohibited, and the king assumed to himself the right of filling up the chief municipal offices.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 116.

3866. OFFICE, Changes in. Turks. In the Ottoman Empire . . . it is esteemed a rule of excellent policy to make frequent changes in these offices. Removal, therefore, is often practised without cause of discontent; but as this arbitrary change might convert a friend into a dangerous enemy, there is most commonly a sufficient cause alleged for sending the degraded officer a bowstring along with the order for his dismission.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 13, p. 213.

3867. OFFICE, Conditions for. Reign of James II. The president of the college [Magdalene] died. One of the fellows, Doctor Thomas Smith, popularly nicknamed Rabbi Smith, a distinguished traveller, book-collector, antiquary, and Orientalist, . . . aspired to the vacant post. . . . He had long been intimately acquainted with Parker, Bishop of Oxford, and hoped to obtain by the interest of that prelate a royal letter to the college. Parker promised to do his best, but soon reported that he had found difficulties. "The king," he said, "will recommend no person who is not a friend to his Majesty's religion. What can you do to pleasure him as to that matter?" Smith answered that, if he became president he would exert himself to promote learning, true Christianity, and loyalty. "That will not do," said the bishop. "If so," said Smith, manfully, "let who will be president; I can promise nothing more."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 266.

3868. OFFICE declined. Royalty. At length Cromwell, with much reluctance, was obliged to refuse that dignity which he most anxiously desired, and had taken such uncommon measures to attain. To console him for his mortifying disappointment, the Parliament confirmed his title of Protector, to which they added a perpetual revenue, and the right of appointing his successor. They gave him authority likewise to name a house of peers, and he issued writs to sixty members, among whom were five or six of the old nobility, some gentlemen of family and fortune, and the rest officers who had risen from the meanest professions. But none of the old nobility would deign to accept of a seat in this motley assembly; and by naming so many of his friends to sit in the upper house, the Protector found he had lost the majority in the House of Commons, which now began to dispute and oppose all his measures. Enraged at his disappointment, he hastily dissolved this Parliament, as he had done several of the preceding.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30, p. 417.

3869. OFFICE, Dislike for. Amurath II. the Turk. The sultan, Amurath II, was a prince of a singular character. No man was better qualified to increase the grandeur of his empire, and no one was so fond of a life of quiet and retirement. He twice resigned the crown, and was twice prevailed on by his bashaws and janizaries to resume it. A most solemn treaty had been concluded, in the year 1444, between him and Ladislaus, King of Poland; and on the faith of this treaty, which gave peace to his dominions, Amurath had devoted his days to retirement and the study of philosophy, leaving the government in the hands of his son Mahomet.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 13, p. 209.

3870. OFFICE, Embarrassments in. Abraham Lincoln. No one of his predecessors, not even Washington, encountered difficulties of equal magnitude, or was called to perform duties of equal responsibility. He was first elected by a minority of the popular vote, and his election was regarded by a majority of the people as the immediate occasion, if not the cause, of civil war; yet upon him devolved the necessity of carrying on that war, and of combining and wielding the energies of the nation for its successful prosecution.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 21, p. 715.

3871. OFFICE by Favoritism. Duke of Buckingham. The demerits and defects of Buckingham, now especially, became daily more obvious, and roused in the minds of all noble Englishmen growing indignation. We have already spoken of the ascent of this man to power—it is unlike anything in our history: he simply had the grace and beauty of a woman, without a woman's prescience and tact. He delighted in dependents and suitors, never got beyond the court, and could not understand the people. He could not comprehend that the reign of favorites was passed, and the reign of statesmen begun; and that, as Eliot says, "the old genius of the kingdom is reawakening." Having very little of the statesman himself, he seems to have looked with covetous eye and hand on the gains of the buccaneer, while utterly unpossessed of the buccaneer's grasp and strength.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 3, p. 61.

3872. OFFICE, Honorary. John Howard. In the year 1773 John Howard was appointed high sheriff of the county of Bedfordshire, in which he resided. In England the sheriffs are appointed by the king, and he usually selects one of the leading gentlemen or noblemen of the county, who holds the office one year. The disagreeable duties of the place are performed by under-sheriffs. Twice a year the high sheriff, clad in showy robes of his office, rode out of town in his carriage, and escorted to the town-hall, amid the pealing of bells, the judges who came to hold the semi-annual court; and in the evening he gave a ball, which was attended by the judges, the lawyers, and the principal families of the county. He also occasionally entertained at dinner the gentlemen of the neighborhood; and these were all the duties which custom and public opinion demanded of the high sheriff. As he received no salary, and the office involved considerable expense, it was never bestowed except upon a man of wealth.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 41.

3873. OFFICE honored. Emperor Trajan. Trajan himself, amid the duties of sovereignty, enjoyed the greatest happiness which could belong to a private station. He walked through the streets of Rome, without guard or attendant, as a private individual, more secure in the love and affection of his subjects than in the strength of an imperial retinue. He lived with his friends on terms of the most familiar intercourse; he shared in all their amusements; and there was between them an interchange of every kind and affectionate duty. Such was the virtuous and venerable Trajan, whose character so justly merited the surname universally given him, Trajanus Optimus. He died at the age of sixty-three, after a reign of nineteen years, a period during which Rome may be said to have been truly happy.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 496.

3874. OFFICE, Love of. Reign of James II. To the applause of the sincere friends of the Established Church [late lord treasurer] Rochester had, indeed, very slender claims. To save his place, he had sat in that tribunal which had been illegally created for the purpose of persecuting her. To save his place, he had given a dishonest vote for degrading one of her most eminent ministers, had affected to doubt her orthodoxy, had listened with the outward show of docility to teachers who called her schismatical and heretical, and had offered to co-operate strenuously with her deadliest enemies in their designs against her. The highest praise to which he was entitled was this, that he had shrunk from the exceeding wickedness and baseness of publicly abjuring, for lucre, the religion in which he had been brought up, which he believed to be true, and of which he had long made an ostentatious profession.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 144.

3875. ———. Reign of James II. [Being illegally appointed by the king on the Board of High Commissions] Rochester, disapproving and murmuring, consented to serve. Much as he had to endure at court, he could not bear to quit it. Much as he loved the Church, he could not bring himself to sacrifice for her sake his white staff, his patronage, his salary of £8000 a year, and the far larger indirect emoluments of his office. He excused his conduct to others, and perhaps to himself, by pleading that, as a commissioner, he might be able to prevent much evil, and that, if he refused to act, some person less attached to the Protestant religion would be found to replace him. . . . The king offered Rochester a simple choice, to pronounce the bishop [Compton] guilty, or to quit the treasury. Rochester was base enough to yield.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 89.

3876. OFFICE purchased. Emperor Claudius. At the time when Caligula was put to death, Claudius, his uncle, and the brother of Germanicus, a man whose weak and childish disposition had never cherished an ambitious thought, had concealed himself in a corner of the palace for fear of assassination. A soldier accidentally discovering his retreat, saluted him emperor. While Claudius was tremblingly begging his life to be spared, some others coming up, they put him in a litter and carried him to the camp of the prætorian guards. There, as yet afraid, and uncertain of his fate, he promised to each of the soldiers a large gratification, and received in return their oaths of allegiance. The people approved the choice, and the Senate was obliged to confirm it. Thus was the empire bought for the first time—a practice which we shall see become in future extremely common. Claudius at the age of fifty was still a child; his countenance was that of an idiot, and his mind, naturally weak, had never received the smallest tincture of education.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 484.

3877. ———. Sylla. He got himself elected prætor, partly by his assiduities, and partly by his money. While he bore that office, he happened to be provoked at Cæsar, and said to him, angrily, "I will use my authority against you." Cæsar answered, laughing, "You do well to call it yours, for you bought it."—PLUTARCH'S SYLLA.

3878. OFFICE, Qualifications for. Roman. According to the laws of Rome, her first magistrate was required to be a doctor of laws, an alien, of a place at least forty miles from the city, with whose inhabitants he must not be connected in the third canonical degree of blood or alliance. The election was annual; a severe scrutiny was instituted into the conduct of the departing senator; nor could he be recalled to the same office till after the expiration of two years. A liberal salary of 3000 florins was assigned for his expense and reward; and his public appearance represented the majesty of the republic.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 70, p. 505.

3879. OFFICE, Resignation of. Shameful. Vitellius, within a few months of his succession, saw himself reduced to the alternative of resigning the empire, or of dying like his predecessor. He chose the former, and immediately concluded a shameful treaty with Sabinus, the brother of Vespasian, then præfect of Rome, by which he saved his life, obtaining, in return for his resignation of the empire, the liberty of retiring to Campania, with a considerable yearly pension. This treaty the dastardly emperor read himself to the people, crying all the while like a child. He then submissively prepared to strip himself of all the ensigns of authority. The spirit of the citizens was roused at this self-degradation. They compelled him to return to his palace, and attacked the party of Sabinus, who retired to the Capitol.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 491.

3880. ———. Farceical. After having established an appearance of order in the several departments of the State, Augustus, to complete the farce, affected a wish to abdicate his authority, and return to the rank of a private citizen; but this was a piece of gross affectation. He consulted Mæcenas, however, and Marcus Agrippa, whether he ought to follow his inclination. . . . This seeming moderation, however, increased the popularity of Augustus, and even paved the way for an extension of his power.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 477.

3881. ———. Policy. In the seventh year of his consulate Augustus again pretended a desire to abdicate, and he actually informed the Senate that he had resigned all authority; but he was now secure of the consequences of this avowal. From those mercenary voices which had, no doubt, been behind the scenes, well trained to this hypocritical farce, there was now one universal cry of supplication, entreating him not to abandon that republic which he had preserved from destruction, and whose existence depended on his paternal care. "Since it must be so," said he, "I accept the empire for ten years, unless the public peace and tranquillity shall permit me before that time to seek that ease and retirement which I so passionately desire." . . . The tenth year, the period which he had appointed for laying down his authority, had now arrived. He accordingly did so, and at the earnest entreaty of the people again resumed it; and so fond does he appear to have been of this solemn farce, that five times in the course of his government he amused the nation with this empty pageantry of their pretended power.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 479.

3882. — — — Sylla. Sylla took another step which excited universal surprise—he resigned the dictatorship. The man who had destroyed above 100,000 of his fellow-citizens—who, in the course of his proscriptions, had put to death about 90 senators and above 2600 Roman knights—had courage to resign the absolute authority he had acquired, to become a private citizen, and to offer to give an account to the public of his conduct. But he had gained partisans to his interest more powerful, if not so numerous as his enemies; . . . and, above all, he was the idol of the army, who had all along profited by his measures and gained by his indulgence; he had given freedom to 10,000 slaves, and had gratified by rewards all his partisans. These were his guardians, and enabled him to walk with the security of an innocent man in that city which he had deluged with blood.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1, p. 79.

3883. OFFICE, Rich Men for. Carthaginians. Aristotle has noted two circumstances as defects in the constitution of this republic: the one, that it was lawful for the same individual to exercise different offices of state at the same time; the other, that the poor were excluded from holding all offices of importance in the commonwealth. But the former of these may be found expedient and even necessary in the best-regulated governments, and the latter appears to be agreeable to the soundest policy; for in offices of high trust poverty might often prove too powerful an incitement to a deviation from duty.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 8, p. 358.

3884. OFFICE, Rotation in. Thebans. Edipus had two sons, Eteocles and Polynices, to whom jointly he bequeathed the sovereignty of Thebes. Instead of dividing the kingdom, they agreed to govern it year after year alternately. Eteocles, at the expiration of his term, refusing to sign, Polynices solicited the aid of Adrastus, king of Argus, who espoused his cause, engaged several of the princes of Greece to assist him, and marched against the Thebans with a powerful army. They retreated before the enemy, and betook themselves to their city, which Adrastus immediately took measures for assailing. This is the first siege mentioned in Grecian history. . . . Thebes, after a long siege, gave no hopes of surrender; both parties became tired of the war, and it was at length agreed to terminate it by a single combat between the rival brothers, Eteocles and Polynices—an issue for the quarrels of sovereign princes which the humane reader of history will often find reason to wish had been more frequently resorted to. The brothers fought under the walls of Thebes, and were both killed.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 8, p. 75.

3885. — — — Bite Deeper. [Cromwell said:] New statesmen, like fresh flies, bite deeper than those which were chased away before them.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 20, p. 324.

3886. OFFICE, Sale of. Prison-Warden. The warden of the Fleet [one of the London prisons for debtors] enjoyed a patent office, to be purchased by a large payment to some minister of the crown. John Huggins gave £5000 to Lord Clarendon for his patent. [It was made profitable by the fees paid. Huggins sold his patent to others,] who made £811 4s. per annum for lodging the prisoners; by the commitment and dismissal fees, £766 18s. 8d.; by liberty of rules, £1500; by chaplains' fees, which they farmed out upon a small payment to the chaplain, £813 16s.; by rents of various premises, £740, making a total of £4632 18s. 8d. per annum.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 4, p. 64.

3887. OFFICE, Seekers for. Abraham Lincoln. When the South was threatening civil war, and armies of officer-seekers were besieging him in the Executive Mansion, he said . . . he wished he could get time to attend to the Southern question; . . . but the office-seekers demanded all his time. "I am," said he, "like a man so busy in letting rooms in one end of his house, that he can't stop to put out the fire that is burning in the other."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 720.

3888. — — — Abraham Lincoln. A new levy of troops required . . . the appointment of a large additional number of brigadier- and major-generals. Among the immense number of applications, Mr. Lincoln came upon one wherein the claims of a certain worthy (not in the service at all) "for a generalship" were set forth. But the applicant did not specify whether he wanted to be brigadier- or major-general. . . . The clerk, on receiving the paper again, found written across its back, "Major-general, I reckon. Abraham Lincoln."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 749.

3889. OFFICE, Selection for. Grecian Empire. His principal officers having held a council upon his [Alexander's] death, it was agreed that the crown should be conferred on Aridæus, who took the name of Philip; and it was resolved that the child of Roxana, if a son, should share the empire with him. She was soon after delivered of a son, who was named Alexander, and whose right was accordingly acknowledged. This settlement of the empire jointly upon a weak man and an infant was the result of the jealousy of the principal officers, who could not agree upon the choice of any one of themselves, while each thought he had an equal claim with his competitors. Those of the most moderate ambition would have been contented with the sovereignty of some of the provinces, while others aimed at an undivided empire.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4, p. 195.

3890. OFFICE, Spoils of. Reign of James II. The sumptuous palace to which the populace of London gave the name of Dunkirk House, the stately pavilions, the fish-ponds, the deer-park, and the orangery of Euston, the more than Italian luxury of Ham, with its busts, fountains, and aviaries, were among the many signs which indicated what was the shortest road to boundless wealth. This is the true explanation of the unscrupulous violence with which the statesmen of that day struggled for office, of the tenacity with which, in spite of vexations, humiliations, and dangers, they clung to it, and of the scandalous compliances to which they stooped in order to retain it.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 289.

3891. OFFICE, Terror in. Emperor Augustus. With this daily augmentation of power, he was not without continual alarms for his personal safety. He was naturally timid, and the fate of Caesar was ever before him. For a considerable time he never went to the senate-house without a suit of armor under his robe; he carried a dagger in his girdle, and was always surrounded by ten of the bravest of the senators, on whose attachment he could thoroughly depend.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 477.

3892. OFFICE unconditioned. William of Orange. [A convention of the houses of Parliament were discussing the question of claimant of the vacant throne.] He had hitherto, he said, remained silent; he had used neither solicitation nor menace; he had not even suffered a hint of his opinions or wishes to get abroad; but a crisis had now arrived at which it was necessary for him to declare his intentions. He had no right and no wish to dictate to the convention. All that he claimed for himself was the privilege of declining any office which he felt that he could not hold with honor to himself and with benefit to the public. . . . A strong party was for a regency. . . . Another party was for placing the princess [his wife, the daughter of King James II.] on the throne, and for giving to him, during her life, the title of king, and such a share in the administration as she might be pleased to allow him. He could not stoop to such a post. He esteemed the princess as much as it was possible for man to esteem woman; but not even from her would he accept a subordinate and a precarious place in the government. He was so made that he could not submit to be tied to the apron-strings even of the best of wives. He did not desire to take any part in English affairs; but if he did consent to take a part, there was one part only which he could usefully or honorably take. If the estates offered him the crown for life, he would accept it. If not, he should, without repining, return to his native country.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 597.

3893. OFFICE undesired. Cromwell. The following is a very characteristic letter to his son-in-law, and seems to admit us, in a very clear manner, into the mind of the Protector on this subject: "Whitehall, 22d June, 1655. To the Lord Fleetwood, Lord-Deputy of Ireland: Dear Charles—I write not often; at once I desire thee to know I most dearly love thee; and, indeed, my heart is plain to thee, as thy heart can well desire. . . . It's reported that you are to be sent for, and Harry to be deputy; which, truly, never entered into my heart. The Lord knows my desire was for him and his brother to have lived private lives in the country; and Harry knows this very well, and how difficultly I was persuaded to give him his commission for his present place. This I say as from a simple and sincere heart. The noise of my being crowned, etc., are similar malicious figments."—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 15, p. 188.

3894. OFFICE, Unfitted for. John Adams. Appointed to go abroad as one of the ambassadors representing the infant nation at Paris; but never was there a man less at home in a court, or less adapted by nature for a diplomatist. He neither understood nor respected the people among whom he lived, and whom he was required to gratify and conciliate. At the same time he was curiously destitute of all that we call tact, while he was possessed with a vanity the most egregious that ever blinded a man of real worth and ability. He offended the French ministry; he perplexed Dr. Franklin, who was one of the greatest diplomatists that ever lived, as well as one of the most honest and simple; he excited the ridicule of French people. In a word, he was out of place in France, and rendered his country little service there and less honor.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 177.

3895. OFFICE, Unmerited. Naval. In 1666 John Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave, at seventeen years of age, volunteered to serve at sea against the Dutch. He passed six weeks on board, diverting himself, as well as he could, in the society of some young libertines of rank, and then returned home to take the command of a troop of horse. After this he was never on the water till the year 1672, when he again joined the fleet, and was almost immediately appointed captain of a ship of eighty-four guns, reputed the finest in the navy. He was then twenty-three years old, and had not, in the whole course of his life, been three months afloat. As soon as he came back from sea he was made colonel of a regiment of foot. This is a specimen of the manner in which naval commands of the highest importance were then given, and a favorable specimen; for Mulgrave, though he wanted experience, wanted neither parts nor courage.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 281.

3896. — — —. Greek Emperor. [While monarch of the Eastern empire] Isaac [Angelus] slept on the throne, and was awakened only by the sound of pleasure; his vacant hours were amused by comedians and buffoons, and even to these buffoons the emperor was an object of contempt; his feasts and buildings exceeded the examples of royal luxury; the number of his eunuchs and domestics amounted to twenty thousand; and a daily sum of four thousand pounds of silver would swell to four millions sterling, the annual expense of his household and table. His poverty was relieved by oppression; and the public discontent was inflamed by equal abuses in the collection and the application of the revenue.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 60, p. 56.

3897. OFFICE, Unsought. Abubeker. After a reign of two years the aged caliph was summoned by the angel of death. In his testament, with the tacit approbation of his companions, he bequeathed the sceptre to the firm and intrepid virtue of Omar. "I have no occasion," said the modest candidate, "for the place." "But the place has occasion for you," replied Abubeker, who expired with a fervent prayer that the God of Mahomet would ratify his choice, and direct the Mussulmans in the way of concord and obedience.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 154.

3898. OFFICER detested, An. Lord Clarendon. When the Dutch fleet was in the Thames, it was against the chancellor that the rage of the populace was chiefly directed. His windows were broken, the trees of his garden cut down, and a gibbet set up before his door. But nowhere was he more detested than in the House of Commons.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 183.

3899. OFFICER dishonored, Lord Clarendon. [His predecessor, Tyrconnel, had more influence with the government than the incumbent of the office. The lord-lieutenant of Ireland] found himself a subordinate member of that administration of which he had expected to be the head. He complained that whatever he did was misrepresented by his detractors, and that the gravest resolutions touching the country which he governed were adopted at Westminster, made known to the public, discussed at coffee-houses, communicated in hundreds of private letters some weeks before one hint had been given to the lord-lieutenant. His own personal dignity, he said, mattered little; but it was no light thing that the representative of the majesty of the throne should be made an object of contempt to the people.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 129.

3900. OFFICER, Treacherous. Against Columbus. To insure regularity and despatch in the affairs relative to the new world, they were placed under the superintendence of Juan Rodriguez de Fonseca, archdeacon of Seville, who was . . . finally appointed patriarch of the Indies. . . . Enjoying the perpetual though unmerited favor of the sovereigns, he maintained the control of Indian affairs for about thirty years. He must undoubtedly have possessed talents for business, to insure him such a perpetuity of office; but he was malignant and vindictive; and in the gratification of his private resentments not only heaped wrongs and sorrows upon the most illustrious of the early discoverers, but frequently impeded the progress of their enterprises, to the great detriment of the crown. This he was enabled to do privately and securely by his official situation. . . . He deserves to be held up as a warning example of those perfidious beings in office who too often lie like worms at the root of honorable enterprise, blighting, by their unseen influence, the fruits of glorious action, and disappointing the hopes of nations.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 5, ch. 8.

3901. OFFICERS, Surplus of. Abraham Lincoln. Some gentlemen were once finding fault with the President because certain generals were not given commands. "The fact is," replied Mr. Lincoln, "I have got more pegs than I have holes to put them in."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 749.

3902. OFFICIALS, Contemptible, British Colonies. [The Duke of Newcastle, minister of British America for twenty-four years,] would gratify his connections in the aristocratic families of England by intrusting the royal prerogative to men of broken fortunes, dissolute and ignorant, too vile to be employed near home, so that America became the hospital of Great Britain for its decayed members of Parliament and abandoned courtiers. Of such officers the conduct was sure to provoke jealous distrust and to justify perpetual opposition.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 1.

3903. OFFICIALS, Superlative. Constantine's. A thousand barbers, a thousand cup-bearers, a thousand cooks, were distributed in the several offices of luxury; and the number of eunuchs could be compared only with the insects of a summer's day. The monarch who resigned to his subjects the superiority of merit and virtue was distinguished by the oppressive magnificence of his dress, his table, his buildings, and his train. The stately palaces erected by Constantine and his sons were decorated with many colored marbles and ornaments of massy gold. The most exquisite dainties were procured to gratify their pride, rather than their taste; birds of the most distant climates, fish from the most remote seas, fruits out of their natural season, winter roses, and summer snows. The domestic crowd of the palace surpassed the expense of the legions; yet the smallest part of this costly multitude was subservient to the use, or even to the splendor, of the throne. The monarch was disgraced and the people was injured by the creation and sale of an infinite number of obscure and even titular employments; and the most worthless of mankind might purchase the privilege of being maintained, without the necessity of labor, from the public revenue. The waste of an enormous household, the increase of fees and perquisites, which were soon claimed as a lawful debt, and the bribes which they extorted from those who feared their enmity, or solicited their favor, suddenly enriched these haughty menials.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 22, p. 396.

3904. OFFICIOUSNESS, Offensive. Reign of Charles I. [The Earl of Strafford's] attacks upon the illegalities of the last two years were as brave as before: the state of maritime affairs—the suspension and violation of statutes. With much condemnation, however, a vote of five subsidies was granted to the king; but the time when the collection was to be made or the bill introduced was not mentioned. The House immovably resolved that both were to depend on the good faith of the king. It was the greatest grant ever made in Parliament. The secretary, on behalf of the king, proceeded to thank the House, but coupled thanks of Buckingham [himself] with thanks of the king. Sir John Eliot leaped up, and taxed Mr. Secretary with intermingling a subject's speech with the king's message: "In that House they knew of no other distinction but that of king and subjects." Whereupon many of the House made exclamation, "Well spoken, Sir John Eliot!"—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 3, p. 72.

3905. OMENS, Ancient. Romans. Livy says: "At Falerium the sky was seen to open, and in the void space a great light appeared. The lots at Præneste shrunk of their own accord, and one of them dropped down, whereon was written, 'Mars brandisheth his sword.'" These lots were bits of oak, handsomely wrought, with some ancient characters inscribed upon them. When any came to consult them, the coffer in which they were kept was opened, and a child, having first shaken them together, drew out one from the rest, which contained the answer to the querist's demand. As to the lots being shrunk, which Livy mentions, and which was considered as a bad omen, no doubt the priests had two sets, a smaller and a greater, which they played upon the people's superstition as they pleased. Cicero says they were very little regarded in his time.—PLUTARCH'S LIVES, LANGHORNE'S NOTE.

3906. OMENS, Annoyed by. Charles I. [When Charles I. was on trial, he was leaning upon his staff, which had a golden head. It broke off on a sudden, and he confessed to the Bishop of London that it made a great impression upon him. He was beheaded.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 7, p. 107.

3907. OMENS, Presage of. Romans. Now divination we know with some certainty to have been adopted by the Romans from the Etruscans. Among that people everything was construed into a presage; not only the extraordinary phenomena of nature, as thunder, lightning, the aurora borealis, or the like, but the most insignificant actions or accidents, such as sneezing, meeting with an animal, slipping a foot, or any of the most common occurrences of life. Among an ignorant and rude nation everything is attributed to a supernatural agency; but the Etruscans were not a rude nation, and therefore we can assign this natural propensity only to their love of those national habits which they had derived from a remote antiquity. To a superstitious people, when presages do not offer of themselves, it is a very natural step to go and seek them. The sacrifice of victims presented often different appearances, according to the accidental state of the animal at the time it was killed. The priests employed in the sacrifice, being best acquainted with those appearances, are naturally consulted as to their interpretation. Thus they acquire the reputation of superior wisdom and foresight, and the augur and aruspe become an established profession.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 1, p. 289.

3908. OMENS, Terrorized by. Sailors. [Columbus was on his third voyage in the West Indies.] Great numbers of sharks, so abundant and ravenous in these latitudes, were seen about the ships. This was construed into an evil omen; for among the superstitions of the seas it is believed that these voracious fish can smell dead bodies at a distance; that they have a kind of presentiment of their prey, and keep about vessels which have sick persons on board, or which are in danger of being wrecked. Several of these fish they caught, using large hooks fastened to chains, and sometimes baited merely with a piece of colored cloth.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 14, ch. 6.

3909. ONE, Encouragement by. Valerius. So great, indeed, was the slaughter, that . . . each army having a near view of their own loss, and only guessing at that of the enemy, were inclined to think themselves vanquished, rather than victorious. When night came on, . . . and both camps were hushed in silence and repose, it is said that the grove shook, and a loud voice proceeding from it declared that the Tuscans had lost one man more than the Romans. The voice was undoubtedly divine; for immediately upon that the Romans recovered their spirits, and the field rang with acclamations; while the Tuscans, struck with fear and confusion, deserted their camp, and most of them dispersed. As for those that remained, who were not quite 5000, the Romans took them prisoners, and plundered the camp. When the dead were numbered, there were found on the side of the Tuscans 11,300, and on that of the Romans as many excepting one.—PLUTARCH'S PUBLICOLA.

3910. ONE, Power of. Christian. "The Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge" and also "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts" [were both established about 1698, mainly by one admirable man, Dr. Thomas Bray].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 13, p. 206.

3911. OPINION disguised. Charles II. [When Charles II. had been defeated at the battle of Worcester and was fleeing toward France, disguised as a serving-man accompanied by his mistress, who rode behind him, the king's horse cast a shoe. "What news?" said the serving-man to the smith.] "None since the beating of these rogues, the Scots; didn't hear that rogue Charles Stuart had been taken yet." [Charles thought that rogue ought to be hanged, and the smith applauded him as an honest man for his opinion.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 54, ch. 9, p. 142.

3912. OPINION, Growth of. American Independence. [May, 1776] Washington, at New York, freely and repeatedly delivered his opinion: "A reconciliation with Great Britain is impracticable, and would be in the highest degree detrimental to the true interest of America; when I first took the command of the army I abhorred the idea of independence; but I am now fully convinced that nothing else will save us." [Public opinion was affected in the same way.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 65.

3913. OPINION, Popular. Erroneous. [See No. 6223, Zeal Unrewarded.] The cry of the whole nation was that an imposture had been practised. Papists had, during some months, been predicting, from the pulpit and through the press, in prose and verse, in English and Latin, that a Prince of Wales would be given to the prayers of the Church; and they had now accomplished their own prophecy. Every witness who could not be corrupted or deceived had been studiously excluded. Anne had been tricked into visiting Bath. The primate had, on the very day preceding that which had been fixed for the villainy, been sent to prison in defiance of the rules of law and of the privileges of peerage. Not a single man or woman who had the smallest interest in detecting the fraud had been suffered to be present. The queen had been removed suddenly and at the dead of night to Saint James' Palace, because that palace, less commodious for honest purposes than Whitehall, had some rooms and passages well suited for the purpose of the Jesuits. There, amid a circle of zealots who thought nothing a crime that tended to promote the interests of their church, and of courtiers who thought nothing a crime that tended to enrich and aggrandize themselves, a newborn child had been introduced into the royal bed, and then handed round in triumph as heir of the three kingdoms.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 337.

3914. ——. Powerful—Resisting the British Taxes. "We will have homespun markets of linens and woollens," passed from mouth to mouth, till it found its way across the Atlantic, and alarmed the king in council; "the ladies of the first fortune shall set the example of wearing homespun."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 14.

3915. ——. Resisted. [The Puritans had forbidden the celebration of Christmas in England as a popish institution. See No. 851, Christmas Changed.] On the next anniversary of the festival formidable riots broke out in many places. The constables were resisted, the magistrates insulted, the houses of noted zealots attacked, and the proscribed service of the day openly read in the churches.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 152.

3916. OPINION, Prejudice of. History. To Southey, Cromwell was hypocritical, always looking out for himself; he was conscious of a guilty ambition, he knew that he was doing wrong through the whole process of the struggle. He felt that he was a traitor, he knew that monarchy, aristocracy, and episcopacy were essential to the well-being of the country; he overthrew them, and yet he sought in some sense to retain their images, although he had got rid of the things. He committed a great crime, he attained to the possession of sovereign power by means little less guilty than Macbeth; but he dared not take the crown, and he dared not confer it upon the young Charles Stuart, because he knew the young man would never forgive his father's death, and if he could he would be altogether unworthy to wear his father's crown. What would not Cromwell have given, says Southey, whether he looked to this world or the next, if his hands had been clean of the king's blood! Such, in brief, was the portrait it pleased Robert Southey to portray! such was his theory of Cromwell's life.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 1, p. 11.

3918. OPINIONS subsidized. Cicero's. [Cæsar desired to be consul.] Cicero, though present in Rome, had taken no part, and looked on in despair. The "good" were shocked at Pompey's precipitation. They saw that a civil war could end only in a despotism. "I have not met one man," Cicero said, "who does not think it would be better to make concessions to Cæsar than to fight him. Why fight now? Things are no worse than when we gave him his additional five years, or agreed to let him be chosen consul in his absence. You wish for my opinion. I think we ought to use every means to escape war. But I must say what Pompey says. I cannot differ from Pompey."—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 20.

3919. OPINIONS, Character in. Cromwell's Home. It is given to us to see something of their home during the period of about ten years that Cromwell remained in quietude and seclusion. The spectacle of that home, the interior of it, is very amusing to Hume and sundry other historians; for it would seem that there was prayer there, and the singing of hymns and spiritual songs, and the reading of Scripture, and comments, and even preachings, thereon. All this, to a man of Hume's character, was most laughable and inexpressibly comic.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 43.

3920. OPINIONS, Conceited. Jefferson Davis. The rush of men to the battle-field . . . in every part of the South was beyond all former example; and if the Government had met this mighty movement of the people with a corresponding amplitude of provision and organization, the cause of the South might have been reckoned safe beyond peradventure. Unfortunately President Davis was not the man to consult the sentiment and wisdom of the people; he desired to signalize the infallibility of his own intellect in every measure of the revolution, and to identify, from motives of vanity, his own personal genius with every event and detail of the remarkable period of history in which he had been called upon to act. This imperious conceit seemed to swallow up every other idea in his mind.—POL-LARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 11, p. 265.

3921. OPINIONS, Diverse. Of Cromwell. Cromwell's letters have all at length been discovered and bound together, and their publication has been the best vindication of the consistent integrity and healthful whole-heartedness of the man. According to Carlyle, the faith of Cromwell never rested on any doubtful or insecure foundations. Whoever else might forsake him, hope and faith never deserted him. He never consented to take part in any public affairs upon any compulsion less strong than that of conscience. He was guided by superior instinct and the practical good sense of a man set apart by God to govern. He had no premeditated plan or programme to which to conform. On the other hand, his principles were never to seek. He saw the drift of circumstances, but he was nevertheless to guide them, to use and control them, for the good of all. He had no personal ambition; he was distracted by no fear, dazzled by no honor. Southey's Cromwell was full of penitence for his treason against Charles. Forster's was full of penitence for his treason against the republican cause. Guizot's Cromwell was full of sorrow on account of his failure in clutching at sovereignty and founding a dynasty. The real Cromwell, according to Carlyle, has no penitence of any kind, no sorrow, save for the sorrow and sin, the sad heirlooms of our race. He was the great champion of the Puritan cause, a sworn soldier to defend the rights of civil and spiritual freedom; not to protect the interests of a party, but, so far as he could, to throw a shield over all, having only a zeal for what he honestly believed to be God's truth, one of those rare souls who could lay upon itself the lowliest and the loftiest duties ; a dutiful son ; for a large part of his life a quiet country gentleman ; a tender husband, a tender father ; a daring political leader ; a great soldier ; a man who knew men, and who could, as in his dealings with the subtle Mazarin, while preserving his own integrity, twist subtle statesmen to his pleasure ; at last a powerful sovereign, so living, praying, dying ; no hypocrite, no traitor, but a champion and martyr of the Protestant and Puritanical faith. Such is the Cromwell of Thomas Carlyle, and such the Cromwell of [Paxton Hood].—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 1, p. 14.

3922. OPINIONS, Erratic. John Milton. Upon the points which interested him most closely, Milton knew that his understanding of the text differed from the standard of Protestant orthodoxy. That God created matter, not out of nothing, but out of Himself, and that death is, in the course of nature, total extinction of being, though not opinions received, were not singular. More startling is his assertion that polygamy is not, in itself, contrary to morality, though it may be inexpedient. More offensive to the religious sentiment of his day would have been his vigorous vindication of the free-will of man against the reigning Calvinism, and his assertion of the inferiority of the Son in opposition to the received Athanasianism.—MILTON, BY M. PATRISON, ch. 12.

3923. OPINIONS, Infallible. John Milton. Whatever he thought, Milton thought and felt intensely, and expressed emphatically ; and even his enemies could not accuse him of a shadow of inconsistency or wavering in his principles. On the contrary, tenacity, or persistence of idea, amounted in him to a serious defect of character. A conviction once formed dominated him, so that, as in the controversy with Morus, he could not be persuaded that he had made a mistake. No mind, the history of which we have an opportunity of intimately studying, could be more of one piece and texture than was that of Milton from youth to age.—MILTON, BY M. PATRISON, ch. 11.

3925. OPPORTUNITY, Awaiting. Cromwell. The only traces of the presence of Cromwell in the House of Commons for ten years, which the parliamentary annals retain, are a few words spoken by him, at long intervals, in defence of his brethren, the puritanic missionaries, and in attack of the dominant Anglican Church and the Roman Catholics, who were again struggling for supremacy. It might be seen, from the attention paid by his colleagues to the sentences uttered with such religious fervor by the representative of Huntingdon, that this gentleman farmer, as restrained in speech as in his desire of popularity, was treated in the House with that consideration which is always shown in deliberative assemblies to those men who are modest, sensible, silent, and careless of approbation, but faithful to their cause.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 19.

3926. OPPORTUNITY, Last. James II. If only national animosity could be allayed, there could be little doubt that religious animosity, not being kept alive, as in England, by cruel penal acts and stringent test acts, would of itself fade away. To assuage a national animosity such as that which the two races inhabiting Ireland felt . . . was a work to which a wise and good prince might have contributed much, and James would have undertaken that work with advantages such as none of his predecessors or successors possessed. At once an Englishman and a Roman Catholic, he belonged half to the ruling and half to the subject caste, and was therefore peculiarly qualified to be a mediator between them. . . . Having done this, he should have labored to reconcile the hostile races to each other by impartially protecting the rights and restraining the excesses of both. He should have punished with equal severity the native who indulged in the license of barbarism and the colonist who abused the strength of civilization.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 124.

3928. OPPORTUNITY overlooked. Christina. [The daughter of the great Augustus Adolphus.] At a solemn assembly of the States, in the year 1654, she made a formal resignation of the government in his favor [Charles Gustavus]. She set out immediately, in man's apparel, for Rome, but soon after left that city for Paris, which she ever afterward distinguished as her principal place of residence. The conduct of this singular woman has been variously judged of ; she herself thought it glorious—and her panegyrist, Voltaire, holds it forth as much to her honor—that she preferred living with men who could think, to the government of a people without literature. But how much nobler would it have been for this philosophic queen to have bestowed her attention on the introduction among her subjects of those sciences which tend to the good of mankind! It was an evidence of a little soul to reproach those with ignorance, or barbarism, whom it should have been her study, as it was her duty, to have cultivated and improved. It was not, therefore, surprising that a woman, whose conduct was evidently regulated more by caprice than by a sound understanding, should repent of the step she had taken, and wish to resume that government she had abdicated.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 34, p. 456.

3929. OPPORTUNITY, Provisional. *Purchase of Louisiana. The United States, in consequence of favoring circumstances growing out of European complications and the bold and complete statesmanship of Jefferson, obtained a territory larger in area than that which was wrested from the British crown by the Revolutionary war [for $15,000,000]. It seems scarcely credible that the acquisition of Louisiana by Jefferson was denounced with a bitterness surpassing the partisan rancor with which later generations have been familiar. No abuse was too malignant, no epithet too coarse, no imprecation too savage to be employed by the assailants of the great philosophic statesman who laid so broad and deep the foundations of the country's growth and grandeur.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 8.

3930. OPPORTUNITY, Waiting for. *"Make me come." It was reported that when Pompeius Silo, an officer of the greatest eminence and authority among the allies, said to Marius, "If you are a great general, Marius, come down and fight us," he answered, "If you are a great general, Silo, make me come down and fight."—PLUTARCH'S MARIUS.

3931. OPPOSITION, Benefits of. *Christianity. The Christian doctrines were not more vigorously combated by the secular arm than by the pens of the heathen philosophers. Porphyry, a Syrian by birth, and a man of great abilities, wrote a long and most laborious work against Christianity; and Philostratus, one of the most eminent rhetoricians of that age, contrived a new method of attack, which was by drawing artful comparisons between the life and doctrines of Christ and those of the ancient philosophers. These attacks, however, were, on the whole, rather serviceable than dangerous to the cause of Christianity, since they excited the zeal and abilities of many of the ablest Fathers of the Church to defend its doctrines, and oppose, by their writings, the malevolent efforts of its enemies. The works of Origen, of Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria, and of Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, are read at this day with much pleasure and profit; and at the time they were written contributed, in a most eminent degree, to the advancement of religion.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 4, p. 6.

3932. OPPOSITION of Folly. *Street Lights. Heming's scheme was enthusiastically applauded and furiously attacked. The friends of improvement extolled him as the greatest of all the benefactors of his city. What, they asked, were the boasted inventions of Archimedes when compared with the achievement of the man who had turned the nocturnal shades into noon-day? In spite of these eloquent eulogies, the cause of darkness was not left undefended. There were fools in that age who opposed the introduction of what was called the new light as strenuously as fools in our age have opposed the introduction of vaccination and railroads, as strenuously as fools of an age anterior to the dawn of history doubtless opposed the introduction of the plough and of alphabetical writing.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 337.

3933. OPPOSITION, Help by. *Persecution. In 1670, when the act against conventicles was being re-enacted, for the overthrow of Nonconformists, Waller, the wit of the House of Commons, said of the Dissenters: "These people are like the children's tops: whip them, and they stand up; let them alone, and they fall."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 19, p. 310.

3934. OPPOSITION, Impolitic. *Taxation. We may observe that in this last effort to preserve their expiring freedom the Romans, from the apprehension of a tribute, had raised Maxentius to the throne. He exacted that tribute from the Senate under the name of a free gift. They implored the assistance of Constantine. He vanquished the tyrant, and converted the free gift into a perpetual tax.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 14, p. 484.

3935. OPPOSITION, Political. *President Tyler. The next measure—a favorite scheme of the Whigs—was the rechartering of the Bank of the United States. The old charter had expired in 1836, but the bank had continued in operation under the authority of the State of Pennsylvania. Now a bill to recharter was brought forward and passed. The President interposed his veto. Again the bill was presented in a modified form, and received the assent of both Houses, only to be rejected by the executive. By this action a final rupture was produced between the President and the party which had elected him. The indignant Whigs, baffled by a want of a two-thirds majority in Congress, turned upon him with storms of invective. All the members of the cabinet except Mr. Webster resigned, and he retained his place only because of a pending difficulty with Great Britain.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 16, p. 441.

3936. OPPOSITION, prepared. Politics. [Cæsar sought advancement to the consulship.] The Senate had made up their minds to fight the battle. If Cæsar went to the assembly, Bibulus, their second consul, might stop the proceedings. If this seemed too extreme a step, custom provided other impediments to which recourse might be had. Bibulus might survey the heavens, watch the birds, or the clouds, or the direction of the wind, and declare the aspects unfavorable; or he might proclaim day after day to be holy, and on holy days no legislation was permitted. Should these religious cobwebs be brushed away, the Senate had provided a further resource in three of the tribunes whom they had bribed. Thus they held themselves secure, and dared Cæsar to do his worst. Cæsar on his side was equally determined.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 13.

3937. OPPOSITION, Proof by. *Samuel Johnson. His "Taxation No Tyranny" being mentioned, he said, "I think I have not been attacked enough for it. Attack is the reaction; I never think I have hit hard unless it rebounds." BOSWELL: "I don't know, sir, what you would be at. Five or six shots of small arms in every newspaper, and repeated cannonading in pamphlets, might, I think, satisfy you."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 244.

3938. OPPOSITION useless. Goths. The troops of Colias and Suerid expected the approach of the great Fritigern [the leader of the revolted Goths], ranged themselves under his standard, and signalized their ardor in the siege of Hadrianople. But the resistance of the garrison informed the barbarians that in the attack of regular fortifications the efforts of unskilful courage are seldom effectual. Their general acknowledged his error, raised the siege, declared that "he was at peace with stone walls," and revenged his disappointment on the adjacent country.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26, p. 39.

3939. OPPRESSION, Dangerous. "Don't tread on me." Gadsden [of South Carolina, in 1776] presented the standard . . . to be used by the American navy, representing, in a yellow field, a rattlesnake of thirteen full-grown rattles, coiled to strike, with the motto, "Don't tread on me."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 62.

3940. OPPRESSION, Governmental. Speech. [In 1795 Parliament passed a bill giving one magistrate the power of dispersing any assembly, if in his single judgment the language of the speakers was calculated to bring the Government into contempt;] and if twelve persons remained together for one hour after being ordered to disperse, the offenders were to be judged felons, without benefit of clergy.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 18, p. 324.

3941. OPPRESSION by Ignorance. Reign of James II. A.D. 1683. Culpepper and his council had arraigned a printer for publishing the laws, and ordered him to print nothing till the king's pleasure was known. . . . The best proof which Charles II. had given of his interest in Virginia was the express instruction to allow no printing-press on any pretence whatever. The rule was continued under James II.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 14.

3942. OPPRESSION resisted. Taxation of Henry VIII. In every county a tenth was demanded from the laity and a fourth from the clergy by the royal commissioners. But the demand was met by a general resistance. . . . A revolt actually broke out among the weavers of Suffolk; the men of Cambridge banded for resistance; the Norwich clothiers, though they yielded at first, soon threatened to rise. "Who is your captain?" the Duke of Norfolk asked the crowd. "His name is Poverty," was the answer, "for he and his cousin Necessity have brought us to this doing." There was, in fact, a general strike of the employers. Cloth-makers discharged their workers, farmers put away their servants. "They say the king asketh so much that they be not able to do as they have done before this time." Such a peasant insurrection as was raging in Germany was only prevented by the unconditional withdrawal of the royal demand.—GREEN'S ENG. PEOPLE, § 539.

3943. OPPRESSION, Royal. William the Conqueror. One of the most oppressive measures of William the Conqueror was the enactment of the forest laws. He reserved to himself the exclusive privilege of killing game throughout all England, and enacted the most severe penalties on all who should attempt it without his permission. Not satisfied with this severe and most impolitic measure, William, to gratify his passion for the chase, laid waste a country of about fifty miles in circuit, drove out all the inhabitants, and threw down the villages, and even churches, to make the New Forest in Hampshire; thus exterminating at once above one hundred thousand inhabitants, many of whom perished from famine. It is not, therefore, without reason that Lord Lyttelton remarks that Attila himself did not more justly deserve to be named the Scourge of God than this merciless Norman. It was this severe restriction of the forest laws—this mark of servitude—that, above every other circumstance, lay heavy on the English, and, in the reign of the succeeding prince, excited at length those vigorous efforts which produced the most favorable concessions for the general liberty.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 8, p. 134.

3944. OPPRESSION, Scandalous. Ireland. A.D. 1763. Such was the Ireland of the Irish—a conquered people, whom the victors delighted to trample upon, and did not fear to provoke. Their industry within the kingdom was prohibited by law, and then they were calumniated as naturally idle. Their savings could not be invested on equal terms in trade, manufactures, or real property, and they were called improvident. The gates of learning were shut on them, and they were derided as ignorant. In the midst of privations they were cheerful. Suffering for generations under acts which offered bribes to treachery, their integrity was not debauched: no son rose against his father, no friend betrayed his friend. Fidelity to their religion, to which afflictions made them cling more closely, chastity, and respect for the ties of family, remained characteristics of the down-trodden race. . . . Relief was to come through the conflicts of the North American colonies with Great Britain.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 4.

3945. ORACLE corrupted. Athenian. The Macedonian loudly complained of the Athenians as having first commenced hostilities; and the artful dissembler [Philip], still further to preserve a show of moderation, requested a renewal of the peace. A negotiation for that purpose was prolonged by him for two years. Demosthenes still raised his voice for war. It was upon this occasion that the Athenians having consulted the Delphian oracle, which advised them to make peace, Demosthenes, in an animated harangue, openly insinuated that the oracle was corrupted, by declaring that the Pythia Philippized. The eloquence of the orator prevailed over the counsel of the hireling priestess, and the Athenians took the field in great force, joined by the Thebans and their other allies.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3, p. 174.

3946. ORACLE, Deceptive. Grecian. A hollow oak in the forest of Dodona, in which it was possible for a man to conceal himself while the aperture was artfully closed up, was likewise famous for its oracles, and the imposture was no doubt equally beneficial to its priests and attendants. These were commonly men of some art, who had ingenuity enough to frame equivocal answers to the questions that were put to them; and if the inquirer gave such construction to the response as was most agreeable to himself, it was generally possible for the priests to construe it according to the event. Strange! that men should ever believe that if the Deity should stoop to hold intercourse with his creatures, he would use the mean tricks and subterfuges of a juggler. Yet these oracles of the Greeks were for many ages in high reputation, and had extensive political consequence.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 7, p. 65.

3947. ———. Delphic. A cavern at the foot of Mount Parnassus, near Delphi, was remarkable for exhaling a mephitic vapor, which, like that of the Grotto del Cani in Italy, had the effect of stupefying and slightly convulsing any person who came within its atmosphere. Some ingenious men had the address to turn this natural phenomenon to their own advantage and the profit of the neighborhood. A temple was built on the spot to Apollo, the god of divination. A priestess was procured whom habit soon enabled to undergo the experiment without danger; the raving expressions which the priests probably instructed her to utter, and which they interpreted as they thought fit, were received by the people as oracles, and her visible convulsions gave ample testimony to their being the effect of inspiration.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 7, p. 65.

3948. ORACLE, Equivocal. Delphic. Such was the state of Persia when Philip prepared for his great enterprise by sending his lieutenants Attalus and Parmenio into Asia. As usual before all expeditions of importance, he consulted the Delphic oracle, and received the following response, equally applicable to the prosperous or unsuccessful event of the war: The bull is ready crowned; his end approaches, and he will soon be sacrificed. "The prophecy," said Philip, "is quite clear: the bull is the monarch of Persia." The prediction speedily found its accomplishment, but Philip himself was the victim.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3, p. 177.

3949. ORATOR, The great. Demosthenes. Demosthenes, the prince of the Grecian orators, . . . had no advantages of birth or education. His father, a sword-cutler, or, as Juvenal has termed him, a blacksmith, left him an orphan at the age of seven, to the care of profligate guardians, who robbed him of his small patrimony. But he possessed that native genius which surmounts every disadvantage of birth or situation. Ambition prompted him to the study of oratory; for, going one day to the court to hear the pleadings in some cause of moment, he was so impressed with the eloquence of Callistratus, and so fired by the popular applause bestowed on that orator upon his gaining the suit in which he had pleaded, that he determined from that moment that this should be his road to eminence and distinction. No man, in this arduous course, ever struggled with greater natural obstacles, or more happily overcame them. His voice was harsh and uncouth, his articulation indistinct, and his gestures awkward and constrained; but, sensible of his defects, he labored night and day in private exercises of elocution, till he completely subdued them; and then, confident of his powers, he broke forth at once the most distinguished orator of his age.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3, p. 171.

3950. ORATOR, Unsuccessful. Washington Irving. The new minister was called on to attend the dinner which the citizens of New York gave Dickens, at which it was decided that he must preside, and where he did preside, with much trepidation, making one of the shortest dinner speeches on record. "There," he said, as he concluded his broken sentences by proposing the health of Dickens, as the guest of the nation—"there! I told you I should break down, and I've done it."—STODDARD'S IRVING, p. 40.

3951. ORATORS, Dangerous. Soame Jenyns, [writing in favor of the Stamp-tax, said]: One method indeed has been hinted at, and but one, that might render the exercise of this power just and legal, which is the introduction of representatives from the several colonies into that body. But I have lately seen so many specimens of the great powers of speech of which these American gentlemen are possessed, that I should be afraid the sudden importation of so much eloquence at once would endanger the safety of England. It will be much cheaper for us to pay their army than their orators.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 11.

3952. ORATORY, Audience for. William Pitt. It was the great William Pitt, the great commoner, who had vanquished French marshals in Germany and French admirals on the Atlantic; who had conquered for his country one great empire on the frozen shores of Ontario, and another under the tropical sun near the mouths of the Ganges. It was not in the nature of things that popularity such as he at this time enjoyed should be permanent. That popularity had lost its gloss before his children were old enough to understand that their father was a great man. He was at length placed in situations in which neither his talents for administration nor his talents for debate appeared to the best advantage. The energy and decision which had eminently fitted him for the direction of war were not needed in time of peace. The lofty and spirit-stirring eloquence which had made him supreme in the House of Commons often fell dead on the House of Lords.—MACAULAY'S PITT, p. 1.

3953. ORATORY despised. Samuel Johnson. He would not allow much merit to Whitefield's oratory. "His popularity, sir," said he, "is chiefly owing to the peculiarity of his manner. He would be followed by crowds were he to wear a night-cap in the pulpit, or were he to preach from a tree."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 162.

3954. ORATORY disregarded. Pulpit. [In the middle of the eighteenth century the eloquence of the English clergy] was of the tamest character. A foreigner describes their sermons: "The pulpit declamation is a most tedious monotony. The ministers have chosen it through respect for religion, which, as they affirm, proves, defends, and supports itself without having any occasion for the assistance of oratory. With regard to the truth of their assertion, I appeal to themselves and to the progress which religion thus inculcated makes in England.”—KNIGHT’S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 110.

3955. ORATORY, Taste in. Samuel Johnson. Talking of oratory, Mr. Wilkes described it as accompanied with all the charms of poetical expression. JOHNSON: “No, sir; oratory is the power of beating down your adversary’s arguments, and putting better in their place.” WILKES: “But this does not move the passions.” JOHNSON: “He must be a weak man who is to be so moved.” WILKES (naming a celebrated orator): “Amid all the brilliancy of —’s imagination, and the exuberance of his wit, there is a strange want of taste. It was observed of Apelles’ Venus, that her flesh seemed as if she had been nourished by roses; his oratory would sometimes make one suspect that he eats potatoes and drinks whiskey.”—BOSWELL’S JOHNSON, p. 461.

3956. ORDERS, Conflicting. Captain Wadsworth. [In 1693] Fletcher, the Governor of New York, went to Hartford to assume command of the militia of the province. He bore a commission from King William, but by the terms of the charter the right of commanding the troops was vested in the colony itself. The general assembly refused to recognize the authority of Fletcher, who, nevertheless, ordered the soldiers under arms, and proceeded to read his commission as colonel. “Beat the drums!” shouted Captain Wadsworth, who stood at the head of the company. “Silence!” said Fletcher; the drums ceased, and the reading began again. “Drum! drum!” cried Wadsworth; and a second time the voice of the reader was drowned in the uproar. “Silence! Silence!” shouted the enraged governor. The dauntless Wadsworth stepped before the ranks and said, “Colonel Fletcher, if I am interrupted again I will let the sunshine through your body in an instant.” That ended the controversy. Benjamin Fletcher thought it better to be a living governor of New York than a dead colonel of the Connecticut militia.—RIDPATH’S U. S., ch. 21, p. 191.

3957. ORDERS neglected. Marshal Ney. Ney was ordered to advance immediately with 40,000 men and take possession of [Quatre-Bras, thereby preventing Blücher from re-enforcing Wellington with 130,000 men]. . . . Had Ney brought up his force to cut off the retreat of the Prussians, as Napoleon had ordered and expected, not one of the enemy would have escaped, and “Waterloo” would not have been. [Ney arrived near the place, and there rested his weary army by a short sleep, unsuspecting the activity of Blücher, who soon possessed it. Ney was so sure of it, he reported that] he was actually in possession.—ABBOTT’S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 27.

3958. ORDERS simple. Lord Nelson. [When Lord Nelson informed the commanders in his fleet of his plan for the battle of Trafalgar, he stated few signals would be given. One direction was worth many embarrassing orders:] No man could do wrong who placed his ship close alongside of that of the enemy.—KNIGHT’S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 25, p. 446.

3959. ORIGIN, Humble. John Bunyan. “I was of a low and inconsiderable generation, my father’s house being of that rank that is meanest and most despised of all families in the land.” “I never went to school, to Aristotle or Plato, but was brought up in my father’s house in a very mean condition, among a company of poor countrymen.” “Nevertheless, I bless God that by this door He brought me into the world to partake of the grace and life that is by Christ in His Gospel.” This is the account given of himself and his origin by a man whose writings have for two centuries affected the spiritual opinions of the English race in every part of the world more powerfully than any book or books, except the Bible.—FROUDE’S BUNYAN, ch. 1, p. 1.

3960. ORGANIZATION, Perfect. Society of Jesus. The establishment by Loyola was contemporary with the Reformation, the progress of which it was designed to arrest. . . . Its members were, by its rules, never to become prelates; . . . their vows were poverty, chastity, absolute obedience, and a constant readiness to go on missions against heresy or heathenism.—BANCROFT’S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 20.

3961. ORNAMENT, Love of. American Indians. The women . . . glittered with tufts of elk hair, brilliantly dyed in scarlet, and strings of the various kinds of shells were their pearls and diamonds. The summer garments of moose and deer skins were painted of many colors, and the fairest feathers of the turkey . . . were curiously wrought into mantles. The claws of the grizzly bear formed a proud collar for a war-chief, . . . the wing of a red-bird . . . decorated their locks. A warrior’s . . . skin was also tattooed with figures. . . . Some had the nose tipped with blue, the eyebrows, eyes, and cheeks tinged with black, and the rest of the face red. . . . When they made visits . . . they painted themselves gloriously.—BANCROFT’S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

3962. ORTHOGRAPHY excused. Napoleon I. “Do you write orthographically?” said he one day to his amanuensis at St. Helena. “A man occupied with public business cannot attend to orthography. His ideas must flow faster than his hand can trace. He has only time to place his points. He must compress words into letters and phrases into words, and let the scribes make it out afterward. . . .” His handwriting was composed of the most unintelligible hieroglyphics. He often could not decipher it himself.—ABBOTT’S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 5.

3963. OSTENTATION, Meritless. Demaratus. Demaratus, the Lacedæmonian, who was then at court, being ordered to ask a favor, desired that he might be carried through Sardis in royal state, with a diadem upon his head. But Mithropeustes, the king’s cousin-german, took him by the hand, and said, “Demaratus, this diadem does not carry brains along with it to cover; nor would you be Jupiter, though you should take hold of his thunder.” The king was highly displeased at Demaratus for making this request, and seemed determined never to forgive him; yet, at the desire of Themistocles, he was persuaded to be reconciled to him.—PLUTARCH.

3964. OSTENTATION, Oriental. Chosroes. [This Persian king had his] favorite residence of Artemita, or Dastagerd, . . . beyond the Tigris, about sixty miles to the north of the capital. The adjacent pastures were covered with flocks and herds; the paradise or park was replenished with pheasants, peacocks, ostriches, roebucks, and wild boars, and the noble game of lions and tigers was sometimes turned loose for the bolder pleasures of the chase. Nine hundred and sixty elephants were maintained for the use or splendor of the great king; his tents and baggage were carried into the field by 12,000 great camels and 8000 of a smaller size; and the royal stables were filled with 6000 mules and horses, among whom the names of Shebdiz and Barid are renowned for their speed or beauty. Six thousand guards successively mounted before the palace gates; the service of the interior apartments was performed by 12,000 slaves, and in the number of 3000 virgins, the fairest of Asia, some happy concubine might console her master for the age or the indifference of Sira. The various treasures of gold, silver, gems, silks, and aromatics were deposited in a hundred subterranean vaults; and the chamber Badaverd denoted the accidental gift of the winds which had wafted the spoils of Heraclius into one of the Syrian harbors of his rival. The vice of flattery, and perhaps of fiction, is not ashamed to compute the 30,000 rich hangings that adorned the walls; the 40,000 columns of silver, or more probably of marble, and plated wood, that supported the roof; and the thousand globes of gold suspended in the dome, to imitate the motions of the planets and the constellations of the zodiac.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 46, p. 463.

3965. OSTENTATION rebuked. Philotas. "My Son, be less." Among the Macedonians [who went with Alexander to Persia] Philotas, the son of Parmenio, had greater authority; for he was valiant and indefatigable in the field, but he... affected an ostentation of wealth and a magnificence in his dress and table that was above the condition of a subject. Beside, the loftiness of his port was altogether extravagant; not tempered with any natural graces, but formal and uncouth, it exposed him both to hatred and suspicion, inasmuch that Parmenio one day said to him, "My son, be less."—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

3966. OSTENTATION, Ruinous. Anthemius. The solemn inauguration of Anthemius [as emperor of Rome] was followed by the nuptials of his daughter and the patrician Ricimer; a fortunate event, which was considered as the firmest security of the union and happiness of the state. The wealth of two empires was ostentatiously displayed; and many senators completed their ruin by an expensive effort to disguise their poverty. All serious business was suspended during this festival; the courts of justice were shut; the streets of Rome, the theatres, the places of public and private resort, resounded with hymeneal songs and dances; and the royal bride, clothed in silken robes, with a crown on her head, was conducted to the palace of Ricimer, who had changed his military dress for the habit of a consul and a senator.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 36, p. 491.

3967. OSTENTATION, Vain of Romans. "But this native splendor," says Ammianus, "is degraded and sullied by the conduct of some nobles, who, unmindful of their own dignity, and of that of their country, assume an unbounded license of vice and folly. They contend with each other in the empty vanity of titles and surnames, and curiously select, or invent, the most lofty and sonorous appellations, Reburus or Fabunius, Pagonius or Tarasius, which may impress the ears of the vulgar with astonishment and respect. From a vain ambition of perpetuating their memory, they affect to multiply their likeness, in statues of bronze and marble; nor are they satisfied unless those statues are covered with plates of gold; an honorable distinction, first granted to Acilius the consul, after he had subdued, by his arms and counsels, the power of King Antiochus. The ostentation of displaying, of magnifying, perhaps, the rent-roll of the estates which they possess in all the provinces, from the rising to the setting sun, provokes the just resentment of every man, who recollects that their poor and invincible ancestors were not distinguished from the meanest of the soldiers by the delicacy of their food or the splendor of their apparel. But the modern nobles measure their rank and consequence according to the loftiness of their chariots and the weighty magnificence of their dress. Their long robes of silk and purple float in the wind; and as they are agitated, by art or accident, they occasionally discover the under garments, the rich tunics, embroidered with the figures of various animals. . . . If at any time, but more especially on a hot day, they have courage to sail, in their painted galleys, from the Lucrine Lake to their elegant villas on the sea-coast of Puteoli and Cayeta, they compare their own expeditions to the marches of Cæsar and Alexander.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 30, p. 224.

3968. OSTRACISM by Ballot. Athenians. The ostracism . . . was conducted in the following manner: every citizen took a piece of a broken pot, or a shell, on which he wrote the name of the person he wanted to have banished, and carried it to a part of the market-place that was enclosed with wooden rails. The magistrates then counted the number of the shells; and if it amounted not to six thousand, the ostracism stood for nothing; if it did, they sorted the shells, and the person whose name was found on the greatest number was declared an exile for ten years, but with permission to enjoy his estate.—PLUTARCH'S ARISTIDES.

3969. OSTRACISM, Evils of. Athenians. It was not requisite that a man should be accused of any crime to deserve the sentence of the ostracism. It was enough that any person, either from his wealth, his uncommon talents, or even his eminent virtues, should become an object either of envy or of public praise and admiration. When a citizen had arrived at that degree of credit as to fall under either of those descriptions, and to offend by too much popularity, any individual of the people might demand an ostracism. The ceremony was this: every citizen who chose took a shell or piece of tile, on which, having written the name of the person in his opinion the most obnoxious, he carried it to a certain place in the forum, which was enclosed with rails, and had ten gates, for ten tribes. Officers were appointed to count the number of shells; for if they were fewer than six thousand, the vote did not take place. . . . Thus we find, in the course of the history of this republic, that virtue, without the imputation or suspicion of ambitious views, was frequently the victim of this pernicious law. It was enough that Aristides by his virtues had merited the glorious epithet of just; that epithet, in the eyes of the Athenian people, was sufficient crime. When Aristides himself was passing by, an illiterate rustic requested him to write upon his shell the name of Aristides. Why, what harm, my friend, said the other, has Aristides done you? None in the world, replied the clown; but I hate to hear everybody call him the Just. Thucydides, from whom Athens had received the most eminent services, at length the victim of ostracism, composed in his exile that history in which he records the fame of his ungrateful country.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 10, p. 104.

3971. OUTRAGE, Horrible. Alboin. [The Lombard king, A.D. 573.] Alboin fell a sacrifice to domestic treason and female revenge. In a palace near Verona, which had not been erected for the barbarians, he feasted the companions of his arms; intoxication was the reward of valor, and the king himself was tempted, by appetite or vanity, to exceed the ordinary measure of his intemperance. After draining many capacious bowls of Rhetian or Falernian wine, he called for the skull of Cunimund, the noblest and most precious ornament of his side-board. The cup of victory was accepted with horrid applause by the circle of the Lombard chiefs. "Fill it again with wine," exclaimed the inhuman conqueror—"fill it to the brim: carry this goblet to the queen, and request in my name that she would rejoice with her father." In an agony of grief and rage, Rosamond had strength to utter, "Let the will of my lord be obeyed!" and, touching it with her lips, pronounced a silent imprecation, that the insult should be washed away in the blood of Alboin.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 45, p. 397.

3973. OUTRAGE resented. Parent. Appius [one of the decemviri], sitting in judgment in his tribunal, had cast his eyes upon a young woman of uncommon beauty, who daily passed through the forum, on her way to the public schools. Virginia, a maiden of fifteen years of age, was the daughter of a plebeian, a centurion, at that time absent with the army. Appius had been informed of her situation; she was betrothed to Icilius, formerly one of the tribunes, then serving against the enemy, and their marriage was to be celebrated as soon as the campaign was at an end; an obstacle which served only to increase the passion of this flagitious magistrate, who determined, at all hazards, to secure her as his prey. After many fruitless attempts to corrupt the fidelity of those domestics to whom Virginius had left the charge of his daughter (for she had lost her mother), Appius devised a scheme which he thought could not fail to put Virginia entirely within his power. He employed Marcus Claudius, one of his dependents, an infamous and shameless man, to claim the young woman as his own property. Marcus pretended that she was the daughter of one of his female slaves, who had sold her when an infant to the wife of Virginius, who had no children. He therefore pretended to reclaim what was his own, and attempted by force to carry her home to his house. [Her father returned from the army to protect her. He proved her parentage.] Appius was not to be thus foiled. With the most unparalleled effrontery, he stood forth as a witness as well as a judge, declaring that it was consistent with his own knowledge that the plea of Marcus was true. He therefore gave his final sentence, that the slave should be delivered up to her lawful master, and ordered his officers to enforce, without delay, the execution of his decree. The soldiers were removing the crowd, and Marcus, together with the lictors, was advancing to seize Virginia, who clung for protection around the neck of her father. "There is," said he, "but one way, my dear child, to save thy honor and preserve thy liberty." Then seizing a knife from the stall of a butcher—"Thus," said he, striking her to the heart—"thus I send thee to thy forefathers, unpolluted and a free woman." Then turning to the tribunal of Appius, "Thou monster!" cried he, "with this blood I devote thy head to the infernal gods!" Appius, in a transport of rage, called out to the lictors to seize Virginius; but he, rushing out from the forum, and making way for himself with the knife which he held in his hand, while the multitude favored his escape, got safe without the city, and arrived in a few hours at the camp.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 5, p. 337.

3974. PAGANISM injurious. Vice. The pagan religion had no influence toward refining or improving the morals of mankind. The only attributes which distinguished the heathen gods from the race of ordinary men were their power and their immortality. They were endowed with the same passions as human creatures, and those distinguishing attributes of power and immortality served, in general, only to extend the measure and the enormity of their vices. The example of their gods was, therefore, an incentive to vice instead of virtue; and those rites with which many of them were worshipped, and which were conceived to be peculiarly acceptable to them, were often the grossest violations not only of decency but of humanity.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 1, p. 1.

3975. PAGANISM overthrown. By Alaric. The songs of Homer and the fame of Achilles had probably never reached the ear of the illiterate barbarian; and the Christian faith, which he had devoutly embraced, taught him to despise the imaginary deities of Rome and Athens. The invasion of the Goths, instead of vindicating the honor, contributed, at least accidentally, to extirpate the last remains of paganism; and the mysteries of Ceres, which had subsisted eighteen hundred years, did not survive the destruction of Eleusis and the calamities of Greece.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 30, p. 195.

3976. PAINTER, Celebrated. Reynolds. Sir Joshua Reynolds was the first Englishman who added the praise of the elegant arts to the other glories of his country.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 4, p. 67.

3977. PAINTING illustrates. Samuel Johnson. When I observed to him that painting was so far inferior to poetry that the story, or even emblem which it communicates, must be previously known, and mentioned, as a natural and laughable instance of this, that a little miss, on seeing a picture of Justice with the scales, had exclaimed to me, "See, there's a woman selling sweetmeats;" he said, "Painting, sir, can illustrate, but cannot inform."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 530.

3978. PALACE, A humble. Tartars. The houses of the Tartars are no more than small tents, of an oval form, which afford a cold and dirty habitation for the promiscuous youth of both sexes. The palaces of the rich consist of wooden huts, of such a size that they may be conveniently fixed on large wagons, and drawn by a team perhaps of twenty or thirty oxen.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26, p. 7.

3979. PANIC by Contraction. Financial. In the first year of Van Buren's administration the country was afflicted with a monetary panic of the most serious character. The preceding years had been a time of great prosperity. The national debt was entirely liquidated, and a surplus of nearly $40,000,000 had accumulated in the treasury of the United States. By act of Congress this vast sum had been distributed among the several States. Owing to the abundance of money, speculations of all sorts grew rife. The credit system pervaded every department of business. The banks of the country were suddenly multiplied to nearly seven hundred. Vast issues of irredeemable paper money stimulated the speculative spirit and increased the opportunities for fraud. The bills of these unsound banks were receivable at the land offices, and settlers and speculators made a rush to secure the public lands while money was plentiful. Seeing that in receiving such an unsound currency in exchange for the national domain the Government was likely to be defrauded out of millions, President Jackson had issued an order called the Specie Circular, by which the land agents were directed henceforth to receive nothing but coin in payment for the lands. The effects of this circular came upon the nation in the first year of Van Buren's administration. The interests of the Government had been secured by Jackson's vigilance, but the business of the country was prostrated by the shock. The banks suspended specie payment; mercantile houses failed, and disaster swept through every avenue of trade. During the months of March and April, 1837, the failures in New York and New Orleans amounted to about $150,000,000. A committee of business men from the former city besought the President to rescind the specie circular and to call a special session of Congress. The former request was refused and the latter complied with; but not until the executive was driven by the distresses of the country.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 55, p. 337.

3981. ———, England. In September and October [of 1847] there had been such a pressure upon the merchants and traders as had not been experienced since the great panic of 1825. Mercantile houses in London of the highest eminence suspended their payments. Corresponding disasters occurred at Manchester, Liverpool, and Glasgow. All the usual accommodation in the money market was at an end. In October the alarm spread into a general panic: the crash of eminent houses in London went on; in the country not only mercantile firms but banks were failing; the funds fell rapidly; the exchequer bills were at a high rate of discount.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 30, p. 552.

3982. PANIC, Needless. Reign of Charles II. [The infamous Titus Oates announced a Popish plot.] The capital and the whole nation went mad with hatred and fear. The penal laws, which had begun to lose something of their edge, were sharpened anew. Everywhere justices were busied in searching houses and seizing papers. All the jails were filled with papists. London had the aspect of a city in a state of siege. The train-bands were under arms all night. Preparations were made for barricading the great thoroughfares. Patrols marched up and down the streets. Cannon were planted round Whitehall. No citizen thought himself safe unless he carried under his coat a small ball loaded with lead to brain the popish assassins.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 219.

3983. PANIC, Night of. Flight of James II. Just at this time arose a whisper which swelled fast into a fearful clamor, passed in an hour from Piccadilly to White Chapel, and spread into every street and alley of the capital. It was said that the Irish whom Feversham had let loose were marching on London, and massacring every man, woman, and child on the road. At one in the morning the drums of the militia beat to arms. Everywhere terrified women were weeping and wringing their hands, while their fathers and husbands were equipping themselves for fight. Before two the capital wore a face of stern preparedness which might well have daunted a real enemy, if such an enemy had been approaching. Candles were blazing at all the windows. The public places were as bright as at noonday. All the great avenues were barricaded. More than 20,000 pikes and muskets lined the streets. The late daybreak of the winter solstice found the whole city still in arms. During many years the Londoners retained a vivid recollection of what they called the Irish night. When it was known that there had been no cause of alarm, attempts were made to discover the origin of the rumor which had produced so much agitation.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 519.

3984. PANIC, Unexpected. English, 1825. [It was preceded by a period of unusual prosperity. On the 3d of January the Royal speech to Parliament exulted over it.] "There never was a period in the history of this country when all the great interests of the nation were at the same time in so thriving a condition." On the 2d of February he laments the evils of "the pecuniary crisis. . . . The pecuniary crisis was indeed the most unexpected, the most astounding, and the most severe in its consequences ever produced by extravagant hopes and exaggerated alarms. This pecuniary crisis universally obtained the name of 'The Panic.' . . . It was described by Mr. Huskisson as 'such a complete suspension of all confidence as contradistinguished from commercial distress. . . . If the difficulties which existed in the money market had continued only forty-eight hours longer, . . . the effect would have been to put a stop to all dealings between man and man, except by way of barter.' . . . Before the close of the year seventy-three banks had failed. . . . The total number of bankruptcies in 1825 was a little above eleven hundred; in 1826 it was nearly two thousand six hundred."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 11, p. 197.

3985. PANTOMIME in Jurisprudence. Roman. Among savage nations the want of letters is imperfectly supplied by the use of visible signs, which awaken attention and perpetuate the remembrance of any public or private transaction. The jurisprudence of the first Romans exhibited the scenes of a pantomime; the words were adapted to the gestures, and the slightest error or neglect in the forms of proceeding was sufficient to annul the substance of the fairest claim. The communion of the marriage-life was denoted by the necessary elements of fire and water; and the divorced wife resigned the bunch of keys, by the delivery of which she has been invested with the government of the family. The manumission of a son or a slave was performed by turning him round with a gentle blow on the cheek; a work was prohibited by the casting of a stone; prescription was interrupted by the breaking of a branch; the clinched fist was the symbol of a pledge or deposit; the right hand was the gift of faith and confidence. The indenture of covenants was a broken straw; weights and scales were introduced into every payment, and the heir who accepted a testament was sometimes obliged to snap his fingers, to cast away his garments, and to leap and dance with real or affected transport. If a citizen pursued any stolen goods into a neighbor's house, he concealed his nakedness with a linen towel, and hid his face with a mask or basin, lest he should encounter the eyes of a virgin or a matron. In a civil action the plaintiff touched the ear of his witness, seized his reluctant adversary by the neck, and implored, in solemn lamentation, the aid of his fellow-citizens. The two competitors grasped each other's hand as if they stood prepared for combat before the tribunal of the prætor; he commanded them to produce the object of the dispute; they went, they returned with measured steps, and a clod of earth was cast at his feet to represent the field for which they contended.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 317.

3986. PAPACY scandalized. Marozia. Marozia, the mistress of Sergius III., and her sister Theodora, two women of the most abandoned and flagitious character, now ruled everything in Rome; and maintaining their ascendancy by the most detestable crimes, and murders without end, they filled the pontifical chair in rapid and monstrous succession with their paramours or their adulterous offspring.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 4, p. 101

3987. PAPEE, Wealth by. In Egypt. Firmus, the friend and ally, as he proudly styled himself, of Odenathus and Zenobia, was no more than a wealthy merchant of Egypt. In the course of his trade to India he had formed very intimate connections with the Saracens and the Blemmyes, whose situation on either coast of the Red Sea gave them an easy introduction into the Upper Egypt. The Egyptians he inflamed with the hope of freedom, and, at the head of their furious multitude, broke into the city of Alexandria, where he assumed the imperial purple, coined money, published edicts, and raised an army, which, as he vainly boasted, he was capable of maintaining from the sole profits of his paper trade. Such troops were a feeble defence against the approach of Aurelian; and it seems almost unnecessary to relate that Firmus was routed, taken, tortured, and put to death.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 11, p. 358.

3988. PARADISE, The drunkard's. Ancient Germans. Some tribes of the north seem to have embraced the doctrine of transmigration; others imagined a gross paradise of immortal drunkenness.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 95, p. 271.

3989. PARADISE, Earthly. Damascus. Timour [the Tartar, reposed,] as was his custom, his army in the plain of Damascus, called one of the four paradises of the earth. The plain of Damascus, shaded by its orchards, refreshed by its running waters; the valley of Beivan, in Persia; the valley of the Euphrates, below Bagdad; and, in fine, the fertile and humid plain of Samarcand, were to the eyes of the Tartars the four paradises promised to their nation. They took pleasure in traversing them and halting there by turns.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 325.

3990. PARADISE, Language of. Nushirvan the Persian. At his command the most celebrated writers of Greece and India were translated into the Persian language; a smooth and elegant idiom, recommended by Mahomet to the use of paradise; though it is branded with the epithets of savage and unmusical by the ignorance and presumption of Agathias.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 42, p. 216.

3991. PARADISE, Mussulmans'. Five. The Mussulmans born in the mountains and valleys of Asia, the sons of shepherds, have brought with them into their very palaces the memory, the images, the passion of rural nature; they love her too much to bedeck her. A woman, a horse, a weapon, a fountain, a tree—such are the five paradises of the children of Othman.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 15.

3992. PARADISE, Sensual. Mohammedan. It is natural enough that an Arabian prophet should dwell with rapture on the groves, the fountains, and the rivers of paradise; but instead of inspiring the blessed inhabitants with a liberal taste for harmony and science, conversation and friendship, he idly celebrates the pearls and diamonds, the robes of silk, palaces of marble, dishes of gold, rich wines, artificial dainties, numerous attendants, and the whole train of sensual and costly luxury, which becomes insipid to the owner, even in the short period of this mortal life. Seventy-two Houris, or black-eyed girls, of resplendent beauty, blooming youth, virgin purity, and exquisite sensibility, will be created for the use of the meanest believer; a moment of pleasure will be prolonged to a thousand years, and his faculties will be increased a hundred-fold, to render him worthy of his felicity. Notwithstanding a vulgar prejudice, the gates of heaven will be open to both sexes; but Mahomet has not specified the male companions of the female-elect, lest he should either alarm the jealousy of their former husbands or disturb their felicity by the suspicion of an everlasting marriage. This image of a carnal paradise has provoked the indignation, perhaps the envy, of the monks; they declaim against the impure religion of Mahomet; and his modest apologists are driven to the poor excuse of figures and allegories. But the sounder and more consistent party adhere, without shame, to the literal interpretation of the Koran; useless would be the resurrection of the body, unless it were restored to the possession and exercise of its worthiest faculties; and the union of sensual and intellectual enjoyment is requisite to complete the happiness of the double animal, the perfect man.—GIBBON'S ROME, vol. 5, ch. 50, p. 119.

3993. PARADISE, A strange. Mohammedan. The sieges and battles of six campaigns had consumed many thousands of the Moslems. They died with the reputation and the cheerfulness of martyrs; and the simplicity of their faith may be expressed in the words of an Arabian youth, when he embraced, for the last time, his sister and mother: "It is not," said he, "the delicacies of Syria or the fading delights of this world that have prompted me to devote my life in the cause of religion. But I seek the favor of God and His apostles; and I have heard, from one of the companions of the prophet, that the spirits of the martyrs will be lodged in the crops of green birds, who shall taste the fruits and drink of the rivers of paradise. Farewell, we shall meet again among the groves and fountains which God has provided for His elect."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 216.

3994. PARDON declined. Revolutionists. A.D. 1776. Patterson, . . . the British adjutant-general, was allowed to enter the American camp.

. . . He asked to have his visit accepted as the first advance from the commissioners for restoring peace, and asserted that they had great powers. "From what appears," rejoined Washington, "they have power only to grant pardons; having committed no fault, we need no pardon; we are only defending what we deem to be our indisputable rights."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 1.

3995. ———. By the Innocent. [When Lord Howe arrived off New York in July (1776) he addressed a letter to Dr. Franklin as "his worthy friend," also official dispatches, which were conciliatory in their design.] Franklin replied in like spirit of former friendship, but said as the dispatches only showed that Lord Howe was to offer pardon upon submission, he was sure it must give his lordship pain to be sent so far upon so hopeless a business.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 23, p. 272.

3996. PARDON, Hopeless of. Ayloffie. [Ayloffie was engaged in the Scotch rebellion under the Duke of Argyll.] He was taken prisoner, and carried to Glasgow. . . . A story was current among the Whigs that the king [James II.] said, "You had better be frank with me, Mr. Ayloffie. You know that it is in my power to pardon you." Then, it was rumored, the captive broke his sullen silence, and answered, "It may be in your power, but it is not in your nature." He was executed under his old outlawry before the gate of the Temple, and died with stoical composure.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 527.

3997. PARDON made Odious. James II. No English sovereign has ever given stronger proofs of a cruel nature than James II.; yet his cruelty was not more odious than his mercy; or, perhaps, it may be more correct to say that his mercy and his cruelty were such that each reflects infamy on the other. Our horror at the fate of the simple clowns, the young lads, the delicate women, to whom he was inexorably severe, is increased when we find to whom and for what considerations he granted pardon.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 607.

3998. PARDON, Plea for. Napoleon I. [General Lajolais had been condemned to death for participating in the Bourbon conspiracy to assassinate Napoleon.] His only daughter, fourteen years old, who was remarkably beautiful, . . . without communicating her intentions to any one, set out alone and on foot for St. Cloud. . . . By her youth, her beauty, her tears, and her woe she [gained access to Josephine and her daughter Hortense]. . . . Napoleon had said . . . petitions must be in writing. . . . They contrived to introduce her to the presence of Napoleon as he was passing through one of the apartments of the palace. . . . The fragile child, in a delirium of emotion, rushed before him, precipitated herself at his feet, and exclaimed, "Pardon, sire! pardon for my father!" Napoleon, surprised, . . . exclaimed, "I have said that I wish for no such scenes. . . . Leave me, miss!" So saying, he turned to pass from her; but the child threw her arms around his knees, and . . . with tears and agony . . . in every feature . . . exclaimed, "Pardon! pardon! pardon! it is for my father!" "And who is your father? . . . Who are you?" "I am Miss Lajolais, . . . and my father is doomed to die." . . . "Well, my child!

yes ! For your sake I will forgive your father." . . . The suppliant fainted and fell to the floor. [In prison she fell upon her father's neck, unable to speak. She fell into unconsciousness, and when revived was a hopeless maniac.]—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 27.

3999. PARDON, Purchase of. Evidence. [A.D. 1450-1485.] One testator wishes that a Latin sentence should be written "on the forefront of the iron about my grave," with "the day and the year of the Lord of my departing from this world, and the pardon that I purchased to be written therewith."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 8, p. 127.

4000. PARDON without Reformation. Government. Capt. John Nutt was one of the most daring sea-devils of that lawless time. He was an untakable man, and he had several pirate ships. He commenced his career as gunner of a vessel in Dartmouth harbor bound for the Newfoundland seas. Coming to Newfoundland, he collected a crew of pleasant fellows like himself ; they seized a French ship, also a large Plymouth ship, then a Flemish ship, and, with these gay rovers, he played off his depredations on the fishing craft of the Newfoundland seas, and came back, too strong for capture, to the western coasts of England. Arrived there, this worthy played off new devilries : he tempted men from the king's service by the promise of higher wages, and—what, alas ! might easily be promised in those dreary days—more certain payment ; he hung about Torbay, laughed at threats, scoffed at promises of pardon, although more than one offer had been made conditionally. The whole western country was in a state of dread, and municipalities poured their entreaties upon the council and upon Eliot in his office of vice-admiral. . . . [The pirate was pardoned and honored, the faithful admiral was dishonored by the government. It was the work of bribery.]—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 3, p. 50.

4001. PARDON by Sympathy. Abraham Lincoln. A poor woman from Philadelphia had been waiting, with a baby in her arms, for three days to see the President. [Her husband had deserted, and was sentenced to be shot.] Late in the afternoon of the third day . . . he heard the baby cry. "He . . . rang the bell. 'Daniel,' said he, 'is there a woman with a baby in the anteroom ?' I said there was, and if he would allow me to say it, I thought it was a case he ought to see, for it was a matter of life and death. Said he, 'Send her at once.' . . . The President pardoned her husband. As she came out from his presence her eyes were lifted and her lips moving in prayer, the tears streaming down her cheeks." Said Daniel, "I went up to her, and pulling her shawl, said, 'Madam, it was the baby that did it !'"—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 737.

4002. PARENT, A disappointed. John Howard. For seven years he lived in the country with his wife. Nothing was wanting to his happiness but children, which, for seven years, were denied him. Then a son was born, who filled up the measure of his joy. A few days after the birth of this child he left his wife in the morning to go to church, she being apparently as well as could be expected. On his return he found her indisposed, and a few minutes after, as he was handing her a cup of chocolate, she fell back upon her pillow, and immediately breathed her last. . . . The boy, whom he had obtained at the price of his happiness, was a large and healthy child ; it lived to be the consoler of his solitude, but finally the shame and misery of his old age.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 40.

4003. PARENTS, Power of. Roman. The paternal power was instituted or confirmed by Romulus himself ; and, after the practice of three centuries, it was inscribed on the fourth table of the Decemvirs. In the forum, the Senate, or the camp the adult son of a Roman citizen enjoyed the public and private rights of a person ; in his father's house he was a mere thing ; confounded by the laws with the movables, the cattle, and the slaves, whom the capricious master might alienate or destroy, without being responsible to any earthly tribunal. The hand which bestowed the daily sustenance might resume the voluntary gift, and whatever was acquired by the labor or fortune of the son was immediately lost in the property of the father.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 341.

4004. PARENTS, Sacrifice of. Chinese. Ninety [Chinese] cities were stormed, or starved, by the Moguls ; ten only escaped ; and Zingis [their commander], from a knowledge of the filial piety of the Chinese, covered his vanguard with their captive parents ; an unworthy, and by degrees a fruitless, abuse of the virtue of his enemies.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 64, p. 209.

4005. PARENTS, Sorrow of. Henry II. [About 1189 Richard, son of the great Henry II., joined the French king, Philip II., against his father. Three other sons were also rebels against their father, and only his youngest son, John, remained at his court.] Philip and Richard took his castles, while Henry remained in a condition of unusual supineness. He was now broken in spirit. . . . He yielded almost without a struggle to the demands that were made upon him. . . . Throughout these unnatural conflicts he had rested his hopes upon his beloved John, to whom he had required his seneschal to deliver his castles in the event of his death. . . . He asked for the names of those barons who had joined the French king. The first name he saw was John. He read no more. The world and all its troubles and hopes faded from his view. He turned his face to the wall, and exclaimed, "Let everything go as it will." . . . His great heart was broken. On the 6th of July, 1189, Henry II. was no more.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 21, p. 304.

4006. PARRICIDE, Crime of. Impossible. Romulus appointed no punishment for actual parricides, but called all murder parricide, looking upon this as abominable, and the other as impossible. For many ages, indeed, he seemed to have judged rightly ; no one was guilty of that crime in Rome for almost six hundred years ; and Lucius Ostius, after the wars of Hannibal, is recorded to have been the first that murdered his father.—PLUTARCH'S ROMULUS.

4008. PARSIMONY, Costly. James II. [It was customary at the coronation of the king to arrange a splendid procession and to ride in state from the Tower to Westminster.] James ordered an estimate to be made of the cost of such a procession, and found that it would amount to about half as much as he proposed to expend in covering his wife with trinkets. He accordingly determined to be profuse where he ought to have been frugal, and niggardly where he might pardonably have been profuse. More than a hundred thousand pounds were laid out in dressing the queen, and the procession from the Tower was omitted. The folly of this course is obvious.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 439.

4009. PARTIALITY evinced. James II. [He determined to overthrow the Protestant faith.] All the special dispensations which he had granted had been granted to Roman Catholics. All the laws which bore hardest on the Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists had been for a time severely executed by him. While Hales commanded a regiment, while Powis sat at the council board, while Massey held a deanery, while breviaries and mass books were printed at Oxford under a royal license, while the host was publicly exposed in London under the protection of the pikes and muskets of the Foot Guards, while friars and monks walked the streets of London in their robes, Baxter was in jail; Howe was in exile; the Five Mile Act and the Conventicle Act were in full vigor; Puritan writers were compelled to resort to foreign or to secret presses; Puritan congregations could meet only by night or in waste places, and Puritan ministers were forced to preach in the garb of colliers or of sailors. In Scotland the king, while he spared no exertion to extort from the estates full relief for Roman Catholics, had demanded and obtained new statutes of unprecedented severity against the Presbyterians.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 186.

4010. PARTIES, Difference in. English. It ought to be remembered that the difference between the two great sections of English politicians has always been a difference rather of degree than of principle. There were certain limits on the right and on the left which were very rarely overstepped. A few enthusiasts on one side were ready to lay all our laws and franchises at the feet of our kings. A few enthusiasts on the other side were bent on pursuing, through endless civil troubles, their darling phantom of a republic. But the great majority of those who fought for the crown were averse to despotism, and the great majority of the champions of popular rights were averse to anarchy. Twice in the course of the seventeenth century the two parties suspended their dissensions and united their strength in a common cause. Their first coalition restored hereditary monarchy, their second coalition rescued constitutional freedom.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 94.

4011. PARTIES, Independence of. England. [See above.] It is also to be noted that these two parties have never been the whole nation—nay, that they have never, taken together, made up a majority of the nation. Between them has always been a great mass, which has not steadfastly adhered to either, which has sometimes remained inertly neutral, and has sometimes oscillated to and fro. That mass has more than once passed in a few years from one extreme to the other, and back again. Sometimes it has changed sides merely because it was tired of supporting the same men, sometimes because it was dismayed by its own excesses, sometimes because it had expected impossibilities and had been disappointed. But whenever it has leaned with its whole weight in either direction, resistance has, for the time, been impossible.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 95.

4012. PARTIES, Natural. Two. The recess of the English Parliament lasted six weeks. The day on which the Houses met again is one of the most remarkable epochs in our history. From that day dates the corporate existence of the two great parties which have ever since alternately governed the country. In one sense, indeed, the distinction which then became obvious had always existed, and always must exist; for it has its origin in diversities of temper, of understanding, and of interest, which are found in all societies, and which will be found till the human mind ceases to be drawn in opposite directions by the charm of habit and by the charm of novelty. Not only in politics, but in literature, in art, in science, in surgery and mechanics, in navigation and agriculture—nay, even in mathematics, we find this distinction. Everywhere there is a class of men who cling with fondness to whatever is ancient, and who, even when convinced by overpowering reasons that innovation would be beneficial, consent to it with many misgivings and forebodings. We find also everywhere another class of men sanguine in hope, bold in speculation, always pressing forward, quick to discern the imperfections of whatever exists, disposed to think lightly of the risks and inconveniences which attend improvements, and disposed to give every change credit for being an improvement. . . . The extreme section of one class consists of bigoted dotards, the extreme section of the other consists of shallow and reckless empirics.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 91.

4013. PARTIES, Opposite. Romans. "In the Commonwealth," he said, "there have always been two parties—the populares and the optimates. The populares say and do what will please the mob; the optimates say and do what will please the best men. And who are the best men? They are of all ranks and infinite in number—senators, municipals, farmers, men of business, even libertini. The type is distinct. They are the well-to-do, the sound, the honest, who do no wrong to any man. The object at which they aim is quiet with honor. They are the conservatives of the State. Religion and good government, the Senate's authority, the laws and customs of our ancestors, public faith, integrity, sound administration—these are the principles on which they rest, and these they will maintain with their lives." [Address of Cicero.]—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 15.

4014. PARTIES, Passion of. Roman. Clodius . . . impeached Milo for the interruption of the Comitia on the 18th of November. Milo appeared to answer on the 2d of February; but there was another riot, and the meeting was broken up. On the 6th the court was again held. The crowd was enormous. Cicero happily has left a minute account of the scene. The people were starving, the corn question was pressing. Milo presented himself, and Pompey came forward on the Rostra to speak. He was received with howls and curses from Clodius' hired ruffians, and his voice could not be heard for the noise. Pompey held on undaunted, and commanded occasional silence by the weight of his presence. Clodius rose when Pompey had done, and rival yells went up from the Milonians. Yells were not enough; filthy verses were sung in chorus about Clodius and Clodia, ribald bestiality, delightful to the ears of "Tully." Clodius, pale with anger, called out, "Who is murdering the people with famine?" A thousand throats answered, "Pompey!" "Who wants to go to Alexandria?" "Pompey!" they shouted again. "And whom do you want to go?" "Crassus!" they cried. Passion had risen too high for words. The Clodians began to spit on the Milonians; the Milonians drew swords and cut the heads of the Clodians. The workmen, being unarmed, got the worst of the conflict; and Clodius was flung from the Rostra.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 15.

4015. PARTIES, Value of. English. The truth is, that though both parties have often seriously erred, England could have spared neither. If, in her institutions, freedom and order, the advantages arising from innovation and the advantages arising from prescription, have been combined to an extent elsewhere unknown, we may attribute this happy peculiarity to the strenuous conflicts and alternate victories of two rival confederacies of statesmen—a confederacy zealous for authority and antiquity, and a confederacy zealous for liberty and progress.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 94.

4016. PARTISAN, An effective. Rev. Jonathan Swift. The Rev. Jonathan Swift, of all party writers that ever influenced public opinion, was the most unscrupulous, the most unjust, the most uncharitable, but incomparably the most able.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 24, p. 369.

4017. PARTISANS by Contagion. Parliament. [Swift humorously wrote:] I wish you had been here for ten days during the highest and warmest reign of party and faction that I ever knew or read of, upon the bill against Occasional Conformity. It was so universal that I observed the dogs in the streets much more contumelious and quarrelsome than usual; and the very night before the bill went up, a committee of Whig and Tory cats had a very warm and loud debate upon the roof of our house. But why should we wonder at that when the very ladies are split asunder into high-church and low, and, out of zeal for religion, have hardly time to say their prayers?"—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 17, p. 268.

4018. PARTY honorably changed. Lord Falkland. [Lord Falkland, who fell in the battle of Newberry, has been defended against the charge of apostasy from his friends in these words by Arnold:] A man who leaves the popular cause when it is triumphant, and joins the party opposed to it without really changing his principles and becoming a renegade, is one of the noblest characters in history. He may not have the clearest judgment or the firmest wisdom; he may have been mistaken, but as far as he is concerned personally, we cannot but admire him. But such a man changes his party not to conquer, but to die. . . . He protests so strongly against their evil that he chooses to die by their hands rather than in their company; . . . this man is no renegade, no apostate, but the purest of martyrs; for what testimony to truth can be so pure as that which is given uncheered by any sympathy, given not against enemies, amid applauding friends, but against friends, amid un pitying or half-rejoicing enemies? And such a martyr was Falkland!—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 2, p. 24.

4019. PASSION, Parental. John Locke. Mr. Locke never mentioned him but with great respect and affection. His father used a conduct toward him when young that he often spoke of afterward with great approbation. It was the being severe to him by keeping him in much awe and at a distance when he was a boy, but relaxing, still by degrees, of that severity as he grew up to be a man, till, he being become capable of it, he lived perfectly with him as a friend. And I remember he has told me that his father, after he was a man, solemnly asked his pardon for having struck him once in a passion when he was a boy.—FOWLER'S LOCKE, ch. 1.

4021. PASSION, Savage. Alexander. Clitus, a general of great ability, and to whom Alexander owed his life in the battle of the Granicus, stood deservedly, on these accounts, in high favor and esteem with his sovereign, who particularly prized the ingenuous simplicity of his manners and the honest freedom with which he was accustomed to utter his opinions or propose his counsels. Amid the mirth of a banquet, while the sycophant courtiers, in extolling to the skies the achievements of their prince, were drawing a depreciating comparison between the merits of Philip and of his son, this brave Macedonian had, with honest indignation, reproved their meanness, and warmly supported the fame of his ancient master. Alexander, in a transport of rage, seized a javelin from one of the guards, and hurling it at the breast of Clitus, struck him dead upon the spot. The atrocity of the deed was instantly felt by the king, and, in the agony of remorse, he would have turned the weapon against his own bosom, had not the attendants forcibly prevented him.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4, p. 192.

4022. PASSION simulated. Becomes Real. Æsop. we are told, when he was one day acting Altreus, in the part where he considers in what manner he should punish Thyestes, being worked up by his passion to a degree of insanity, with his sceptre struck a servant who happened suddenly to pass by, and laid him dead at his feet.—PLUTARCH'S CICERO.

4023. PASSION, Violent. Samuel Johnson. It has been confidently related, with many embellishments, that Johnson one day knocked Osborne down in his shop with a folio, and put his foot upon his neck. The simple truth I had from Johnson himself. "Sir, he was impertinent to me, and I beat him. But it was not in his shop; it was in my own chamber." [Osborne was his publisher.]—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 38.

4024. PASSIONS concealed. William, Prince of Orange. He was born with violent passions and quick sensibilities; but the strength of his emotions was not suspected by the world. From the multitude his joy and his grief, his affection and his resentment, were hidden by a phlegmatic serenity, which made him pass for the most cold-blooded of mankind. Those who brought him good news could seldom detect any sign of pleasure. Those who saw him after a defeat looked in vain for any sign of vexation. He praised and reprimanded, rewarded and punished, with the stern tranquillity of a Mohawk chief; but those who knew him well and saw him near were aware that under all this ice a fierce fire was constantly burning. It was seldom that anger deprived him of power over himself; but when he was really enraged the first outbreak of his passion was terrible. It was indeed scarcely safe to approach him.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 156.

4025. PASSIONS, Controlled by. Frederick William. The mind of Frederick William was so ill regulated that all his inclinations became passions, and all his passions partook of the character of moral and intellectual disease. His parsimony degenerated into sordid avarice. His taste for military pomp and order became a mania, like that of a Dutch burgomaster for tulips. While the envoys of the court of Berlin were in a state of such squalid poverty as moved the laughter of foreign capitals—while the food of the royal family was so bad that even hunger loathed it—no price was thought too extravagant to pay for them.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 7.

4026. PATERNITY inferred. Dr. Valentine Mott. A story is told of his readiness in the lecture-room. A mother brought into the amphitheatre, one morning, an extremely dirty, sickly, miserable-looking child, for the purpose of having a tumor removed. He exhibited the tumor to the class, but informed the mother that he could not operate upon the child without the consent of her husband. One of the students, in his eagerness to examine the tumor, jumped over into the little enclosure designed for the operator and his patients. Dr. Mott, observing this intrusion, turned to the student, and asked him, with the most innocent expression of countenance: "Are you the father of this child?" Thunders of applause and laughter greeted this ingenious rebuke, during which the intruder returned to his place crestfallen.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 529.

4027. PATIENCE abused. Pericles. When a vile and abandoned fellow loaded him a whole day with reproaches and abuse, he bore it with patience and silence, and continued in public for the despatch of some urgent affairs. In the evening he walked slowly home, this impudent wretch following and insulting him all the way with the most scurrilous language. And as it was dark when he came to his own door, he ordered one of his servants to take a torch and light the man home.—PLUTARCH'S PERICLES.

4028. PATIENCE, Christian. Martyr. [The edict of Diocletian against the Christians] was torn down by the hands of a Christian, who expressed at the same time, by the bitterest invectives, his contempt as well as abhorrence for such impious and tyrannical governors. . . . And if it be true that he was a person of rank and education, those circumstances could serve only to aggravate his guilt. He was burnt, or rather roasted, by a slow fire, and his executioners, zealous to revenge the personal insult which had been offered to the emperors, exhausted every refinement of cruelty without being able to subdue his patience or to alter the steady and insulting smile which in his dying agonies he still preserved in his countenance.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16, p. 65.

4029. PATIENCE, Endeavor in. William, Prince of Orange. [His aim was the protection of Europe from Louis XIV.] William had one great end ever before him. Toward that end he was impelled by a strong passion which appeared to him under the guise of a sacred duty. Toward that end he toiled with a patience resembling, as he once said, the patience with which he had once seen a boatman on a canal strain against an adverse eddy, often swept back, but never ceasing to pull, and content if, by the labor of hours, a few yards could be gained. Exploits which brought the prince no nearer to his object, however glorious they might be in the estimation of the vulgar, were in his judgment boyish vanities, and no part of the real business of life.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 179.

4030. PATIENCE of Genius. Magnetic Telegraph. The magnetic principle on which the invention depends had been known since 1774, but Professor Morse was the first to apply that principle for the benefit of men. He began his experiments in 1832, and five years afterward succeeded in obtaining a patent on his invention. Then followed another long delay; and it was not until the last day of the session in 1843 that he procured from Congress an appropriation of $30,000. With that appropriation was constructed, between Baltimore and Washington, the first telegraphic line in the world. Perhaps no other invention has exercised a more beneficent influence on the welfare of the human race.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 56, p. 446.

4031. PATIENCE, Nobility in. Alexander. Alexander [the Great] hazarded his person, by way of exercise for himself and example to others. But his friends, in the pride of wealth, were so devoted to luxury and ease that they considered long marches and campaigns as a burden, and by degrees came to murmur and speak ill of the king. At first he bore their censures with great moderation, and used to say there was something noble in hearing himself ill-spoken of while he was doing well.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

4032. PATIENCE, Success by. Study. Buffon said, "Genius is patience." Stevenson, the inventor of the locomotive, declared that he surpassed the majority of mankind only in patience. Newton also ascribed his success in interpreting nature solely to his patience. Being asked one day how he had discovered the law of gravitation, he replied, "By incessantly thinking about it."—PARTON'S NEWTON, p. 91.

4033. PATIENCE tried. John Nelson. [One of Wesley's preachers was reported to the commissioners for recruiting the army as a vagrant, not having any visible means of support. He was pressed into the army, where he began to preach to the soldiers, and then whenever opportunity permitted. He was grievously tormented by a strapping ensign, who had him put in prison for reproving his profanity and for preaching, and when he was let out threatened to chastise him. Nelson records that] it caused a sore temptation to arise in me, to think that a wicked, ignorant man should thus torment me, and I able to tie his head and heels together. I found an old man's bone in me; but the Lord lifted up a standard when the anger was coming on like a flood, else I should have wrung his neck to the ground and set my foot upon him.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 210.

4034. PATRIOTISM abandoned. James II. A small knot of fanatics still continued to cherish a wild hope that they might be able to change the order of succession. . . . It was to be hoped, they said, that the king might be able to establish the true faith without resorting to extremities; but, in the worst event, he might leave his crown at the disposal of Louis. It was better for Englishmen to be the vassals of France than the slaves of the devil. This extraordinary document was handed about from Jesuit to Jesuit, and from courtier to courtier, till some eminent Roman Catholics, in whom bigotry had not extinguished patriotism, furnished the Dutch ambassador with a copy. He put the paper into the hands of James. James, greatly agitated, pronounced it a vile forgery, contrived by some pamphleteer in Holland. The Dutch minister resolutely answered that he could prove the contrary by the testimony of several distinguished members of his Majesty's own church—nay, that there would be no difficulty in pointing out the writer, who, after all, had written only what many priests and many busy politicians said every day in the galleries of the palace. The king did not think it expedient to ask who the writer was.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 285.

4035. PATRIOTISM, Affecting. Maria Theresa. [Frederick II. suddenly made war against the young orphan queen at the beginning of her reign.] At the first sitting of the Diet she appeared clad in deep mourning for her father, and in pathetic and dignified words implored her people to support her just cause. Magnates and deputies sprang up, half drew their sabres, and with eager voices vowed to stand by her with their lives and fortunes. Till then her firmness had never once forsaken her before the public eye, but at that shout she sank down upon her throne, and wept aloud. Still more touching was the sight when, a few days later, she came before the estates of her realm, and held up before them the little archduke in her arms. Then it was that the enthusiasm of Hungary broke forth into that war-cry which soon resounded throughout Europe, "Let us die for our king.

Maria Theresa!"—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 36.

4036. PATRIOTISM aroused. Revolutionists. The battle of Lexington fired the country. Within a few days an army of 20,000 men had gathered about Boston. A line of intrenchments encompassing the city was drawn from Roxbury to Chelsea. To drive Gage and the British into the sea was the common talk in that tumultuous camp. And the number constantly increased. John Stark came down at the head of the New Hampshire militia. Israel Putnam, with a leather waistcoat on, was helping some men to build a stone wall on his farm, when the news from Lexington came flying. Hurrying to the nearest town, he found the militia already mustered. Bidding the men follow as soon as possible, he mounted a horse and rode to Cambridge, a distance of a hundred miles, in eighteen hours. Rhode Island sent her quota under the brave Nathaniel Greene. Benedict Arnold came with the provincials of New Haven. Ethan Allen, of Vermont, made war in the other direction.—RIPPATH'S U. S., ch. 38, p. 298.

4037. PATRIOTISM, Courage of. Scots. Edward [II.] now prepared, with an immense army of 100,000 men, to reduce the country to submission and fulfil the dying request of his father, by making a complete conquest of it. King Robert Bruce met him at Bannockburn, near Stirling, with 30,000 men. By an excellent disposition of the Scottish army, and the signal intrepidity and conduct of the king, the English were totally routed. A prodigious slaughter ensued, and the pursuit continued near one hundred miles, till the small remnant of this immense army was entirely driven out of the kingdom. Edward narrowly escaped by flight to Dunbar, whence he was conveyed by sea to his own dominions. This great and decisive victory secured the independence of Scotland, and fixed Robert Bruce firmly upon the throne. It made a deep impression on the minds of the English, and for several years after no superiority of numbers could induce them to keep the field against their formidable adversaries.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 12, p. 195.

4038. ———. Under Charles I. The whole nation was alarmed and incensed. John Hampden, an opulent and well-born gentleman of Buckinghamshire, highly considered in his own neighborhood, but as yet little known to the kingdom generally, had the courage to step forward to confront the whole power of the government, and take on himself the cost and the risk of disputing the prerogative to which the king laid claim. The case was argued before the judges in the Exchequer Chamber. . . . If money might legally be raised without the consent of Parliament for the support of a fleet, it was not easy to deny that money might, without consent of Parliament, be legally raised for the support of an army.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 85.

4039. PATRIOTISM dead. Romans. The Numidians were not very formidable enemies, but after a month or two half the Romans were destroyed and the remainder were obliged to surrender. About the same time, and from similar causes, two Roman armies were cut to pieces on the Rhone. While the great men at Rome were building palaces, inventing new dishes, and hiring cooks at unheard-of salaries, the barbarians were at the gates of Italy.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 4.

4040. PATRIOTISM in Death. The Younger Pitt. [When William Pitt was on his death-bed, shortly after Napoleon's victories at Ulm and Austerlitz, the last words which he spoke, about half an hour before he breathed his last, were,] "My country! Oh, my country!"—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 25, p. 451.

4041. ———. John Hampden. ["O Lord, save my bleeding country!" were the last words of Hampden, who was wounded in a fight at the beginning of the civil war.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 1.

4042. PATRIOTISM, Deeds of. Garibaldi. Garibaldi, however, remained, and was residing there, farming and fishing, when the war between Austria and Sardinia called him once more to the field. Before he again saw Caprera, what wonderful events transpired! The bloody tyrant of Naples driven from his throne! Sicily delivered from oppression! Nine millions of subjects added to the dominions of a constitutional king, Victor Emmanuel! All Italy one nation, excepting alone the dominions of the Pope and the province of Venetia! This was Garibaldi's work. It was the magic of his name, the fire of his patriotism, and his genius for command, that wrought these marvels. The grateful king desired to bestow upon him some splendid reward, which Garibaldi firmly refusing, the king prepared for him a pleasing surprise at his rocky home. After an absence of nearly two years, Garibaldi returned to Caprera in November, 1860, to spend the winter in repose. When he approached his home, he saw no object that he could recognize. His rough and tangled farm had been changed, as if by enchantment, into elegant grounds, with roads, paths, lawns, gardens, shrubbery, and avenues. His cottage was gone, and in its place stood a villa, replete with every convenience within and without. As he walked from room to room, wondering what magician had worked this transformation, he observed a full-length portrait of King Victor Emmanuel, which explained the mystery.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 497.

4043. PATRIOTISM, Determined. Virginia. A rumor arose that an English fleet was approaching for the subjugation of the colonies. The patriot leaders held a council, and it was determined that Jamestown should be burned. Accordingly, in the dusk of the evening, the torch was applied, and the only town in Virginia laid in ashes. The leading men set the example by throwing firebrands into their own houses; others caught the spirit of sacrifice; the flames shot up through the shadows of night; and Governor Berkeley and his followers, on board a fleet twenty miles down the river, had tolerably fair warning that the capital of Virginia could not be used for the purposes of despotism. [See No. 4067.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 12, p. 121.

4044. PATRIOTISM disgusted. Bolívar. Like General Washington, Bolívar was less popular as a civil ruler than he had been as a commander of armies. Disgusted at length by the calumnies with which he was assailed, he not only resigned the presidency, but determined to leave his country. He addressed to his fellow-citizens a farewell letter: "The presence of a fortunate soldier," said he, "however disinterested he may be, is always dangerous in a state just set free. I am tired of hearing it incessantly repeated that I wish to make myself emperor, and to raise again the throne of the Incas. Everywhere my actions are misrepresented. It is enough. I have paid my debt to my country and to humanity. I have given my blood, my health, my fortune, to the cause of liberty, and as long as it was in peril I was devoted to its defence; but now that America is no longer torn by war, nor polluted with the presence of an armed foe, I withdraw, that my presence may not be an obstacle to the happiness of my fellow-citizens. The welfare of my country would alone reconcile me to the hard necessity of a perpetual exile, far from the land which gave me birth. Receive, then, my adieus, as a new proof of my ardent patriotism and the particular love which I cherish for the people of Colombia."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 490.

4045. PATRIOTISM a Duty. Lacedæmonians. The discipline of the Lacedæmonians continued after they were arrived at years of maturity, for no man was at liberty to live as he pleased, the city being like one great camp, where all had their stated allowance, and knew their public charge, each man concluding that he was born not for himself, but for his country. Hence if they had no particular orders, they employed themselves in inspecting the boys, and teaching them something useful, or in learning of those that were older than themselves.—PLUTARCH.

4046. ———. Lord Nelson. [When Lord Nelson was bearing down upon the French and Spanish fleets off Cape Trafalgar, with his men-of-war arranged in two lines, as previously designed, he asked Captain Blackwood] whether a signal was not wanting. When Blackwood answered that he thought the whole fleet knew what they were about, up went the signal which conveyed the immortal words, "England expects every man to do his duty."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 25, p. 447.

4047. PATRIOTISM, Educated. Romans. To inspire that severe and rigid virtue which can alone support a democratic form of government, and to inculcate that exclusive love of our country before which, in their early ages, every private or personal feeling was constrained to bow, was the first and most sacred duty of these noble matrons. The circumstances in which the commonwealth was situated in its earlier ages made this absolutely necessary. It possessed none of those artificial modes of defence so generally employed by the modern nations. The improvements of modern warfare, which substitute skill so often in the place of valor—the fortifications of our modern cities, which render them, in some measure, independent of the personal exertions of those who defend them—had not been introduced among this virtuous people. Those refinements, also, in the arts and manufactures which exchange the little enjoyments of private comfort for the higher feelings of public happiness, and even that progress in the sciences which, however excellent in its general consequences, encourages certainly a spirit of exclusion most uncongenial to public exertion—all these were either unknown or despised in the severer ages of the Roman republic.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 3, p. 423.

4048. PATRIOTISM, Effect of. Dutch. The Flemish were defeated in a naval fight off Zericksee, and Philip himself obtained a more important and complete victory at Mons-en-Puelle, near Lille . . . where the host of the insurgents, commanded by the two sons of the exiled Count Guy de Dampierre, was utterly discomfited, with the loss of 6000 men. Such, however, was the energy and determination of the stout-hearted burghers of Flanders, that within three weeks they were enabled to advance against the king with a fresh army of 60,000 men; and Philip, struck with admiration of their patriotism and dauntless bravery, resolved to abandon the contest and conclude a peace.—STUDENTS' HISTORY OF FRANCE, ch. 9, § 14.

4049. PATRIOTISM, Enthusiastic. Benedict Arnold. The condition of Burgoyne grew more and more critical. On all sides the lines of Gates were closing around him. His supplies failed; his soldiers were put on partial rations; his Canadian and Indian allies deserted his standard. But the British general was courageous and resolute; he strengthened his defences and flattered his men with the hope that General Clinton, who now commanded the British army in New York, would make a diversion in their favor. On the 7th of October he hazarded another battle, in which he lost his bravest officers and nearly 700 privates. The conflict was terrible, lasting from two o'clock in the afternoon till twilight. At last Morgan's riflemen singled out the brave General Fraser, who commanded the British right, and killed him. His disheartened men turned and fled from the field. On the American side, Arnold, who had resigned his commission, rode at full speed to his old command, and, without authority, became the inspiring genius of the battle. He charged like a madman, drove the enemy before him, eluded Gates' aid, who was sent to call him back, burst into the British camp, and was severely wounded. The Americans were completely victorious.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 40, p. 323.

4050. PATRIOTISM exasperated. Massachusetts Colonists. A.D. 1774. "If you value your life, I advise you not to return home at present," was the warning received by Ruggles from the town of Hardwicke, whose freemen, with those of New Braintree and of Greenwich, so resented his accepting a place in the council [of the Tory governor of Massachusetts], that they vowed he should never again pass the great bridge of the town alive.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 8.

4051. PATRIOTISM extinguished. France. From the latter years of Louis XIV. till the third quarter of the eighteenth century was all but closed, France had a government at once so weak and wicked, so much below the culture of the people it oppressed, that the better minds of the nation turned away in disgust from their domestic ignominy, and sought consolation in contemplating foreign virtue wherever they thought it was to be found; in short, they became cosmopolitan. The country which has since been the birthplace of Chauvinism put away national pride almost with passion.—MORRISON'S GIBBON, ch. 7.

4052. PATRIOTISM, Faith in. Congress of Massachusetts. A.D. 1775. On the 15th day of April they adjourned, expecting a long and desperate war with . . . Great Britain, yet with no treasury but the good-will of the people; not a soldier in actual service; hardly ammunition enough for a parade day; as for artillery, having scarce more than ten cannon of iron, four of brass, and two cohorns; with no executive but the committee of safety, . . . no distinguished general to take command of the provincial troops.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 26.

4053. PATRIOTISM, Finance and. Robert Morris. January, 1777. [To relieve Washington's destitution of funds in the darkest days of the war,] very early on New Year's morning Robert Morris [having contributed much of his own fortune] went from house to house in Philadelphia, rousing people from their beds to borrow money, and early in the day he sent Washington $50,000, with the message, "Whatever I can do shall be done for the good of the service; if further occasional supplies of money are necessary, you may depend upon my exertions either in a public or a private capacity."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 14.

4054. PATRIOTISM, Indifferent. Gibbon in Parliament. [See No. 4249.] He never rose to the level of the ordinary citizen or even partisan, who takes an exaggerated view perhaps of the importance of the politics of the day, but who at any rate thereby shows a sense of social solidarity and the claims of civic communion. He called himself a Whig, but he had no zeal for Whig principles. He voted steadily with Lord North, and quite approved of taxing and coercing America into slavery; but he had no high notions of the royal prerogative, and was lukewarm in this as in everything. With such absence of passion one might have expected that he would be at least shrewd and sagacious in his judgments on politics. But he is nothing of the kind. In his familiar letters he reserves generally a few lines for parliamentary gossip, amid chat about the weather and family business.—MORRISON'S GIBBON, ch. 6.

4055. PATRIOTISM, Longing of. Pilgrims. The love of native land is a universal passion. The Puritans in Holland did not forget—could not forget—that they were Englishmen. During their ten years of residence at Leyden they did not cease to long for a return to the country which had cast them out. Though ruled by a heartless monarch and a bigoted priesthood, England was their country still. The unfamiliar language of the Dutch grated harshly on their ears. They pined with unrest, conscious of their ability and willingness to do something which should convince even King James of their patriotism and worth.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 7, p. 89.

4056. PATRIOTISM, Memorial of. Bunker Hill. The year 1842 was noted for the completion of the Bunker Hill Monument. No enterprise of a similar character had, in the whole history of the country, called forth so much patriotic enthusiasm. The foundation of the noble structure was laid on the 17th of June, 1825, the corner-stone being put into its place by the venerable Lafayette. Daniel Webster, then young in years and fame, delivered the oration of the day, while 200 Revolutionary veterans, 40 of them survivors of the battle fought on that hill-crest just fifty years before, gathered with the throng to hear him. But the work of erection went on slowly. More than $150,000 were expended, and seventeen years elapsed before the grand shaft, commemorative of the heroes, living and dead, was finished. At last the work was done, and the mighty column of Quincy granite, thirty-one feet square at the base and two hundred and twenty-one feet in height, stood out sublimely against the clouds and sky. It was deemed fitting, however, to postpone the dedication until the next anniversary of the battle, and preparations were made accordingly. On the 17th of June, 1843, an immense multitude of people, including most of the Revolutionary soldiers who had not yet fallen, gathered from all parts of the republic to witness the imposing ceremony. Mr. Webster, now full of years and honors, was chosen to deliver the address of dedication, a duty which he performed in a manner so touching and eloquent as to add new lustre to his fame as an orator. The celebration was concluded with a public dinner given in Faneuil Hall, the cradle of American liberty.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 56, p. 443.

4057. PATRIOTISM, National. Patrick Henry. A.D. 1774. [At the Colonial Congress in Philadelphia.] "British oppression has effaced the boundaries of the several colonies; the distinctions between Virginians, Pennsylvanians, New Yorkers, and New Englanders are no more. I am not a Virginian, but an American."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 11.

4058. PATRIOTISM without Pay. George Washington. [When George Washington accepted his commission from the Continental Congress, as commander-in-chief of the American army,] he said no pecuniary consideration could have tempted him to accept this arduous employment, at the expense of his domestic ease and happiness; he had no desire to make a profit by it. He would take no pay. He would keep an exact account of his expenses, and those he doubted not would be discharged.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 23, p. 356.

4059. PATRIOTISM, Possibilities of. American Colonies. "How is it possible," asked the partisans of authority, "that a people without arms, ammunition, money, or navy should dare to brave the foremost among all the powers on earth? . . . Americans are neither disciplined nor capable of discipline."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 16.

4060. PATRIOTISM, Preservation of. Spanish Armada. [When the magnificent Spanish armada was preparing for a descent upon the shores of England, the patriotism of the people was signally displayed.] A long course of prosperous industry might be supposed to have unfitted those who had been winning the spoils of peace for the defence of their country at a time of great national danger. . . . But the ancient spirit was not dead. In the midst of many differences of opinion among Protestants connected with the discipline of the Church, and with Romanists living under severe laws, there was to be, in another year, such an outburst of patriotism as would manifest that the love of country was above all divisions of creed. That glorious manifestation of national spirit in 1588 was also to show that a people does not necessarily become weakened in character by a long course of prosperity, but that the accumulations of peace are the real resources of war. It is not the diffusion of comforts and luxuries that renders a nation unwarlike and apathetic. It is the treading out of true nationality by lawless rulers—the shutting-up of all the fountains of independent thought by slavish superstition—that destroy the patriotism of a people, and make them incapable of defending their homes.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 14, p. 214.

4061. PATRIOTISM, Pretended. Scoundrels. Patriotism having become one of our topics, Johnson suddenly uttered, in a strong, determined tone, an apothegm at which many will start: "Patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel." But let it be considered that he did not mean a real and generous love of our country, but that pretended patriotism which so many, in all ages and countries, have made a cloak for self-interest.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 247.

4062. PATRIOTISM, Public. Spartans. Lycurgus taught his citizens to think nothing more disagreeable than to live by (or for) themselves. Like bees, they acted with one impulse for the public good, and always assembled about their prince. They were possessed with a thirst of honor and enthusiasm bordering upon insanity, and had not a wish but for their country. These sentiments are confirmed by some of their aphorisms. When Pædaretus lost his election for one of the three hundred, he went away rejoicing that there were three hundred better men than himself found in the city. Pisistratus going with some others, ambassador to the King of Persia's lieutenants, was asked whether they came with a public commission or on their own account, to which he answered, "If successful, for the public; if unsuccessful, for ourselves."—PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

4063. PATRIOTISM punished. Thomas Hansford. Rebellion of 1676. What was charged on him as rebellion, he denied to have been a sin. "Take notice," said he, as he came to the gibbet, "I die a loyal subject and a lover of my country." That country was Virginia. Hansford perished, the first native American on the gallows, a martyr to the right of the people to govern themselves.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 14.

4064. PATRIOTISM remembered. Athenian. By the Athenian laws children whose fathers were killed in the service of their country were appointed to be educated at the public expense. "Let the father," says the laws of Solon, "have the privilege of bestowing on that son a funeral encomium who died valiantly fighting in the field. He who receives his death while fighting with undaunted courage in the front of the battle shall have an annual harangue spoken to his honor."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 10.

4065. PATRIOTISM, Response of. George Washington. A.D. 1768. [The customs tax was enacted for the colonies.] At Mount Vernon conversation turned at this time on the dangers that overhung the country. "Whenever my country calls upon me," said Washington, "I am ready to take my musket on my shoulder."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 32.

4066. PATRIOTISM, Sacrifices of. Thomas Nelson, Governor of Virginia. [At the siege of Yorktown] Lafayette said to him, "To what particular spot would your Excellency direct that we point the cannon?" . . . "There," promptly replied the noble-minded, patriotic Nelson—"to that house; it is mine, and is . . . the best one you can find in the town; and there you will be most certain to find Lord Cornwallis and the British headquarters."—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 14.

4067. ———. Rebellion in Virginia. A.D. 1676. As the shades of night descended, the village was set on fire. Two of the best houses belonged to [the patriot leaders] Lawrence and Drummond. Each of them, with his own hand, kindled the flames that were to lay his dwelling in ashes. The little church, the newly-erected State-house, were consumed. Virginia offered [Jamestown] its only village as a victim for its freedom [from the oppressions of Charles II. by the governor, Sir William Berkeley]. [See No. 4043.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 14.

4068. PATRIOTISM, Self Sacrificing. Italian. The Saracens besieged the cities of Beneventum and Capua; after a vain appeal to the successors of Charlemagne, the Lombards implored the clemency and aid of the Greek emperor. A fearless citizen dropped from the walls, passed the intrenchments, accomplished his commission, and fell into the hands of the barbarians as he was returning with the welcome news. They commanded him to assist their enterprise, and deceive his countrymen, with the assurance that wealth and honors should be the reward of his falsehood, and that his sincerity would be punished with immediate death. He affected to yield, but as soon as he was conducted within hearing of the Christians on the rampart, "Friends and brethren," he cried, with a loud voice, "be bold and patient; maintain the city; your sovereign is informed of your distress, and your deliverers are at hand. I know my doom, and commit my wife and children to your gratitude." The rage of the Arabs confirmed his evidence; and the self-devoted patriot was transpierced with a hundred spears.—GIBBON'S ROME, vol. 5, ch. 56, p. 445.

4069. PATRIOTISM, Steadfast. Pomponius. Pomponius, a man of some dignity, was wounded and taken [in battle]. Though much indisposed with his wounds, he was brought before Mithridates, who asked him whether if he saved his life he would become his friend. "On condition you will be reconciled to the Romans," said he, "I will; but if not, I must remain your enemy." The king, struck with admiration of his patriotism, did him no injury.—PLUTARCH'S LUCULLUS.

4070. PATRIOTISM stimulated. Queen Elizabeth. [The Spanish Armada was expected, and the invasion of England.] A camp was formed at Tilbury; and there Elizabeth rode through the ranks, encouraging her captains and her soldiers by her presence and her words. One of the speeches which she addressed to them during this crisis has been preserved; and, though often quoted, it must not be omitted here. . . . "My loving people," she said, "we have been persuaded by some that are careful of our safety to take heed how we commit ourselves to armed multitudes, for fear of treachery; but I assure you I do not desire to live to distrust my faithful and loving people. Let tyrants fear! I have always so behaved myself that, under God, I have placed my chiefest strength and safeguard in the loyal hearts and good-will of my subjects; and, therefore, I am come among you, as you see, at this time, not for my recreation and disport, but being resolved, in the midst and heat of the battle, to live or die among you all, to lay down for my God, for my kingdom, and for my people my honor and my blood even in the dust. I know I have the body but of a weak and feeble woman, but I have the heart and stomach of a king, and of a King of England too, and think it foul scorn that Parma, or Spain, or any prince of Europe should dare to invade the borders of my realm, to which, rather than any dishonor shall grow by me, I myself will take up arms, I myself will be your general, judge, and rewarder of every one of your virtues in the field."—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 412.

4071. PATRIOTISM stirred. Stamp Act. A.D. 1765. Friday, the first morning of November, broke upon a people unanimously resolved on nullifying the Stamp Act. From New Hampshire to the far South the day was introduced by the tolling of muffled bells; minute-guns were fired and pennants hoisted at half-mast, or a eulogy was pronounced on liberty, and its knell sounded; and then again the note changed, as if she were restored to life. . . . Even the children at their games, though hardly able to speak, caught up the general chorus, . . . "Liberty, property, and no stamps."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 19.

4072. PATRIOTISM, Surrender of. New York Merchants. A.D. 1770. [They recalled their decision to abstain from importing anything from England, and limited the restrictions to tea.] "Send us your old liberty pole [iron-bound and iron-barred, deep set near junction of Broadway and Bowery—once cut down by British soldiers,] for you have no further use for it," said the Philadelphians. The students at Princeton burnt the New York merchants' letter by the hands of the hangman.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 44.

4073. PATRIOTISM, Unseemingly. Sertorius. [In consequence of the distractions of the empire, he was, while in Spain, compelled to fight against the Romans. Yet, in fact,] he was a true lover of his country, and his passion to be restored to it was one of the first in his heart. Yet, in his greatest misfortunes, he never departed from his dignity. On the other hand, when he was victorious, he would make an offer to Metellus or Pompey, to lay down his arms, on condition he might be permitted to return in the capacity of a private man. He said he had rather be the meanest citizen in Rome than an exile with the command of all the other countries in the world.—PLUTARCH'S SERTORIUS.

4074. PATRIOTISM, Unselfish. Bismarck. He adopted it as the aim of his public life "to snatch Germany from Austrian oppression," and to gather round Prussia, in a North German Confederation, all the States "whose tone of thought, religion, manners, and interests" were in harmony with those of Prussia. "To attain this end," he once said in conversation, "I would brave all dangers—exile, the scaffold itself! What matter if they hang me, provided the rope by which I am hung binds this new Germany firmly to the Prussian throne!"—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 633.

4075. ——. General Reed. During the American Revolution, while General Reed was president of Congress, the British commissioners offered him a bribe of 10,000 guineas to desert the cause of his country. His reply was, "Gentlemen, I am poor, very poor; but your king is not rich enough to buy me."

4076. PATRIOTISM, Vicious. Scotchmen. Samuel Johnson . . . was outrageous upon his supposition that my countrymen "loved Scotland better than truth," saying, "All of them—nay, not all, but drowes of them—would come up and attest anything for the honor of Scotland."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 237.

4077. PATRIOTISM, Violent. Excitement from Stamp Act, A.D. 1765. [Governor] Colden himself retired within the fort. . . . In the evening a vast torch-light procession, carrying a scaffold and two images—one of the governor and the other of the devil—came from the fields—now the park—down Broadway, to within ten . . . feet of the fort, knocked at its gate, broke open the governor's coach-house, took out his chariot, carried the images upon it round town, and returned to burn them, with his own carriages and sleighs, before his eyes on Bowling Green, under the gaze of the garrison on the ramparts, and all New York gathered round.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 19.

4078. PATRIOTISM of Woman. "Captain Molly." She was the [Irish] wife of a matross in Proctor's artillery. At one of the guns . . . six men had been killed or wounded. It was deemed an unlucky gun, and murmurs arose that it should be . . . abandoned. At this juncture, while Captain Molly was serving some water for the refreshment of the men, her husband received a shot in the head and fell lifeless under the wheels of the piece. The heroine threw down the pail of water, and crying to her dead consort, "Lie there, my darling, while I revenge ye," grasped the ramrod the lifeless hand had just relinquished, sent home the charge, and called to the matrosses to prime and fire. . . . She kept to her post till night closed the action.—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 5.

4079. PATRIOTISM of Woman. Lydia Darrah. After the battle of Germantown Washington took up his headquarters at Whitemarsh, twelve miles from Philadelphia. Winter was approaching, and the patriots began to suffer for food and clothing. Howe, knowing the distressed condition of the Americans, determined to surprise their camp. On the evening of the 2d of December he held a council of war, and it was decided to march against Washington the following night. But Lydia Darrah, at whose house the council was held, overheard the plan of the enemies of her country. On the following morning she obtained a passport from Lord Howe, left the city on the pretence of going to mill, rode rapidly to the American lines, and sent information of the impending attack to Washington.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 40, p. 327.

4080. PATRONAGE, Age of. Anglo-Saxons. Even the inhabitants of towns placed themselves under the protection of some particular nobleman, and feeling the ties of that connection more strongly than any other, were accustomed to look up to his patronage as that of a sovereign. The laws even favored these ideas. A client, though a freeman, was supposed so much to belong to his patron, that his murderer was obliged to pay a fine to the latter, as a compensation for his loss, in like manner as he paid a fine to the master for the murder of a slave.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 6, p. 119.

4081. PATRONAGE, Division of. James II. Even [William] Penn, intemperate and undiscerning as was his zeal for the Declaration, seems to have felt that the partiality with which honors and emoluments were heaped on Roman Catholics might not unnaturally excite the jealousy of the nation. . . . One of Penn's schemes was that a law should be passed dividing the patronage of the crown into three equal parts, and that to one only of those parts members of the church of Rome should be admitted. Even under such an arrangement the members of the Church of Rome would have obtained nearly twenty times their fair portion of official appointments.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 222.

4082. PATRONAGE, Governmental. American Colonies. In 1758 America had been called "the hospital of England," the places in the gift of the crown being filled "with broken Members of Parliament," of bad, if any, principle, valets de chambre, electioneering scoundrels, and even lively servants.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 20, p. 310.

4083. PATRONAGE, Ill-timed. Lord Chesterfield's. [After completing his dictionary, Samuel Johnson wrote:] Seven years, my lord, have now past since I waited in your outward rooms, or was repulsed from your door [he had been kept waiting while inferior men were given audience], during which time I have been pushing on my work through difficulties, of which it is useless to complain, and have brought it at last to the verge of publication, without one act of assistance, one word of encouragement, or one smile of favor. Such treatment I did not expect, for I never had a patron before. Is not a patron, my lord, one who looks with unconcern on a man struggling for life in the water, and, when he has reached ground, encumbers him with help? The notice which you have been pleased to take of my labors, had it been early, had been kind; but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it; till I am solitary, and cannot impart it; till I am known, and do not want it.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 68.

4084. PATRONAGE, Immense. Centennial. The daily attendance at the exhibition grounds during the summer varied from 5000 to 275,000, and the interest in the Centennial was intensified near its close. The whole number of visitors attending the exposition, as shown by the registry of the gates, was 9,786,151. The daily average attendance was 61,938. The grounds were open for 158 days, and the total receipts for admission were $3,761,598.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 68, p. 628.

4085. PATRONAGE, Partiality in. James II. How obstinately James was determined to bestow on the members of his own church a share of patronage altogether out of proportion to their numbers and importance is proved by the instructions which, in exile and old age, he drew up for the guidance of his son. It is impossible to read without mingled pity and derision those effusions of a mind on which all the discipline of experience and adversity had been exhausted in vain. The pretender is advised, if ever he should reign in England, to make a partition of offices, and carefully to reserve for the members of the Church of Rome a portion which might have sufficed for them if they had been one half instead of one fiftieth part of the nation. One secretary of state, one commissioner of the treasury, the secretary at war, the majority of the great dignitaries of the household, the majority of the officers of the army, are always to be Catholics.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 221.

4087. PEACE, Commonwealth of. William Penn. [In the establishment of Pennsylvania, Penn] . . . declared that his objects were to found a free commonwealth without respect to the color, race, or religion of the inhabitants; to establish a refuge for the people of his own faith; and to enlarge the borders of the British empire.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 25, p. 209.

4088. PEACE, Disgraceful. Montezuma. For months there was almost incessant fighting in and around the city; and it became evident that the Spaniards must ultimately be overwhelmed and destroyed. To save himself from his peril, Cortez adopted a second shameless expedient, more wicked than the first. Montezuma [who had been captured by Cortez] was compelled to go upon the top of the palace in front of the great square where the besiegers were gathered, and to counsel them to make peace with the Spaniards. For a moment there was universal silence, then a murmur of vexation and rage, and then Montezuma was struck down by the javelins of his own subjects. In a few days he died of wretchedness and despair, and for a while the warriors, overwhelmed with remorse, abandoned the conflict. But with the renewal of the strife Cortez was obliged to leave the city. Finally a great battle was fought, and the Spanish arms and valor triumphed. In the crises of the struggle the sacred Mexican banner was struck down and captured. Dismay seized the hosts of puny warriors, and they fled in all directions.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 4, p. 61.

4089. PEACE, Evidence of. Reign of Charles II. There were still to be seen, on the capes of the sea-coast, and on many inland hills, tall posts surmounted by barrels. Once these barrels had been filled with pitch. Watchmen had been set round them in seasons of danger; and, within a few hours after a Spanish sail had been discovered in the Channel, or after a thousand Scottish moss-troopers had crossed the Tweed, the signal fires were blazing fifty miles off, and whole counties were rising in arms. But many years had now elapsed since the beacons had been lighted, and they were regarded rather as curious relics of ancient manners than as parts of a machinery necessary to the safety of the State.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 271.

4090. PEACE, Fear of. Pompey. "Is there hope of peace?" he [Cæsar] wrote, in reporting what had passed. "So far as I can gather from his very full expressions to me, he does not desire it. For he thinks thus: If Cæsar be made consul, even after he has parted from his army, the constitution will be at an end. I thought, when he was speaking, of the uncertainties of war; but I was relieved to hear a man of courage and experience talk like a statesman of the dangers of an insincere settlement. Not only does he not seek for peace, but he seems to fear it."—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 20.

4091. PEACE, Joys of. War of 1812. The agents of the United States were John Quincy Adams, James A. Bayard, Henry Clay, Jonathan Russell, and Albert Gallatin. Several months were spent in negotiations, and on the 24th of December, 1814, a treaty was agreed to and signed. In England the news was received with deep satisfaction; in the United States with a delight bordering on madness. Before the terms of settlement could be known, the people broke forth in universal jubilee. Nobody stopped to inquire whether the treaty was good or bad, honorable or dishonorable. The Federalists found abundant reason for rejoicing that a war which they had persistently opposed as impolitic and unjust was at an end. The Democrats sent up a double huzza, shouting first for Jackson's victory and afterward for peace. Nor could the country well be blamed for rejoicing that a conflict that had cost the United States 1683 vessels and more than 18,000 sailors was ended. The war cloud rolled away like an incubus from the public mind.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 51, p. 414.

4092. PEACE, Messengers of. American Indians. That the words of friendship might be transmitted safely through the wilderness, the red men revered the peace-pipe. The person of him that travelled with it was sacred; he could disarm the young warrior as by a spell, and secure himself a fearless welcome in every cabin.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

4093. PEACE, Perpetual. French Treaty. "We have thrown the hatchet," said the Mohawks, "so high in the air, and beyond the skies, that no arm on earth can reach to bring it down."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 20.

4094. PEACE, Pledges of. William Penn. [On beginning his duties as chief magistrate,] a great conference was appointed with the native chiefs. . . . Penn, accompanied by a few unarmed friends, clad in the simple garb of the Quakers, came to the appointed spot. . . . The chieftains, also unarmed, sat in a semicircle on the ground. . . . Standing before them and speaking by an interpreter, he said: "My friends, we have met on the broad pathway of good faith. We are all one flesh and blood. Being brethren, no advantage shall be taken on either side. When disputes arise we will settle them in council. Between us there shall be nothing but openness and love." The chiefs replied, "While the rivers run and the sun shines we will live in peace with the children of William Penn." No record was made of the treaty, for none was needed. Its terms were written, not on decaying parchment, but on the living hearts of men. No deed of violence or injustice ever marred the sacred covenant. The Indians vied with the Quakers in keeping unbroken the pledge of perpetual peace. For more than seventy years, during which the province remained under the control of the Friends, not a single warwhoop was heard within the borders of Pennsylvania. The Quaker hat and coat proved to be a better defence for the wearer than coat-of-mail and musket.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 25, p. 212.

4095. PEACE vs. Pride. Thebans. Thebes was now necessarily involved in a war with Sparta; but she had the assistance of Athens. With this respectable aid she was, perhaps, a match for her powerful antagonist, but she did not long enjoy the advantage of that alliance. Persia, which since the last peace had acquired a title to mediate in the affairs of Greece, brought about an overture of accommodation between the contending States. All articles were agreed upon, when a small punctilio exasperated the Thebans. They could not bear that their name should be classed among the inferior States of Greece; and Sparta was determined that it should. Neither party would yield, and Thebes was entirely struck out of the treaty, which was acceded to by all the other republics. [War followed.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3, p. 163.

4096. PEACE, Principles of. Primitive Christians. The Christians were not less averse to the business than to the pleasures of this world. The defence of our persons and property they knew not how to reconcile with the patient doctrine which enjoined an unlimited forgiveness of past injuries, and commanded them to invite the repetition of fresh insults. Their simplicity was offended by the use of oaths, by the pomp of magistracy, and by the active contention of public life; nor could their humane ignorance be convinced that it was lawful on any occasion to shed the blood of our fellow-creatures, either by the sword of justice, or by that of war, even though their criminal or hostile attempts should threaten the peace and safety of the whole community.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 15, p. 555.

4097. PEACE, A provoking. Peace of Utrecht. A.D. 1713. By the peace of Utrecht Belgium was compelled to forego the advantages with which she had been endowed by the God of nature; to gratify commercial jealousy, Antwerp was denied the use of the deep waters that flowed by her walls; and afterward the Austrian efforts at trade with the East Indies were suffocated in their infancy. This policy was an open violation of international justice, a fraud upon humanity, a restriction by covenant of national industry and prosperity. . . . It was possible that . . . a wise ruler might one day be penetrated with indignation at the outrage. . . . With regard to France, . . . England extorted the covenant, that the port of Dunkirk should be not merely abandoned, but filled up. A treaty of peace contained a stipulation for the ruin of a harbor!—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

4098. PEACE, Signal for. Marquette, the Jesuit Missionary. [Exploring the Mississippi.] Near the latitude of 32°, on the Mississippi. "Now," thought Marquette, "we must indeed ask the aid of the Virgin." Armed with bows and arrows, with clubs, axes, and bucklers, amid continual whoops, the natives, bent on war, embarked in vast canoes, made out of the trunks of hollow trees; but, at the sight of the mysterious peace-pipe held aloft, God touched the hearts of the old men, who checked the impetuosity of the young; and throwing their bows and quivers into the canoes, as a token of peace, they prepared a hospitable welcome.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 20.

4099. PEACE, Truce for. Truce of God. [The Church in France made great endeavors to repress violence and tyranny.] The result was the institution of the "Truce of God" (1041), which provided that all hostilities, public and private, should be suspended from the Wednesday evening in each week until the following Monday morning, that period being marked out for sanctification in memory of the passion and resurrection of the Redeemer. The entire seasons of Advent and Lent, together with all the great festivals, were included in this merciful prohibition. Offenders against the "Truce of God" incurred the penalty of death, which might be commuted, however, by pecuniary fine; they were liable also to excommunication and banishment.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 7, § 8.

4100. PEACE, Unusual. Temple. At the end of the first Punic war the temple of Janus was shut—an event which had not happened since the reign of Numa—that is, near five hundred years. In a few years it was again opened, and never shut till the reign of Augustus.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9, p. 371.

4101. PENALTY, Excessive. Reign of George III. A.D. 1772. Hutchinson [Governor of Massachusetts] wished to see a beginning of taking men prisoners and carrying them directly to England. There now existed a statute authorizing such a procedure. . . . An act for the better securing of dockyards, ships, and stores, which extended to the colonies, made death the penalty for destroying even the oar of a cutler's boat or the head of an empty cask belonging to the fleet, and subjected the accused to trial in any county in Great Britain.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 47.

4102. PENALTY, Partisan. Reign of James II. The fame and fortunes of [the Earl of] Devonshire were . . . under a cloud. He had an unfortunate quarrel with the court, arising, not from a public and honorable cause, but from a private brawl. . . . He had gone to Whitehall to pay his duty, and had there been insulted by a man named Colepepper, one of a set of bravos who infested the purlieus of the court, and who attempted to curry favor with the government by affronting members of the Opposition. . . . While this feud was at its height, the earl met Colepepper in the drawing-room at Whitehall, and fancied that he saw triumph and defiance in the bully's countenance. Nothing unseemly passed in the royal sight; but, as soon as the enemies had left the presence chamber, Devonshire proposed that they should instantly decide their disputes with their swords. This challenge was refused. Then the high-spirited peer forgot the respect which he owed to the place where he stood and to his own character, and struck Colepepper in the face with a cane. . . . A criminal information was filed in the King's Bench. . . . The judges waited in a body on Jeffreys, who insisted that they should impose a fine of not less than £30,000.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 231.

4103. PENANCE, Failure of. Experiment. Bartley Campbell, an Irish Papist, became profoundly awakened with anxiety for a better faith than popery had taught him. He called on his priest, who could not understand his difficulties. He said many prayers, submitted to severe penances, obtained absolution, but found no relief to his troubled conscience. He made a pilgrimage of forty Irish miles to St. Patrick's purgatory, at Loughbery, in Donegal County, where it was supposed all sins could be expiated. He went through the required ceremonies, and received absolution from the officiating priest; but his conscience was more disquieted than ever. Before he left again he applied to the priest. "Did not I give you absolution?" asked the latter. "You did, father." "And do you deny the authority of the Church?" "By no means; but my soul is in misery. What shall I do?" "Do!" said the priest, "why, go to bed and sleep." "Sleep!" exclaimed the awakened man; "no, father; perhaps I may awake in hell." The priest threatened him with a horsewhip. The penitent hastened to a retired place, threw himself on the ground, and, with tears and groans, prayed for light from God. There he found peace in believing on Christ alone. He returned to the numerous pilgrims who were performing their prescribed penances upon bared and bleeding knees, . . . and exhorted them to seek God through Christ, assuring them that they should obtain peace, as he had.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 3, p. 411.

4104. PENANCE, Royal. Henry II. He was alarmed by an irruption from William, King of Scotland. Returning to England, he found the ancient leaven of disaffection, on account of Becket's murder, revived, and violently fermenting in the breasts of his subjects. To conciliate their minds, he resolved on expiating his alleged guilt by the most solemn penance and humiliation. He walked barefooted through the city of Canterbury, and, on arriving at the cathedral, prostrated himself on the ground before the tomb of the martyr, and passed a day and night in fasting and prayer; not satisfied with this mortification, he submitted his bare shoulders to be scourged by the monks of the chapter. Absolved now from all his offences, reconciled to the church and to his subjects, he prepared to revenge the depredations of the Scots.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 8, p. 143.

4105. PENITENCE, Royal. Roman Emperor Theodosius. The public penance of the Emperor Theodosius has been recorded as one of the most honorable events in the annals of the church. According to the mildest rules of ecclesiastical discipline, which were established in the fourth century, the crime of homicide was expiated by the penitence of twenty years; and as it was impossible, in the period of human life, to purge the accumulated guilt of the massacre of Thessalonica, the murderer should have been excluded from the holy communion till the hour of his death. But the archbishop, consulting the maxims of religious policy, granted some indulgence to the rank of his illustrious penitent. . . . It was sufficient that the emperor of the Romans, stripped of the ensigns of royalty, should appear in a mournful and suppliant posture; and that, in the midst of the church of Milan, he should humbly solicit, with signs and tears, the pardon of his sins. In this spiritual cure, Ambrose employed the various methods of mildness and severity. After a delay of about eight months Theodosius was restored to the communion of the faithful.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 27, p. 117.

4106. PEOPLE, Spirited. Public Spirit. The contests with the natives, not less than with New England, displayed the feebleness of New Netherland. The province had no popular freedom, and therefore no public spirit. In New England there were no poor; in New Netherland the poor were so numerous it was difficult to provide for their relief. The Puritans easily supported schools everywhere, and Latin schools in the larger villages; on Manhattan a Latin school lingered . . . two years, and was discontinued. In New England the people, in the hour of danger, rose involuntarily, and defended themselves; in the Dutch province men were unwilling to go to the relief even of villages that were in danger from the Indians, and demanded protection from the [East India] Company, which claimed to be their absolute sovereign.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

4107. PEOPLE, "Unreasonable." Liberties. The people of New Hampshire were greatly excited by the threatened destruction of their liberties. Before Cranfield's arrival the rugged sawyers and lumbermen of the Piscataqua had convened a general assembly at Portsmouth. The first resolution which was passed by the representatives showed the spirit of colonial resistance in full force. "No act, imposition, law or ordinance," said the sturdy legislators, "shall be valid unless made by the assembly and approved by the people." When the indignant king heard of this resolution, he declared it to be both wicked and absurd. It was not the first time that a monarch and his people had disagreed. In November of 1682 Cranfield dismissed the popular assembly. Such a despotic act had never before been attempted in New England. The excitement ran high; the governor was openly denounced, and his claims for rents and forfeitures were stubbornly resisted. At Exeter the sheriff was beaten with clubs. The farmers' wives met the tax-gatherers with pailfuls of hot water. At the village of Hampton Cranfield's deputy was led out of town with a rope round his neck. When the governor ordered out the militia not a man obeyed the summons. It was in the midst of these broils that Cranfield, unable to collect his rents, and vexed out of his wits, wrote to England begging the privilege of going home. The "unreasonable" people, who were all the time cavilling at his commission and denying his authority, were at length freed from his presence.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 23, p. 200.

4108. PERFECTION by Development. John Milton. The commonly received notion, therefore, with which authors, as they age, are wont to comfort themselves, that one of the greatest feats of original invention achieved by man was begun after fifty, must be thus far modified. "Paradise Lost" was composed after fifty, but was conceived at thirty-two. Hence the high degree of perfection realized in the total result. For there were combined to produce it the opposite virtues of two distinct periods of mental development—the daring imagination and fresh emotional play of early manhood, with the exercised judgment and chastened taste of ripened years.—MILTON, BY M. PATTISON, ch. 13.

4109. PERFIDY resented. Bourbon. A most formidable combination seemed now ready to overwhelm Francis I., under which a monarch of less spirit and abilities than himself must certainly have succumbed at once. The pope, the emperor, the King of England, the Archduke Ferdinand—to whom his brother, Charles V., had ceded the German dominions of the house of Austria—were all united against the King of France. . . . An iniquitous decree of the parliament of Paris, by which the constable [of Bourbon] was deprived of the whole estates belonging to the family of Bourbon, was the cause of an irreconcilable animosity, and of a firm purpose of vengeance now meditated by the constable against the King of France. He immediately offered his services to the emperor; and, like another Coriolanus, with equal valor and ability, and with equal infamy, became the determined enemy of his country. The emperor received him, as may be believed, with open arms; but in the breast of every worthy man his conduct excited that detestation which it merited. Even the Spanish officers themselves abhorred his perfidy. "If the constable of Bourbon," said one of these generals, "should enter my house, I would burn it after his departure, as a place polluted by treason and perfidy."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 19, p. 280.

4110. PERIL, Familiar. Forgotten. When Persia was governed by the descendants of Sefi, a race of princes whose wanton cruelty often stained their divan, their table, and their bed with the blood of their favorites, there is a saying recorded of a young nobleman, that he never departed from the sultan's presence without satisfying himself whether his head was still on his shoulders. The experience of every day might almost justify the scepticism of Rustan. Yet the fatal sword, suspended above him by a single thread, seems not to have disturbed the slumbers or interrupted the tranquillity of the Persian. The monarch's crown, he well knew, could level him with the dust; but the stroke of lightning or apoplexy might be equally fatal; and it was the part of a wise man to forget the inevitable calamities of human life in the enjoyment of the fleeting hour.—GIBBON'S ROME.

4111. PERIL, Pleasure in. William, Prince of Orange. Sometimes, however, it seemed that he had a strange pleasure in venturing his person. It was remarked that his spirits were never so high and his manners never so gracious and easy as amid the tumult and carnage of a battle.

Even in his pastimes he liked the excitement of danger. Cards, chess, and billiards gave him no pleasure. The chase was his favorite recreation; and he loved it most when it was most hazardous. His leaps were sometimes such that his boldest companions did not like to follow him. He seems even to have thought the most hardy field-sports of England effeminate, and to have pined in the great park of Windsor for the game which he had been used to drive to bay in the forests of Guelders, wolves, and wild boars, and huge stags with sixteen antlers.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 155.

4112. PERJURY, Punishment of. Romans. The corrupt or malicious witness was thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock, to expiate his falsehood, which was rendered still more fatal by the severity of the penal laws and the deficiency of written evidence.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 372.

4113. PERSECUTION, Arian. Catholics. The Catholics, more especially under the reign of Hunneric, endured the most cruel and ignominious treatment. Respectable citizens, noble matrons, and consecrated virgins were stripped naked, and raised in the air by pulleys, with a weight suspended at their feet. In this painful attitude their naked bodies were torn with scourges, or burnt in the most tender parts with red-hot plates of iron. The amputation of the ears, the nose, the tongue, and the right hand was inflicted by the Arians; and although the precise number cannot be defined, it is evident that many persons, among whom a bishop and a proconsul may be named, were entitled to the crown of martyrdom.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 37, p. 553.

4114. PERSECUTION, Artful. Roman Emperor Julian. He forbade the persecution of the Christians, whom he represented as deluded men, the objects of compassion, not of punishment; but declared, at the same time, that their frenzy incapacitated them from all employments, civil or military. Their law, he said, prohibited all quarrels and dissensions; it was not, therefore, necessary that they should have the benefit of courts of justice to decide their differences. He prohibited them from teaching or learning grammar, rhetoric, or philosophy. These, he said, were pagan sciences, treated of by authors whose principles the Christians were taught to abhor, and whose books contained tenets which must shock the pure morality of their religion.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 3, p. 519.

4115. PERSECUTION, Bloody. In Ireland. [Catholics arose against the Protestants.] They prolonged the martyrdom and sufferings of both sexes, that they might the longer revel in this infernal pastime. They caused blood to fall drop by drop, and life to ebb by lengthened gasps, that their revengeful fury might be the more indulged. The murders spread by degrees over every district of Ireland, except Dublin, where a feeble body of royal troops preserved the peace. The corpses of more than one hundred thousand victims, men, women, children, the infirm and aged, strewed the thresholds of their habitations and the fields that they had cultivated in common with their destroyers. The flames in which their villages were enveloped were extinguished only in their blood. All who escaped by flight the fury of their assassins, carrying their infants in their arms to the summits of the mountains, perished of inanition and cold in the snows of winter. Ireland appeared to open, to become the tomb of half the sons she had brought forth.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 26.

4116. PERSECUTION of Catholics. Maryland. A.D. 1704. In the land which Catholics had opened to Protestants . . . mass might not be said publicly. No Catholic priest or bishop might utter his faith in a voice of persuasion. No Catholic might teach the young. If the wayward child of a papist would but become an apostate, the law wrested for him from his parents a share of their property. . . . Such were the methods adopted "to prevent the growth of Popery."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 19.

4117. ———. Ireland. A.D. 1763. Such priests as were permitted to reside in Ireland were required to be registered, and were kept like prisoners at large within prescribed limits. All "papists," exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction, all monks, friars, and regular priests, and all priests not then actually in parishes, and to be registered, were banished from Ireland under pain of transportation, and on a return, of being hanged, drawn, and quartered.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 4.

4118. ———. Dilemma. [In 1568 the pope's authority was abolished in Scotland,] and all heretics and hearers of mass were declared liable to various punishments. In 1584 Catholics in England were called upon to say if the pope were to absolve them from their oath of allegiance, and to attack England, what they should do, and which side they should support. The miserable, frightened men knew not how to extricate themselves from the dilemma. They answered that they would render unto God what was God's, and unto Cæsar what was Cæsar's; but this evasion was interpreted into a confession by their judges. Thus the prisons were filled; execution followed upon execution, and Catholicism in its turn had its martyrs. . . . In 1584 all Jesuits, seminary priests, and other priests were commanded by Act of Parliament to depart from the kingdom within forty days, on pain of being adjudged traitors; and penalties were to be inflicted upon those who, knowing any priest to be within the realm, should not denounce him to a magistrate. These intolerant enactments produced the very opposite consequences that were contemplated by the legislators.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 10, p. 181.

4119. PERSECUTION, Catholic. Huguenots. [By Louis XIV. the] Huguenots were excluded from all public functions, from the liberal professions, from the universities, from engaging in various branches of commerce and industry. They were forbidden to intermarry with Catholics, and their children were encouraged to forsake the faith of their parents by being declared capable of choosing for themselves at the age of seven years. . . . Squadrons of dragoons . . . were quartered on the inhabitants, who abandoned themselves to every kind of brutal violence and excess, establishing a "reign of terror" wherever they appeared. These atrocious "dragonnades" completely broke the spirit of the wretched population, and they submitted in despair. "Not a post arrives," wrote Madame de Maintenon in September, 1685, "without bringing the king tidings which fill him with joy; the conversions take place every day by thousands." Sixty thousand persons are said to have embraced Catholicism in Guienne in the course of one month; twenty thousand abjured in Béarn; eighty thousand in the two dioceses of Nîmes and Montpellier. . . . On the 17th of October, 1685, he [Louis XIV.] signed the celebrated decree called the REVOCATION OF THE EDICT OF NANTES. Acting merely by his own despotic authority, the king annulled forever all the privileges granted to the Huguenots by Henry IV. and Louis XIII.; absolutely prohibited the exercise of their religion throughout the kingdom, with the sole exception of Alsace; ordered their temples to be levelled with the ground, and their ministers to quit France within fifteen days; forbade the Reformers to follow their pastors into exile under pain of confiscation and condemnation to the galleys; and required their children to be baptized henceforth by the Catholic priests, and educated as members of the Established Church. Frightful cruelties followed the publication of this decree. Multitudes of the Reformed, obstinately refusing obedience, were consigned to loathsome dungeons, racked with exquisite tortures, and treated with every kind of outrage short of actual murder. Numbers of females were immured for life in convents; infants were torn from the arms of their mothers; property was destroyed, and whole districts laid desolate.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 22, § 11.

4120. PERSECUTION compared. Massachusetts vs. Netherlands. In Spain more persons have been burned for their opinions than Massachusetts then [in 1658] contained inhabitants. Under Charles V., in the Netherlands alone, the number of those who were hanged, beheaded, buried alive, or burned for religious opinion was fifty thousand, says Father Paul; the whole carnage amounted, says Grotius, to not less than one hundred thousand. America was guilty of the death of four individuals [who were Quakers].—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

4121. PERSECUTION of Covenanters. Meetings. [James II. procured penal laws against the Scotch covenanters, providing] that the punishment of death and confiscation of land and goods should be awarded against those who should preach in a conventicle under a roof, or should attend a conventicle in the open air, either as preacher or auditor.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 24, p. 384.

4122. PERSECUTION, Cruel. Jews. A.D. 1189. [At the coronation feast of Richard I.] the chief men of the Jews came to offer presents to the king. They had been forbidden to come, but they came with gifts, and were therefore bold. The common people . . . rushed upon the Jews, stripped them, and cast them forth out of the king's hall with wounds and blows. The citizens of London, following the example, attacked and murdered the Jews in the city, and burnt their houses. . . . At York a body of armed men entered the city and commenced their work of plunder and massacre, by attacking the house of a Jew who had perished in the riot of London.

All the Jews of York then claimed shelter in the castle. They were admitted to the number of five hundred. The governor went away; and, upon his return, the Jews, alarmed for their safety, refused him readmission. The fortress was attacked on all sides, and ransoms were refused. Then the desperate race, all except a few, put their wives and children to death, and stabbed each other, that they might not fall into the hands of their cruel enemies. The few who shrank from this terrible self-sacrifice were murdered.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 21, p. 306.

4123. PERSECUTION, Exterminating. Albigenses. The crusading army, under the guidance of the Pope's legate, Amaury, Abbot of Cîteaux, and Simon, Count de Montford, marched into Languedoc, and besieged the town of Béziers, which was stormed on the 22d of July, 1209. A horrible massacre ensued; the whole population was indiscriminately put to the sword. One of the superior officers inquired of the Abbot of Cîteaux how they were to distinguish the heretics from the faithful: "Slay them all!" returned the savage churchmen, "for the Lord knoweth those that are His!" Not a living soul was spared, and the city was afterward pillaged and reduced to ashes.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 8, § 13.

4124. PERSECUTION by Goths. Athanasius [the Goth] disdained the yoke of the [Roman] empire, and of the gospel. The faith of the new converts was tried by the persecution which he excited. A wagon, bearing aloft the shapeless image of Thor, perhaps, or of Woden, was conducted in solemn procession through the streets of the camp; and the rebels, who refused to worship the god of their fathers, were immediately burnt, with their tents and families.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 37, p. 542.

4125. PERSECUTION of Heretics. English. In the reign of Richard II. the Commons would not permit that the Church should imprison heretics without the king's consent. Now [A.D. 1401] heretics were to be burnt on the sole sentence of the ecclesiastical courts. . . . The first victim was William Salter, a London clergyman.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 3, p. 45.

4126. PERSECUTION, Impolitic. Huguenots. The edict of Nantes had been passed in the reign of Henry IV., giving the Protestants liberty of conscience, and had been confirmed by Louis XIII., under certain restrictions with regard to public worship. Louis [XIV.] revoked the edict; the whole Huguenot churches were demolished, the ministers banished, and, what was a refinement of persecution, the Protestants were at the same time prohibited, under the severest penalties, from quitting the kingdom. That prohibition, however, was ineffectual, and above 500,000 people made their escape out of France, and, carrying with them all their property, found a welcome asylum in Germany, Switzerland, Holland, and England. By this most impolitic measure France sustained a very severe loss, not only in the article of population, but in commerce and manufactures. [See No. 4144.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 34, p. 462.

4127. PERSECUTION ineffective. Wycliffe. In 1441 the Council of Constance . . . decreed that the body of Wycliffe should be "taken from the ground and thrown far away from the burial of any church." It was thirteen years before this miserable vengeance was carried into effect, by disinterring and burning our first English reformer's body, throwing his ashes into a brook. "The brook did convey his ashes into Avon; Avon into Severn; Severn into the narrow seas; they into the main ocean; and thus the ashes of Wycliffe are the emblem of his doctrine, which is now dispersed all the world over."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 4, p. 54.

4128. PERSECUTION of Jews. France. [In 1321] the popular fury was once more directed against the unfortunate Jews, who never failed to suffer in every fresh outbreak of persecution. They were hurried indiscriminately to the stake, without the semblance of any judicial procedure; at Chinon, in Touraine, an enormous pit was dug near the castle, a fire lighted at the bottom, and one hundred and sixty wretched victims of both sexes hurled, pell-mell, into the flames. The richer class were kept in prison until an account had been obtained of their property and of the amount of their claims acquired by lending money; these the king transferred to his own credit; and a sum of 150,000 livres is said to have been thus added to the royal treasury.—STUDENTS' HISTORY OF FRANCE, ch. 9, § 23.

4129. PERSECUTION by the Persecuted. Quakers. In July of 1656 the Quakers began to arrive at Boston. The first who came were Ann Austin and Mary Fisher. The introduction of the plague would have occasioned less alarm. The two women were caught and searched for marks of witchcraft, their trunks were broken open, their books were burned by the hangman, and they themselves thrown into prison. After several weeks' confinement they were brought forth and banished from the colony; before the end of the year eight others had been arrested and sent back to England. The delegates of the union were immediately convened, and a rigorous law was passed excluding all Quakers from the country. Whipping, the loss of one ear, and banishment were the penalties for the first offence; after a second conviction the other ear should be cut off; and should the criminal again return, his tongue should be bored through with a red-hot iron. In 1657 Ann Burden, who had come from London to preach against persecution, was seized and beaten with twenty stripes. Others came, were whipped and exiled. As the law became more cruel and proscriptive, fresh victims rushed forward to brave its terrors. The assembly of the four colonies again convened, and advised the authorities of Massachusetts to pronounce the penalty of death against the fanatical disturbers of the public peace.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 14, p. 136.

4130. PERSECUTION powerless. Martyrs. Bonner, Bishop of London, . . . asked a youth who was brought before him whether he thought he could bear the fire. The boy at once held his hand without flinching in the flame of a candle that stood by. Rogers, a fellow-worker with Tyndale in the translation of the Bible, and one of the foremost among the Protestant preachers, died bathing his hands in the flame "as if it had been in cold water." Even the commonest lives gleamed for a moment into poetry at the stake. "Pray for me," a boy, William Brown, who had been brought home to Brentwood to suffer, asked of the bystanders. "I will pray no more for thee," one of them replied, "than I will pray for a dog." "Then," said William, "Son of God, shine upon me;" and immediately the sun in the elements shone out of a dark cloud so full in his face that he was constrained to look another way; whereat the people mused, because it was so dark a little time before.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 661.

4131. PERSECUTION by Protestants. English. The Presbyterian Parliament of England became more violent for conformity than the Court of High Commission which the Parliament had destroyed. . . . The imposition of the covenant upon all the benefited clergy was the declaration of an intolerant tyranny against the most conscientious.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 2, p. 30.

4132. PERSECUTION of Protestants. Ireland. [Thirty thousand Catholics, with Sir Phelim O'Neal at their head, attacked the Puritan settlers in the north of Ireland.] They were driven from their houses in an inclement season. They fled to the hills and morasses, where they perished of hunger. They were put to death with all the horrors that only savages and fanatics can inflict. Women and children were murdered with relentless fury. Clarendon says: "About forty or fifty thousand of the English Protestants were murdered before they suspected themselves to be in danger."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 28, p. 464.

4133. — — — Francis I. In January, 1535, the king presided at a solemn ceremonial of expiation at Paris, after which six wretched victims were committed to the flames with horrible refinements of torture; a machine had been invented by which they were alternately lowered into the fire and withdrawn again, so as to prolong their sufferings to the utmost.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 14, § 12.

4134. — — — Francis I. Francis disgraced the concluding years of his reign by measures of the most barbarous severity toward the unfortunate Protestants of Provence. The Vaudois, as they were called, a simple, inoffensive, and loyal population, inhabited a few obscure towns and villages in the vicinity of Avignon and Aix. Orders were suddenly sent down to the Parliament of Provence, in January, 1545, to exterminate these helpless peasants, who were denounced as dangerous heretics; and the sentence was at once executed with a ferocious cruelty unparalleled in history. Three towns and twenty-two hamlets were totally destroyed; three thousand of their inhabitants, among whom were numbers of women and children, unresistingly butchered in cold blood; seven hundred condemned for life to the galleys. Similar horrors were renewed in the following year at Meaux, where sixty of the Reformed Church, all mechanics or peasants, were sentenced to various degrees of rigorous punishment, and fourteen were burnt together at the stake. [See No. 4145.]—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 14, § 16.

4135. PERSECUTION by Puritans. In Massachusetts. A fine was imposed on such as should entertain any "of the accursed sect;" and a Quaker, after the first conviction, was to lose one ear; after the second, another; after the third, to have the tongue bored with a hot iron. It was but for a very short time that the menace of these enormities found place in the statute-book.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

4136. PERSECUTION, Reaction of. Queen Mary's. The work of terror failed in the very ends of which it was wrought. The old spirit of insolent defiance, of outrageous violence, rose into fresh life at the challenge of persecution. A Protestant hung a string of puddings round a priest's neck in derision of his beads. The restored images were grossly insulted. The old scurrilous ballads against the mass and relics were heard in the streets. Men were goaded to sheer madness by the bloodshed and violence about them. One miserable wretch, driven to frenzy, stabbed the priest of St. Margaret's as he stood with the chalice in his hand. It was a more formidable sign of the times that acts of violence such as these no longer stirred the people at large to their former resentment. The horror of the persecution swept away all other feelings. Every death at the stake won hundreds to the cause for which the victims died. "You have lost the hearts of twenty thousand that were rank papists within these twelve months," a Protestant wrote triumphantly to Bonner.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 662.

4137. — — — Joan of Arc. Twenty years afterward the two venerable friars, simple monks, vowed to poverty, and having nothing to hope or fear in this world, bear witness to the scene we have just described. "We heard her," they say, "in the midst of the flames invoke her saints, her archangel; several times she called on her Saviour. . . . At the last, as her head sunk on her bosom, she shrieked, 'Jesus!'" "Ten thousand men wept. . . ." A few of the English alone laughed, or endeavored to laugh. One of the most furious among them had sworn that he would throw a fagot on the pile. Just as he brought it she breathed her last. He was taken ill. His comrades led him to a tavern to recruit his spirits by drink, but he was beyond recovery. "I saw," he exclaimed, in his frantic despair—"I saw a dove fly out of her mouth with her last sigh." Others had read in the flames the word "Jesus," which she so often repeated. The executioner repaired in the evening to Brother Isambart, full of consternation, and confessed himself, but felt persuaded that God would never pardon him. . . . One of the English king's secretaries said aloud, on returning from the dismal scene, "We are lost; we have burnt a saint."—MICHELET'S JOAN, p. 59.

4138. — — — Puritans. [In 1593 Archbishop Whitgift prohibited all preaching, reading, or catechising in private houses, if any resorted thereto not of the same family. He drove the clergy to subscribe anew and more stringently to the queen's supremacy. The result was first a furious attack upon episcopacy in the pamphlets of Martin Marprelate; and then severe laws against the Puritans, which had no ultimate effect but that of fortifying their opinions, and ultimately making their cause the rallying point of civil and religious liberty.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 244.

4139. PERSECUTION, Sectarian. Bitter. The records of the Scottish Parliament were thick set with laws denouncing vengeance on those who in any direction strayed from the prescribed pale. By an act passed in the time of Knox, and breathing his spirit, it was a high crime to hear mass, and the third offence was capital. An act recently passed, at the instance of James [II.], made it death to preach in any Presbyterian conventicle whatever, and even to attend such a conventicle in the open air.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 105.

4140. PERSECUTION, Selfish. Emperor Nero. The voice of rumor accused the emperor as the incendiary of his own capital; and as the most incredible stories are the best adapted to the genius of an enraged people, it was gravely reported and firmly believed that Nero, enjoying the calamity which he had occasioned, amused himself with singing to his lyre the destruction of ancient Troy. To divert a suspicion, which the power of despotism was unable to suppress, the emperor resolved to substitute in his own place some fictitious criminals. "With this view," continues Tacitus, "he inflicted the most exquisite tortures on those men who, under the vulgar appellation of Christians, were already branded with deserved infamy. They derived their name and origin from Christ, who in the reign of Tiberius had suffered death by the sentence of the procurator Pontius Pilate."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16, p. 17.

4141. PERSECUTION, Severe. In Scotland. John Brown, a poor carrier of Lanarkshire, was, for his singular piety, commonly called the Christian carrier; . . . blameless in life, and so peaceable that the tyrants could find no offence in him except that he absented himself from the public worship of the Episcopalians. On the 1st of May he was cutting turf, when he was seized by Claverhouse's dragoons, rapidly examined, convicted of nonconformity, and sentenced to death. It is said that even among the soldiers it was not easy to find an executioner, for the wife of the poor man was present. She led one little child by the hand; it was easy to see that she was about to give birth to another; and even those wild and hard-hearted men, who nicknamed one another Beelzebub and Apollyon, shrank from the great wickedness of butchering her husband before her face. The prisoner, meanwhile, raised above himself by the near prospect of eternity, prayed loud and fervently as one inspired, till Claverhouse, in a fury, shot him dead. It was reported by credible witnesses that the widow cried out in her agony, "Well, sir, well; the day of reckoning will come;" and that the murderer replied, "To man I can answer for what I have done; and as for God, I will take Him into mine own hand!"—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 464.

4142. PERSECUTION, Shameful. Scotland. Margaret MacLachlan and Margaret Wilson, the former an aged widow, the latter a maiden of eighteen, suffered death for their religion in Wigtonshire. They were offered their lives if they would consent to abjure the cause of the insurgent Covenanters, and to attend the Episcopal worship. They refused, and they were sentenced to be drowned. They were carried to a spot which the Solway overflows twice a day, and fastened to stakes fixed in the sand, between high and low water mark. The elder sufferer was placed near to the advancing flood, in the hope that her last agonies might terrify the younger into submission. The sight was dreadful; but the courage of the survivor was sustained by an enthusiasm as lofty as any that is recorded in martyrology. She saw the sea draw nearer and nearer, but gave no sign of alarm. She prayed and sang verses of psalms till the waves choked her voice. When she had tasted the bitterness of death, she was, by a cruel mercy, unbound and restored to life. When she came to herself, pitying friends and neighbors implored her to yield. "Dear Margaret, only say God save the king!" The poor girl, true to her stern theology, gasped out, "May God save him, if it be God's will!" Her friends crowded round the presiding officer. "She has said it; indeed, sir, she has said it." "Will she take the abjuration?" he demanded. "Never!" she exclaimed. "I am Christ's; let me go!" And the waters closed over her for the last time.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 465.

4143. PERSECUTION from Superstition. Pagans. If the empire had been afflicted by any recent calamity, by a plague, a famine, or an unsuccessful war—if the Tiber had, or if the Nile had not, risen beyond its banks—if the earth had shaken, or if the temperate order of the seasons had been interrupted, the superstitious Pagans were convinced that the crimes and the impiety of the Christians, who were spared by the excessive lenity of the government, had at length provoked the divine justice. It was not among a licentious and exasperated populace that the forms of legal proceedings could be observed; it was not in an amphitheatre stained with the blood of wild beasts and gladiators that the voice of compassion could be heard. The impatient clamors of the multitude denounced the Christians as the enemies of gods and men, doomed them to the severest tortures, and venturing to accuse by name some of the most distinguished of the new sectaries, required with irresistible vehemence that they should be instantly apprehended and cast to the lions.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16, p. 28.

4144. PERSECUTION, Terrible. Louis XIV. against Huguenots. [In old age he sought to make] an atonement for the voluptuous profligacy of his life. Property was exposed to plunder; religious books were burned; children torn from their parents; faithful ministers, who would not abandon their flocks, broken on the wheel. Men were dragged to the altars, to be tortured into a denial of the faith of their fathers; and a relapse was punished with extreme rigor. The approach of death removes the fear of persecution; bigotry invented a new terror; the bodies of those who died rejecting the sacraments were thrown out to wolves and dogs. The mean-spirited, who changed their religion, were endowed by law with the entire property of their family. The dying father was made to choose between wronging his conscience by apostasy and begging his offspring by fidelity. All children were ordered to be taken away from Protestant parents. . . . It became a study . . . to inflict all the pain the human body could endure and not die. . . . Ten thousand perished. . . . Half a million of its best citizens [were driven] into exile. [See No. 4126.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 13.

4145. ——. Vaudois. The Vaudois were wretchedly poor, and had been incessantly the objects of aggression and persecution. In January, 1655, a sudden determination was taken by the Turin government to make them conform to the Catholic religion by force. The whole of the inhabitants of three valleys were ordered to quit the country within three days, under pain of death and confiscation of goods, unless they would become, or undertake to become, Catholic. They sent their humble remonstrances to the court of Turin against this edict. The remonstrances were disregarded, and military execution was ordered. On April 17, 1655, the soldiers, recruits from all countries—the Irish are specially mentioned—were let loose upon the unarmed population. Murder and rape and burning are the ordinary incidents of military executions. These were not enough to satisfy the ferocity of the Catholic soldiery, who revelled for many days in the infliction of all that brutal lust or savage cruelty can suggest to men. [See No. 4134.]—MILTON'S PATTISON, ch. 11.

4146. PERSEVERANCE, Admirable. Columbus. Let those who are disposed to faint under difficulties, in the prosecution of any great and worthy undertaking, remember that eighteen years elapsed after the time that Columbus conceived his enterprise before he was enabled to carry it into effect; that the greater part of that time was passed in almost hopeless solicitation, amid poverty, neglect, and taunting ridicule; that the prime of his life had wasted away in the struggle, and that when his perseverance was finally crowned with success, he was about in his fifty-sixth year. His example should encourage the enterprising never to despair.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 2, ch. 6.

4147. PERSEVERANCE continued. Abraham Lincoln. Being asked by an "anxious visitor" what he would do . . . provided the rebellion was not subdued after three or four years of effort, . . . "Oh," said the President, "there is no alternative but to keep 'pegging away!'"—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 752.

4148. PERSEVERANCE, Earnest. Battle. [During the battle between the fleets of William III. and Louis XIV., in 1692,] Carter, rear-admiral of the Blue, broke the French line at the onset, was mortally wounded, and dying, exclaimed, "Fight the ship as long as she can swim!" The victory was complete, the French flying in every direction. [The French were attempting an invasion of England.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 10, p. 149.

4149. PERSEVERANCE vs. Force. Irresistible. [Sertorius' army being defeated by the barbarians, he endeavored to] rouse them up out of their despondence. For which purpose, a few days after, he assembled all his forces, and produced two horses before them; the one old and feeble, the other large and strong, and remarkable beside for a fine flowing tail. By the poor weak horse stood a robust, able-bodied man, and by the strong horse stood a little man of a very contemptible appearance. Upon a signal given, the strong man began to pull and drag about the weak horse by the tail, as if he would pull it off; and the little man to pluck off the hairs of the great horse's tail, one by one. The former tugged and toiled a long time to the great diversion of the spectators, and at last was forced to give up the point; the latter, without any difficulty, soon stripped the great horse's tail of all its hair. Then Sertorius rose up and said: "You see, my friends and fellow-soldiers, how much greater are the effects of perseverance than those of force, and that there are many things invincible in their collective capacity and in a state of union which may gradually be overcome, when they are once separated. In short, perseverance is irresistible. By this means time attacks and destroys the strongest things upon earth. Time, I say, who is the best friend and ally to those that have the discernment to use it properly, and watch the opportunities it presents, and the worst enemy to those who will be rushing into action when it does not call them." By such symbols as these Sertorius applied to the senses of the barbarians, and instructed them to wait for proper junctures and occasions.—PLUTARCH'S SERTORIUS.

4150. PERSEVERANCE, Obstinate. Crusaders. The enthusiasm of the first crusade is a natural and simple event, while hope was fresh, danger untried, and enterprise congenial to the spirit of the times. But the obstinate perseverance of Europe may indeed excite our pity and admiration; that no instruction should have been drawn from constant and adverse experience; that the same confidence should have repeatedly grown from the same failures; that six succeeding generations should have rushed headlong down the precipice that was open before them; and that men of every condition should have staked their public and private fortunes on the desperate adventure of possessing or recovering a tombstone two thousand miles from their country.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 59, p. 12.

4151. PERSEVERANCE in Oratory. Benjamin Disraeli. There was some curiosity respecting his début as an orator. . . . The gentlemen of the House of Commons expected that Disraeli would make a fool of himself; and he did not disappoint them. His first effort was a ludicrous failure—his maiden speech being received with "loud bursts of laughter." The newspapers said of him that he went up like a rocket and came down like a stick. . . . Writhing under the shouts of laughter which had drowned so much of his studied eloquence, he exclaimed, in almost a savage voice, "I have begun several times many things, and have often succeeded at last. I shall sit down now, but the time will come when you will hear me."—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 234.

4152. PERSEVERANCE rewarded. John Fitch. He did persevere. We cannot begin to relate the obstacles he encountered. A considerable volume would scarcely afford the requisite space. Poor, ragged, and forlorn, jeered at, pitied as a madman, discouraged by the great, refused by the rich, he and his few friends kept on, until, in 1790, they had a steamboat running on the Delaware, which was the first steamboat ever constructed that answered the purpose of one. It ran, with the tide, eight miles an hour, and six miles against it.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 151.

4153. PERSEVERANCE, Scotch. Samuel Johnson. He mentioned a circumstance as characteristic of the Scotch. "One of that nation," said he, "who had been a candidate, against whom I had voted, came up to me with a civil salutation. Now, sir, this is their way. An Englishman would have stomached it, and been sulky, and never have taken further notice of you ; but a Scotchman, sir, though you vote nineteen times against him, will accost you with equal complaisance after each time, and the twentieth time, sir, he will get your vote."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 433.

4154. PERSEVERANCE, Success by. Charles Goodyear. [The inventor of vulcanized rubber.] But Charles Goodyear was a man who, having undertaken a thing, could not give it up. He struggled on for five years—in debt, with a family, and exposed to the derision or reproaches of his friends. Several times he was in the debtors' prison. He sold his effects, he pawned his trinkets, he borrowed from his acquaintances, he reduced himself and his young family to the severest straits. When he could no longer buy wood to melt his rubber with, his children used to go out into the fields and pick up sticks for the purpose. Always supposing himself to be on the point of succeeding, he thought the quickest way to get his family out of their misery was to stick to India rubber.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 218.

4155. PERSISTENCE, Undeviating. Columbus. Two boobies flew on board the ships, birds which, he observed, seldom fly twenty leagues from land. He sounded, therefore, with a line of two hundred fathoms, but found no bottom. He supposed he might be passing between islands, lying to the north and south, but was unwilling to waste the present favoring breeze by going in search of them ; besides, he had confidently affirmed that land was to be found by keeping steadfastly to the west ; his whole expedition had been founded on such a presumption ; he should, therefore, risk all credit and authority with his people were he to appear to doubt and waver, and to go groping blindly from point to point of the compass. He resolved, therefore, to keep one bold course always westward, until he should reach the coast of India ; and afterward, if advisable, to seek these islands on his return.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 3, ch. 2.

4156. PERSUASION, Eloquence in. Pericles. [Pericles gained the surname Olympius. The comedies of the times] indicate that this title was given him chiefly on account of his eloquence. For they tell us that in his harangues he thundered and lightened, and that his tongue was armed with thunder. Thucydides, the son of Miliesius, is said to have given a pleasant account of the force of his eloquence. Thucydides was a great and respectable man, who for a long time opposed the measures of Pericles ; and when Archidamus, one of the kings of Lacedæmon, asked him which was the best wrestler, Pericles or he, he answered, "When I throw him, he says he was never down, and he persuades the very spectators to believe so."—PLUTARCH'S PERICLES.

4157. PESTILENCE, Devastating. England. The first and the greatest lasted from the 31st of May to the 29th of September, 1349 ; in this year we find charters and other documents, dated . . . as the year of the great pestilence. . . . It was called the Black Plague. . . . This disease originated in upper India and China, in 1346, and gradually spreading through Asia, in four years comprehended nearly all Europe. Boccaccio tells us in England the pestilence . . . left scarcely a third part of the population remaining. This is probably an exaggeration.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 30, p. 469.

4158. PESTILENCE, Rapid. Rome. In a season of excessive rains the Tiber swelled above its banks, and rushed with irresistible violence into the valleys of the seven hills. A pestilential disease arose from the stagnation of the deluge, and so rapid was the contagion that four-score persons expired in an hour in the midst of a solemn procession, which implored the mercy of heaven.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 45, p. 417.

4159. PETITION denied. Anti-Slavery. In the light of the present day . . . it is hard to believe that during the Presidency of Mr. Van Buren . . . the House of Representatives voted that "every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper, touching or relating in any way or to any extent whatever to slavery or the abolition thereof, shall on presentation, without any further action thereon, be laid upon the table, without being debated, printed, or referred."—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 24.

4160. PETITION, Immense. Chartists. [On the 10th of April, 1848, Mr. Feargus O'Conner presented to the House of Commons the petition of the Chartists, which was said to have received 5,706,000 signatures.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 30, p. 559.

4161. PETITION, Right of. Early Abolitionists. These apostles of universal liberty besieged Congress with memorials praying for such legislation as would carry out their designs. . . . Representatives from the slave-holding States . . . sought to deny them a hearing, and declared that the mere consideration of their propositions by Congress would not only justify, but would inevitably precipitate a dissolution of the Union. Undaunted by any form of opposition, the Abolitionists stubbornly maintained their ground, and finally succeeded in creating a great popular excitement by simply insisting on the simple right of petition as inseparable from free government and free citizenship. [John Quincy Adams was their champion for the right of petition.]—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 23.

4162. PETITION, Tender. For Strafford's Life. Men vote unanimously with their party, from fear of each other, for measures which, when taken singly, they would abhor to think of. Man in a mass is no longer man—he becomes an element. To move this deaf and cruel element of the House of Commons, Charles [II.] used every effort to flatter the pride and touch the feeling of these tribunes of the people. He wrote a most pathetic letter, bedewed with his tears, and sent it to the Parliament, to render it more irresistible, by the hand of a child, his son, the Prince of Wales, whose beauty, tender age, and innocence ought to have made refusal impossible from subjects petitioned by such a suppliant.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 14.

4163. PHILANTHROPY, Example of. John Howard. [He built neat cottages, which he let to his tenants on conditions favorable to virtue and good order.] One was, that the tenant should go to church once every Sunday ; another, that he should never go to the ale house ; another, that he should never gamble ; . . . children go to school ; . . . rent about $10 a year. . . . One of his neighbors, too, observing what an excellent effect a clean and proper dwelling had upon the morals of a family, followed his example, and built a considerable number of cottages ; so that, in about ten years, the whole village was rebuilt, and, from being one of the meanest, dirtiest, and most unhealthy places in the county, it became the prettiest, pleasantest, and most salubrious village in that part of England.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 37.

4164. PHILANTHROPY, Experimental. John Howard. In one prison there were eight cells, sixteen steps below the surface of the earth, in size thirteen feet by nine, without window or lamp, and ventilated only by a funnel. Into these damp, cold, and noisome cells not a ray of light ever penetrated, and "in them," says Howard, "poor creatures were confined, day and night, for weeks, for months together." After only a few days' confinement in one of them a man would come out yellow, emaciated, and almost out of his senses. Howard was never content merely to ascertain the existence of such dungeons ; he went down into them himself, remained in them an hour or more, conversed with their wretched inmates, and employed his [measuring] rule, his scales, and his thermometer to render his description exact.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 48.

4165. PHILANTHROPY, Practical. John Howard. Howard began by improving the dwellings of his tenants. One after another he pulled down the ancient hovels, and built, in their stead, neat and convenient cottages, containing never less than three rooms. To each cottage he attached a small garden in the rear for vegetables, and in front a little patch for flowers, surrounding the whole with a pretty picket fence. As the ground was low and marshy, he had it drained by a system of ditches, which almost banished from the place the agues and the fevers to which the inhabitants had before been subject. When he had completed one cottage, he let it to the man in the village who bore the best character for sobriety and industry, and he let it at the same rent that was paid for the wretched huts.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 36.

4166. PHILOSOPHY, Advantage of. Fortitude. When a certain stranger derided Dionysius at Corinth, in a very rude and scornful manner, for having, in the meridian of his power, taken pleasure in the discourse of philosophers, and at last asked him what he had got by the wisdom of Plato, "Do you think," said he, "that we have reaped no advantage from Plato, when we bear in this manner such a change of fortune ?"—PLUTARCH'S TIMOLEON.

gestions ; Locke's fundamental Constitutions of Carolina were found impracticable ; and Rousseau's Contra Social ranks only as an example of political rhetoric.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 393.

4168. PHYSICIAN, Empirical. Successful. Louis XV. was . . . given over by the physicians, and received the last sacraments ; but a violent remedy prescribed by an empiric arrested the disease, and in the course of a few days he was pronounced out of danger.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 23, § 12.

4169. PHYSICIAN, Mythological. Æsculapius. He was the god of medicine and the patron of the medical profession. The most common story makes him the son of Apollo. He went about healing diseases and raising the dead to life. Pluto, god of Hades, took alarm at the latter exploit, and complained to Zeus that Æsculapius was invading his bailiwick. He acknowledged the justice of the complaint, and struck Æsculapius dead with a flash of lightning. . . . The serpent was his favorite type. . . . The priests of the temple were the only regular practitioners of antiquity, but in later times the priests took pupils and initiated them into the mysteries of medicine, and these were regarded as regularly trained physicians.—AM. CYCLOPEDIA, "ÆSCULAPIUS."

4170. PHYSICIANS, Commingling. Death of Charles II. All the medical men of note in London were summoned. So high did political animosities run, that the presence of some Whig physicians was regarded as an extraordinary circumstance. One Roman Catholic, whose skill was then widely renowned, Doctor Thomas Short, was in attendance. Several of the prescriptions have been preserved. One of them is signed by fourteen doctors. The patient was bled largely. Hot iron was applied to his head. A loathsome volatile salt, extracted from human skulls, was forced into his mouth. He recovered his senses ; but he was evidently in a situation of extreme danger.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 402.

4171. PHYSICIANS, Disagreement of. Death of Charles II. The fourteen doctors who deliberated on the king's case contradicted each other and themselves. Some of them thought that his fit was epileptic, and that he should be suffered to have his doze out. The majority pronounced him apoplectic, and tortured him during some hours like an Indian at a stake. Then it was determined to call his complaint a fever, and to administer doses of bark. One physician, however, protested against this course, and assured the queen that his brethren would kill the king among them. Nothing better than dissension and vacillation could be expected from such a multitude of advisers.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 410.

4172. PHYSIQUE, Proof by. Representatives In 1695 the French court sent Harlay, the president of the Parliament of Paris, to sound the Dutch as to the possibility of a peace. Pale and very thin was the envoy. "Are you a sample," said the rough republicans, "of the wretched condition of France ?" "Let me send for my wife," replied the clever lawyer, "and she will give you a notion of our thriving state."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 12.

4173. PIETY, Claims of. *Crusaders. Such immense and seemingly inexhaustible torrents pouring down upon Constantinople gave, as we may naturally suppose, very great uneasiness to the Emperor Alexius. Excellent politician as he was, he found it impossible to prevent continual differences and a great deal of bloodshed. The Crusaders imagined that the piety and merit of the undertaking gave them a just claim to be maintained and supported gratuitously by all who professed themselves to be Christians. They behaved with insufferable insolence and folly; and matters came at length to that extremity, that it was seriously proposed by these new Crusaders to begin operations against the infidels by the destruction of Constantinople, the capital of the Christian world in the east.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 9, p. 158.

4174. PIETY, Manly. *Gustavus XII. Europe first learned from him the importance of infantry. All Germany was astonished at the strict discipline which, at the first, so creditably distinguished the Swedish army within their territories; all disorders were punished with the utmost severity, particularly impiety, theft, gambling, and duelling. The Swedish articles of war enforced frugality. In the camp, the king's tent not excepted, neither silver nor gold was to be seen. The general's eye looked as vigilantly to the morals as to the martial bravery of his soldiers; every regiment was ordered to form round its chaplain for morning and evening prayers. In all these points the lawgiver was also an example. A sincere and ardent piety exalted his courage. Equally free from the coarse infidelity which leaves the passions of the barbarian without control, and from the grovelling superstition of Ferdinand, who humbled himself to the dust before the Supreme Being while he haughtily trampled on his fellow-creature, in the height of his success he was ever a man and a Christian; in the height of his devotion, a king and a hero.—THIRTY YEARS' WAR, § 236.

4175. PIETY, Ostentatious. *Saladin the Grand Vizier. In faith and practice he was a rigid Mussulman; he ever deplored that the defence of religion had not allowed him to accomplish the pilgrimage of Mecca; but at the stated hours, five times each day, the sultan devoutly prayed with his brethren; the involuntary omission of fasting was scrupulously repaid; and his perusal of the Koran, on horseback between the approaching armies, may be quoted as a proof, however ostentatious, of piety and courage.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 59, p. 23.

4176. PIETY, Practical. *Persian Religion. Such is the system of cosmogony contained in these books of the Zendavesta, upon which the whole religion of the ancient Parsi was founded. The practical part of this religion consisted, first, in acknowledging and adoring Ormusd, the principle of all good, by a strict observance of purity in thought, words, and actions; secondly, in showing a proportional detestation of Ahriman, his productions, and his works. The most acceptable service to Ormusd was observing the precepts of the Zendavesta, reading that work, and repeating its liturgies. The chief among its forms of prayer are addressed not directly to Ormusd, but through the medium of his greatest works, the sun, the moon, and stars.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11, p. 124.

4177. PIETY, Private. *Cromwell's. Sir John Goodricke used to relate a remarkable anecdote, which we should probably assign to the siege of Knaresborough Castle, in 1644, and which was told him when a boy by a very old woman, who had formerly attended his mother in the capacity of midwife. "When Cromwell came to lodge in our house, in Knaresborough," said she, "I was then but a young girl. Having heard much talk about the man, I looked at him with wonder. Being ordered to take a pan of coals and air his bed, I could not, during the operation, forbear peeping over my shoulder several times to observe this extraordinary person, who was seated at the far side of the room untying his garters. Having aired the bed, I went out, and shutting the door after me, stopped and peeped through the keyhole, when I saw him rise from his seat, advance to the bed, and fall on his knees, in which attitude I left him for some time. When returning again, I found him still at prayer; and this was his custom every night so long as he stayed at our house; from which I concluded he must be a good man. . . . How many of us writers and readers would stand the test of the keyhole?"—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 1, p. 24.

4178. PIETY for Profit. *Persecution. [In 1189, when the Jews in York had been murdered, the bonds which they had deposited with the officers of the cathedral were obtained by their murderers and burned in the nave of the church.] One great object of the persecution was accomplished. A load of debt was wiped off the estates of many a servant of the cross by the destruction of his victims, and with them the evidence of his own obligations was destroyed.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 21, p. 306.

4179. PIETY in Public Life. *William Cecil. [William Cecil, Lord Burleigh, the faithful counsellor of Elizabeth for forty years, died in 1598. He was the first of a generation of professional statesmen. He had a deep and abiding sense of responsibility.] Walsingham, seeing him come in from prayers, wished he were as good a servant of God as the lord treasurer. . . . The reply of Burleigh is worthy to be held in remembrance: "I hold it meet for us to ask God's grace to keep us sound at heart who have so much in our power; and to direct us to the well-doing of all the people, whom it is easy for us to injure and ruin."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 18, p. 278.

4180. PIETY by Reaction. *Samuel Johnson. BOSWELL: "They [women] are not more afraid of death than men are." JOHNSON: "Because they are less wicked." DR. ADAMS: "They are more pious." JOHNSON: "No, hang 'em, they are not more pious. A wicked fellow is the most pious when he takes to it. He'll beat you all at piety."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 521.

4181. PIETY, Reward of. *Mohammedan. [The Mohammedan Khalif] Ali had the bravery of Omar and the piety of Mahomet; he wrote verses and maxims that remain in Mussulman philosophy, if not quite as revelations, at least as inspirations of Islam. Many of them rival the wisdom and asceticism of the Christians.

He often uttered this in his good fortune and in his reverses: "He who would be rich without treasure, powerful without empire, a servant without a master, has only to despise the vanities of this world and make himself the servant of God; he will find those three things in Him."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 177.

4182. PIETY, Sacrifices of. To Aid Columbus. The generous spirit of Isabella was enkindled. It seemed as if, for the first time, the subject broke upon her mind in its real grandeur, and she declared her resolution to undertake the enterprise. There was still a moment's hesitation. The king looked coldly on the affair, and the royal finances were absolutely drained by the war. Some time must be given to replenish them. How could she draw on an exhausted treasury for a measure to which the king was adverse! St. Angel watched this suspense with trembling anxiety. The next moment reassured him. With an enthusiasm worthy of herself and of the cause, Isabella exclaimed, "I undertake the enterprise for my own crown of Castile, and will pledge my jewels to raise the necessary funds." This was the proudest moment in the life of Isabella; it stamped her renown forever as the patroness of the discovery of the New World.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 2, ch. 6.

4183. PIETY, Sincere. Cromwell. [Eliot Warburton.] "And," says that lively and prejudiced writer, "if all the letters of the dark Cromwell could have been opened, what would they have revealed?" Well, they all have been discovered, all have been opened; and we suppose never, in the history of man, has there been presented such a transparent wholeness. It is one mirror of simple nobleness; every little note, and every family epistle, and every letter to the state officers—all reveal the same man. "A single eye, and a whole body full of light." . . . We have pictures given to us of his household. Upon the occasion of the signing of the treaty of peace with Holland, the ambassador gives an account of his reception at the Protector's Court. How calm and quiet and dignified the account of that reception! Music, indeed, was playing while they were dining, but after that the Protector gave out a hymn; and as he handed the book to the ambassador, he told him "that was the best paper that had passed between them as yet." Dignified and beautiful is the account of the gentle behavior of the Protector to the wife and daughter of the ambassador. Then, after a walk on the banks of a river for half an hour, the prayers in the family; and so the evening closed—very much, indeed, such a simple evening as we and our friends might spend together.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 15, p. 197.

4184. PIETY, Supremacy of. Natural Affections. [When Rome was taken by the Gauls the vestal virgins attempted to escape.] They took, however, with them the choicest and most sacred things they had, and fled with them along the side of the river, where Lucius Albinus, a plebeian, among others that were making their escape, was carrying his wife and children and some of his most necessary movables in a wagon. But when he saw the vestals in a helpless and weary condition, carrying in their arms the sacred symbols of the gods, he immediately took out his family and goods, and put the vir-gins in the wagon, that they might make their escape to some of the Grecian cities. This piety of Albinus, and the veneration he expressed for the gods at so dangerous a juncture, deserves to be recorded.—PLUTARCH'S CAMILLUS.

4185. PIRACY, Ancient. English. Like the galleys of the Middle Ages, such boats could only creep cautiously along from harbor to harbor in rough weather; but in smooth water their swiftness fitted them admirably for the piracy by which the men of these tribes were already making themselves dreaded. Its flat bottom enabled them to beach the vessel on any fitting coast; and a step on shore at once transformed the boatmen into a war-band. From the first the daring of the English race broke out in the secrecy and suddenness of the pirates' swoop, in the fierceness of their onset, in the careless glee with which they seized either sword or oar. "Foes are they," sang a Roman poet of the time, "fierce beyond other foes and cunning as they are fierce; the sea is their school of war and the storm their friend; they are sea-wolves that prey on the pillage of the world!" . . . The piracy of our fathers had thus brought them to the shores of a land which, dear as it is now to Englishmen, had not as yet been trodden by English feet.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 24.

4186. PIRATES, Connivance with. Government. The buccaneers, encouraged by the Senate's connivance, were more daring than ever. They had become a sea community, led by high-born adventurers, who maintained out of their plunder a show of wild magnificence. The oars of the galleys of their commanders were plated with silver; their cabins were hung with gorgeous tapestry. They had bands of music to play their triumphs. They had a religion of their own, an Oriental medley called the Mysteries of Mithras. They had captured and pillaged four hundred considerable towns, and had spoiled the temple of the Grecian gods. They had maintained and extended their depots, where they disposed of their prisoners to the slave-dealers. Roman citizens who could not ransom themselves, and could not conveniently be sold, were informed that they could go where they pleased; they were led to a plank projecting over some vessel's side, and were bidden depart—into the sea.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 10.

4187. PIRATES, Period of. Romans. Crete was completely in their hands also, and they had secret friends along the entire Mediterranean shores. They grew at last into a thousand sail, divided into squadrons under separate commanders. They were admirably armed. They roved over the waters at their pleasure, attacking islands or commercial ports, plundering temples and warehouses, arresting every trading vessel they encountered, till at last no Roman could go abroad on business save during the winter storms, when the sea was comparatively clear. They flaunted their sails in front of Ostia itself; they landed in their boats at the villas on the Italian coast, carrying off lords and ladies, and holding them to ransom. They levied blackmail at their pleasure. The wretched provincials had paid their taxes to Rome in exchange for promised defence, and no defence was provided. The revenue which ought to have been spent on the protection of the empire a few patricians were dividing among themselves. The pirates had even marts in different islands, where their prisoners were sold to the slave-dealers; and for fifteen years nothing was done or even attempted to put an end to so preposterous an enormity. The ease with which these buccaneers of the old world were eventually suppressed proved conclusively that they existed by connivance. It was discovered at last that large sums had been sent regularly from Crete to some of the most distinguished members of the aristocracy.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 9.

4188. PITY reversed. For the Injurer. The Catholic [emperor] Sigismund has acquired the honors of a saint and martyr; but the hands of the royal saint were stained with the blood of his innocent son, whom he inhumanly sacrificed to the pride and resentment of a stepmother. He soon discovered his error, and bewailed the irreparable loss. While Sigismund embraced the corpse of the unfortunate youth, he received a severe admonition from one of his attendants: "It is not his situation, O king! it is thine which deserves pity and lamentation."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 38, p. 580.

4189. PLAGIARISM a Felony. Hayward. [Hayward dedicated his Life of Henry IV. to the Earl of Essex, who was suspected of rebellion. Elizabeth asked Bacon whether he did not see treason in the book. He replied that he saw no treason, but very much felony, for every second sentence was stolen from Tacitus.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 18, p. 286.

4190. PLAGUE, Desolating. Widespread. It was the inevitable consequence of rapine and oppression, which extirpated the produce of the present, and the hope of future harvests. Famine is almost always followed by epidemical diseases, the effect of scanty and unwholesome food. Other causes must, however, have contributed to the furious plague, which, from the year 250 to the year 265, raged without interruption in every province, every city, and almost every family of the Roman Empire. During some time five thousand persons died daily in Rome; and many towns that had escaped the hands of the barbarians were entirely depopulated.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 10, p. 329.

4191. PLAGUE, Destructive. Rome. Such was the universal corruption of the air, that the pestilence which burst forth in the fifteenth year of Justinian was not checked or alleviated by any difference of the seasons. In time, its first malignity was abated and dispersed; the disease alternately languished and revived; but it was not till the end of a calamitous period of fifty-two years that mankind recovered their health, or the air resumed its pure and salubrious quality. No facts have been preserved to sustain an account, or even a conjecture, of the numbers that perished in this extraordinary mortality. I only find that during three months five, and at length ten, thousand persons died each day at Constantinople; that many cities of the East were left vacant, and that in several districts of Italy the harvest and the vintage withered on the ground. The triple scourge of war, pestilence, and famine afflicted the subjects of Justinian; and his reign is disgraced by a visible decrease of the human species, which has never been repaired in some of the fairest countries of the globe.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 43, p. 297.

4192. PLEASURE in Benevolence. John Howard. An anecdote will serve to show how heartily his wife entered into his plans. At the close of a year, when he had made up his accounts, he found that he had a balance on hand, and, as he made it a rule to spend all his income, he proposed to his wife that they should employ this sum in visiting London. "What a pretty cottage it would build!" said she; and a cottage was built with it accordingly.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 38.

4193. PLEASURE before Business. Henry VIII. was nothing minded to travail in the busy affairs of his realm. [The almoner, Thomas Wolsey, would] disburden the king of so weighty a charge and troublesome business, putting the king in comfort that he shall not need to spare any time of his pleasure for any business that shall necessarily happen in the council, as long as he, being there and having the king's authority and commandment, doubted not to see all things sufficiently furnished and perfected.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 16, p. 265.

4194. PLEASURE, Demoralizing. Romans. The people of Rome, viewing, with a secret pleasure, the humiliation of the aristocracy, demanded only bread and public shows, and were supplied with both by the liberal hand of Augustus. The rich and polite Italians, who had almost universally embraced the philosophy of Epicurus, enjoyed the present blessings of ease and tranquillity, and suffered not the pleasing dream to be interrupted by the memory of their old tumultuous freedom.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 3, p. 74.

4195. PLEASURE, Devotion to. Tarentines. Pyrrhus brought to the aid of the Tarentines [against the Romans] an army of 30,000 men. He was astonished that a war, in which they were a principal party, did not, in the least, interrupt the amusements of that frivolous and dissolute people. They gave him some magnificent festivals, and then purposed to leave him to fight, while they continued their entertainments. This conduct, justly exciting both contempt and indignation, Pyrrhus ordered the theatres to be shut up, closed the public assemblies, where the Tarentines idly consumed the time in frivolous talk, and mustering the citizens, enjoined a continued and rigorous exercise to every man who was capable of bearing arms. So severely felt was this duty, that it is said a large number of the inhabitants actually fled from their country rather than suffer a deprivation of their usual pleasures.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 7, p. 355.

4197. PLEASURE, Extravagance in. Hunting. [Malek, the distinguished Turkish general,] both in peace and in war was in action and in the field. . . . Hunting was the pleasure, and even the passion, of the sultan, and his train consisted of 47,000 horses; but after the massacre of a Turkish chase, for each piece of game he bestowed a piece of gold on the poor, a slight atonement, at the expense of the people, for the cost and mischief of the amusement of kings.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 5, p. 521.

4198. PLEASURE, Harmless. Samuel Johnson. "Is not harmless pleasure very tame?" JOHNSON: "Nay, sir; harmless pleasure is the highest praise. Pleasure is a word of dubious import; pleasure is in general dangerous, and pernicious to virtue; to be able therefore to furnish pleasure that is harmless, pleasure pure and unalloyed, is as great a power as man can possess." This was, perhaps, as ingenious a defence as could be made; still, however, I was not satisfied.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 411.

4199. PLEASURE, Interruption of. Talleyrand. [After the exile of Napoleon I. the allied sovereigns were in congress at Vienna, with seven hundred ambassadors. They were relieved in their toils by feasting and dancing.] Talleyrand was . . . making his toilet for a ball. . . . His hands were wet with perfumery; . . . two barbers were curling his hair. His niece . . . ran into the room with a note, . . . marked secret and in haste. Talleyrand, looking up from the midst of his curling irons, powders, and perfumes, requested his niece to open and read the note. She did so, and, turning pale, he exclaimed, "Heavens! Bonaparte has left Elba! What is to become of my ball this evening?" . . . "If a thunderbolt," says Allison, "had fallen in the midst of the brilliance assembled in the imperial ball-room at Vienna, it could not have excited greater consternation than this simple announcement."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLÉON B., vol. 2, ch. 26.

4200. PLEASURE, Passion for. Athenians. In addition to these symptoms of decline, luxury was extending her baneful influence, in enervating and corrupting the patriotic spirit. A taste for the productions of the fine arts and a passionate pursuit of pleasure had, in the Athenian republic particularly, entirely supplanted heroic virtue. Poets, musicians, sculptors, comedians, were now the only great men of Attica. While the bewitching dramas of Sophocles and Euripides charmed the ears, and the sculptures of Phidias, of Glycon, and Praxiteles fascinated the eyes of the refined and voluptuous Athenians, military glory was forgotten; and the defence of the state, no longer the care of its citizens, was committed to mercenaries, who filled both its fleets and its armies.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3, p. 168.

4201. PLEASURE, Perilous. Frederick V. [The elector palatine of Bohemia.] Instead of devoting himself with untiring energies to the affairs of his kingdom, Frederick wasted his time in amusements; instead of filling his treasury by a wise economy, he squandered his revenues by a needless theatrical pomp and a misplaced munificence. With a light-minded carelessness, he did but gaze at himself in his new dignity, and in the ill-timed desire to enjoy his crown, he forgot the more pressing duty of securing it on his head.—THIRTY YEARS' WAR, § 184.

4202. PLEASURE, Pursuit of. Epicurus. The philosophy too of the pagan world was but ill calculated to supply the place of religion in the refinement of morals. The doctrines of Epicurus, which were highly prevalent at the time of the birth of Christ, by representing pleasure as the chief good, by imposing no restraint on the indulgence of the passions, and limiting all happiness to the enjoyments of the present life, tended to corrupt and degrade human nature to a rank little superior to that of the brutes.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 4 p. 2.

4203. PLEASURE in Sinning. Samuel Johnson [said to Miss Adams:] "You put me in mind of Dr. Barrowby, the physician, who was very fond of swine's flesh. One day when he was eating it he said, 'I wish I was a Jew.' 'Why so?' said somebody; 'the Jews are not allowed to eat your favorite meat.' 'Because,' said he, 'I should then have the gust of eating it, with the pleasure of sinning.'"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 522.

4204. PLEASURE, Vitiating by. Andronicus. [A Greek prince.] Andronicus the younger was touched with remorse, or fatigued with business, or deceived by negotiation; pleasure rather than power was his aim; and the license of maintaining a thousand hounds, a thousand hawks, and a thousand huntsmen was sufficient to sully his fame and disarm his ambition.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 63, p. 180.

4205. PLEASURE, Watering-place. England. The passion for drinking mineral waters and for bathing in medicinal springs sent the fashionable world, in the beginning of the eighteenth century, to a round of idleness and dissipation, of card-playing and dancing, at the crowded cottages of Tunbridge Wells and the fishing hovels of Scarborough.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 1, p. 10.

4206. PLEASURE, Wearisome. Charles II. [Charles II. became celebrated for his prodigality and devotion to mere pleasure.] Burnet writes: . . . The king, who was often weary of time, and did not know how to get round the day, liked the going to the House [of Parliament] as a pleasant diversion; so he went constantly.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 17, p. 305.

4207. PLEASURES condemned. Puritans. It was a sin to hang garlands on a May-pole, to drink a friend's health, to fly a hawk, to hunt a stag, to play at chess, to wear love-locks, to put starch into a ruff, to touch the virginals, to read the Fairy Queen. Rules such as these—rules which would have appeared insupportable to the free and joyous spirit of Luther, and contemptible to the serene and philosophical intellect of Zwingli, threw over all life more than a monastic gloom.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 76.

4208. PLEASURES, Expensive. Metropolitan. [In Rome and Constantinople, the two capitals of the Roman Empire] the annual games of the theatre, the circus, and the amphitheatre cost £4000 of gold, (about) £160,000 sterling; and if so heavy an expense surpassed the faculties or the inclination of the magistrates themselves, the sum was supplied from the Imperial treasury.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17, p. 112.

4209. PLEASURES of Sense. Mohammedan. Mahomet used often to say : "The things in this world that are most agreeable to my heart and senses are children, women, and perfumes ; but I have never tasted complete happiness but in prayer."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 153.

4210. ———. Mahomet. Perfumes and women were the two sensual enjoyments which his nature required, and his religion did not forbid ; and Mahomet affirmed that the fervor of his devotion was increased by these innocent pleasures. The heat of the climate inflames the blood of the Arabs, and their libidinous complexion has been noticed by the writers of antiquity. Their incontinence was regulated by the civil and religious laws of the Koran ; their incestuous alliances were blamed ; the boundless license of polygamy was reduced to four legitimate wives or concubines ; their rights both of bed and dowry were equitably determined ; the freedom of divorce was discouraged ; adultery was condemned as a capital offence ; and fornication, in either sex, was punished with a hundred stripes. Such were the calm and rational precepts of the legislator ; but in his private conduct Mahomet indulged the appetites of a man, and abused the claims of a prophet. A special revelation dispensed him from the laws which he had imposed on his nation ; the female sex, without reserve, was abandoned to his desires ; and this singular prerogative excited the envy rather than the scandal, the veneration rather than the envy, of the devout Mussulmans.—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 54.

4211. PLEASURES, Wasteful. Poet Shelley. Peacock [his first friend] also notices his habit of floating paper boats, and gives an amusing description of the boredom suffered by Hogg on occasions when Shelley would stop by the side of pond or mere to float a mimic navy. The not altogether apocryphal story of his having once constructed a boat out of a bank-post-bill, and launched it on the lake in Kensington Gardens, deserves to be alluded to in this connection.—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 4.

4212. PLEDGE, Temperance. Father Mathew's. Father Mathew's wonder-working pledge was as follows : "I promise, with the divine assistance, as long as I continue a member of the Teetotal Temperance Society, to abstain from all intoxicating drinks, except for medicinal or sacramental purposes, and to prevent as much as possible, by advice and example, drunkenness in others." When these words had been slowly uttered, Father Mathew, with uplifted hand, pronounced a brief prayer : "May God bless you, and give you strength and grace to keep your promise." To which he sometimes added, as he made the sign of the cross : "In this sign alone you may hope to persevere and conquer."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 111.

4213. PLOT, A fictitious. The Popish Plot. Titus Oates, a clergyman of the Church of England, had, by his disorderly life and heterodox doctrine, drawn on him the censure of his spiritual superiors, had been compelled to quit his benefice, and had ever since led an infamous and vagrant life. He had once professed himself a Roman Catholic, and had passed some time on the Continent in English colleges of the order of Jesus. In those seminaries he had heard much wild talk about the best means of bringing England back to the true Church. From hints thus furnished he constructed a hideous romance, resembling rather the dream of a sick man than any transaction which ever took place in the real world. The pope, he said, had intrusted the government of England to the Jesuits. The Jesuits had, by commissions under the great seal of their society, appointed Catholic clergymen, noblemen, and gentlemen to all the highest offices in Church and State. The papists had burned down London once. They had tried to burn it down again. They were at that moment planning a scheme for setting fire to all the shipping in the Thames. They were to rise at a signal and massacre all their Protestant neighbors. A French army was at the same time to land in Ireland. All the leading statesmen and divines of England were to be murdered. Three or four schemes had been formed for assassinating the king. He was to be stabbed. He was to be poisoned in his medicine. He was to be shot with silver bullets.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 218.

4214. PLOT, Imaginary. Negro. In the year 1741 occurred . . . "The Negro Plot" [in N. Y.] Slavery was permitted in the province, and negroes constituted a large faction of the population. Several destructive fires had occurred, and it was believed that they had been kindled by incendiaries. The slaves were naturally distrusted ; now they became feared and hated. Some degraded women came forward and gave information that the negroes had made a plot to burn the city, kill all who opposed them, and set up one of their own number as governor. The whole story was the essence of absurdity ; but the people were alarmed and ready to believe anything. The reward of freedom was offered any slave who would reveal the plot. Many witnesses rushed forward with foolish and contradictory stories ; the jails were filled with the accused ; and more than thirty of the miserable creatures, with hardly the form of a trial, were convicted and then hanged or burned to death. Others were transported and sold as slaves in foreign lands. As soon as the supposed peril had passed and the excited people regained their senses, it came to be doubted whether the whole shocking affair had not been the result of terror and fanaticism. The verdict of after times has been that there was no plot at all.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 20, p. 182.

4216. POET, Terrorizing. Robert Burns. The farmers and the well-to-do people welcomed him gladly, and were proud that such a man had come to be a dweller in their vale. Yet the ruder country lads and the lower peasantry, we are told, looked on him not without dread, "lest he should pickle and preserve them in sarcastic song." "Once at a penny wedding, when one or two wild young lads quarrelled, and were about to fight, Burns rose up and said, 'Sit down and—, or else I'll hang you up like potato-bogles in sang to-morrow.' They ceased, and sat down as if their noses had been bleeding."—SHAIRP'S BURNS, ch. 5.

4217. POETRY, Bad. Criticised. Philoxenus, who was himself an excellent poet, attempted to undeceive Dionysius in the favorable opinion he had of his own abilities, but was sent to the Quarries for the liberty he took. However, the next day he was restored to favor, and Dionysius repeated to him some verses he had taken extraordinary pains with, expecting his approbation. But the poet, instead of giving it, looked round to the guards, and said to them, very humorously, "Take me back to the Quarries."—PLUTARCH'S TIMOLEON, LANGHORNE'S NOTE.

4218. POETRY, Heartless. Gray's. [It is] a laborious mosaic, through the hard, stiff lineaments of which little or true grace could be expected to look; real feeling, and all freedom of expressing it, are sacrificed to pomp, to cold splendor; for vigor we have a certain mouthing vehemence, too elegant indeed to be tumid, yet essentially foreign to the heart, and seen to extend no deeper than the mere voice and gestures.—CARLYLE'S GOETHE, ch. 1.

4219. POETRY, Inspiration for. Robert Burns. "You know," he says, "our country custom of coupling a man and woman together as partners in the labors of the harvest. In my fifteenth summer my partner was a bewitching creature, a year younger than myself. . . . She was a bonnie, sweet, sonsie lass. In short, she, altogether unwittingly to herself, initiated me in that delicious passion which, in spite of acid disappointment, gin-horse prudence, and book-worm philosophy, I hold to be the first of human joys here below! How she caught the contagion I cannot tell. . . . Indeed, I did not know myself why I liked so much to loiter behind with her, when returning in the evening from our labors; why the tones of her voice made my heartstrings thrill like an Æolian harp; and especially why my pulse beat such a furious ratan when I looked and fingered over her little hand, to pick out the cruel nettle-strings and thistles. . . . My girl sung a song which was said to be composed by a country laird's son, on one of his father's maids, with whom he was in love; and I saw no reason why I might not rhyme as well as he; for, excepting that he could shear sheep and cast peats, his father living in the moorlands, he had no more scholar-craft than myself. Thus with me began love and poetry."—SHAIRP'S BURNS, ch. 1.

4220. POETRY, Pathos in. Dante. Dante Alighieri is supposed to have invented a new species of epic poetry by the introduction of angels and devils in place of the heathen deities; yet there is some reason to presume that the An-tiochus of Ischanus, were it yet remaining, would deprive Dante of the merit of originality in that particular. His Divina Commedia, however, has far higher merits of its own. It shows genius of the very greatest order, and has never been surpassed in terrible pathos, or in the picturesque of descriptive power.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 16, p. 248.

4221. POETRY, Power of. Welsh. A decisive battle, fought in the year 1283, determined forever the fate of Wales. Llewellyn was killed, and with him expired the government and the distinction of his nation. Wales was soon after formally united to the kingdom of England, and the title of its principality has ever since been borne by the eldest son of the king. Some circumstances of extreme barbarity marked this conquest upon the part of Edward. The Welsh bards kept alive an heroic spirit of freedom and independence, by rehearsing in their songs the glorious achievements of the ancient Britons: Edward [I.] ordered these unhappy minstrels to be massacred wherever they were found.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 12, p. 189.

4222. POETRY, Primacy of. Created with Man. The poetical spirit appears almost coeval with the very rudest condition of society. Other branches of human knowledge which have arisen in the gradual progress of improvement have owed their origin to the wandering and adventurous spirit of the species, or to the wants and sufferings of mankind; but poetry seems to have been created with man, and is contemporaneous with his language; and what is more remarkable, it is in this early age that poetry often assumes its highest character, and arrives at its greatest perfection.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 3, p. 426.

4223. POETRY, Utility of. Ancients. Poetry or song was therefore in all nations the first vehicle of history, and the earliest mode of promulgating laws; for nothing was found equally capable of striking with force the imagination and impressing the memory. . . . When society has made some advancement, and laws are established to guard the rights and privileges of men, a legislator, observing with what avidity the songs of the bards are listened to, how universally they are circulated, and how tenaciously retained, judiciously avails himself of the same vehicle for the publication of his laws. Plato, in his "Minos," informs us that the first laws of all nations were composed in verse and sung. Apollo is recorded to have been one of the first legislators, and to have published his laws to the sound of his harp—that is, set them to music. That this mode of promulgation was in use among the ancient Greeks, the word Nomos, which signifies both a law and a song, is direct proof; and Aristotle, in his problems, inquiring into the reason of this conformity of names between two such different objects, gives this express reason, that before the use of writing it was customary to keep the laws in remembrance by singing them; and this, according to the same author, was the custom of many different nations. The laws of the ancient inhabitants of Spain were all in verse, as were likewise the laws of Tuisto, the first legislator of the ancient Germans.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 3, p. 27.

4224. POETRY, Weakness for. Frederick the Great. In the midst of all the great king's calamities, his passion for writing indifferent poetry grew stronger and stronger. Enemies all around him, despair in his heart, pills of corrosive sublimate hidden in his clothes, he poured forth hundreds upon hundreds of lines, hateful to gods and men—the insipid dregs of Voltaire's Hippocrene—the faint echo of the lyre of Chaulieu. It is amusing to compare what he did during the last months of 1757 with what he wrote during the same time. It may be doubted whether any equal portion of the life of Hannibal, of Cæsar, or of Napoleon will bear a comparison with that short period, the most brilliant in the history of Prussia and of Frederick.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 90.

4225. POISON well applied. Cæsar Borgia. [See No. 5436.] Italy was at length delivered of this monster and his son. It is said they had prepared poisoned wine for the entertainment of some wealthy cardinals, and that the pope himself, and his son, drank by mistake of a bottle intended only for his guests. The pope suffered an agonizing death, but Borgia escaped by having himself sewed up in the belly of a mule. He survived, however, but a short time, and reaped no other fruits of his own and his father's accumulated crimes but the universal abhorrence of mankind.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14, p. 221.

4226. POISONING, Slow. Sir Thomas Overbury. It was perhaps the small share which James [I.] had of the affections of his people that produced his attachment to particular favorites. Robert Carr, whom he created Earl of Somerset, had no other pretensions to recommend him but a graceful person and a good address. He was a weak and an unprincipled man. He fell from the king's favor on conviction of his being guilty of a crime for which he should have suffered an ignominious death—the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury. Somerset had married the Countess of Essex—a most debauched woman, who, to accomplish this marriage, had procured a divorce from the Earl of Essex, in which she had found a chief obstacle in Sir Thomas Overbury, a confidant of Somerset. This flagitious woman now prevailed on her husband, Somerset, to have Overbury removed by poison, which they accomplished in a most barbarous manner, by feeding him daily for some months with poisoned victuals, while confined, through the means of Somerset, in the Tower. For this murder Somerset and his countess were condemned to suffer death, but they both received the king's pardon.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 29, p. 397.

4227. POISONS, Study of. Cleopatra. Cleopatra at the same time was making a collection of poisonous drugs, and being desirous to know which was the least painful in the operation, she tried them on the capital convicts. Such poisons as were quick in their operation she found to be attended with violent pain and convulsions; such as were milder were slow in their effect; she therefore applied herself to the examination of venomous creatures, and caused different kinds of them to be applied to different persons under her own inspection. These experiments she repeated daily, and at length she found that the bite of the asp was the most eligible kind of death, for it brought on a gradual kind of lethargy, in which the face was covered with a gentle sweat, and the senses sunk easily into stupefaction; and those who were thus affected showed the same uneasiness at being disturbed or awaked that people do in the profoundest natural sleep.—PLUTARCH'S ANTONY.

4228. POLICE, Inefficient. Reign of Charles II. The machinery for keeping the peace was perfectly contemptible. There was an act of the Common Council which provided that more than a thousand watchmen should be constantly on the alert in the city from sunset to sunrise, and that every inhabitant should take his turn of duty; but the act was negligently executed. Few of those that were summoned left their homes, and these few generally found it more agreeable to tiddle in alehouses than to pace the streets.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 336.

4229. POLITENESS, Use of. William, Prince of Orange. His manners [when King of England] were altogether Dutch. Even his countrymen thought him blunt. To foreigners he often seemed churlish. In his intercourse with the world in general he appeared ignorant or negligent of those arts which double the value of a favor and take away the sting of a refusal.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 151.

4230. POLITICIAN, Artful. Pompey. The renewed term of his government was on the eve of expiring; but this extraordinary man had no design of relinquishing his military command. To secure himself against a deprivation of power, he bribed Curio, one of the tribunes, to make a proposal which wore the appearance of great moderation, and regard for the public liberty. This was, that Cæsar and Pompey should either both continue in their governments, or both be recalled, as they were equally capable of endangering the safety of the commonwealth by an abuse of power. The motion passed, and Cæsar immediately offered to resign on condition that his rival should follow his example; but Pompey rejected the proposal, probably aware of the real designs of Cæsar, but too confidently relying on the strength of his own party, and the influence he had with his troops.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 3, p. 406.

4231. ———. Cromwell. The great majority [of the army], however, were disposed to support their general, as elective first magistrate of a commonwealth, against all factions which might resist his authority. . . . That his elevation to power might not seem to be his own mere act, he convoked a council, composed partly of persons on whose support he could depend, and partly of persons whose opposition he might safely defy. This assembly, which he called a Parliament, the populace nicknamed from one of the most conspicuous members, Barebone's Parliament.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 125.

4232. POLITICS, Alliance in. William Pitt. At that day the good-will of the people was, in England, the most uncertain tenure of office, for they had no strength in Parliament; their favorite [William Pitt] held his high position [prime-minister] at the sufferance of the aristocracy. "I borrow," said Pitt, "the Duke of Newcastle's majority to carry on the public business."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 12.

4233. POLITICS, Abuse in. Josiah Quincy. [When a Member of Congress he was thus addressed:] "Quincy, I thought I had abused you enough; but I find it will not do." "Why, what is the matter now? I do not mean to speak again." "No matter," said Grundy; "by Heavens, I must give you another thrashing." "Why so?" asked the member from Massachusetts. "Why," said Grundy, "the truth is, a d—d fellow has set up against me in my district—a perfect Jacobin—as much worse than I am as worse can be. Now, except Tim Pickering, there is not a man in the United States so perfectly hated by the people of my district as yourself. You must therefore excuse me. I must abuse you, or I shall never get re-elected. I will do it, however, genteelly. I will not do it as that fool of a Clay did—strike so hard as to hurt myself. But abuse you I must. You understand; I mean to be friends, notwithstanding. I mean to be in Congress again, and must use the means."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 754.

4234. POLITICS, Anger in. John Adams. President Adams, exasperated by his unexpected defeat, would not bring himself to remain in Washington long enough to witness the inauguration of his successor, but, about daylight on the morning of the 4th of March, he left Washington; and thus, for a few hours, there was actually no head to the government. To us, reading coolly of the events of those times, such conduct appears undignified and silly. We can, however, but faintly realize the madness of party spirit at that day, and the distrust and bitterness with which the elder Federalists regarded the victorious Republicans.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 352.

4235. POLITICS, Bitterness in. Van Buren's Administration. [In December of 1839 General Harrison was again nominated by the Whigs as their leader.] On the Democratic side Mr. Van Buren had no competitor; but the unanimity of his party could hardly compensate for his misfortunes and blunders. The canvass was the most exciting in the political history of the country. The President was blamed with everything. The financial distress was laid at his door. Extravagance, bribery, corruption—everything bad was charged upon him. Men of business advertised to pay $6 a barrel for flour if Harrison should be elected; $3 a barrel if Van Buren should be successful. The Whig orators tossed about the luckless administration through all the figures and forms of speech; and the President himself was shot at with every sort of dart that partisan wit and malice could invent. The enthusiasm in the ranks of the opposition rose higher and higher; and the result was the defeat of the Democrats in every State except [seven]. . . . The electoral votes of these States—numbering sixty—were given to Van Buren; and the remainder, amounting to two hundred and thirty-four, were cast for General Harrison. After controlling the destinies of the government for nearly forty years, the Democratic party was temporarily routed.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 55, p. 439.

4236. POLITICS, Candidates in. Roman. It was customary for those who were candidates for any magistracy to appear in the Comitia, clad in white apparel. The plebeians, who aspired to the military tribunate, appeared accordingly in that dress; but as the votes were called by centuries, and the patricians had been at some pains to influence their dependents, it happened that not one of the plebeians was elected.—TYRLETT'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 6, p. 340.

4237. POLITICS, Changes in. English Revolution. With very different feelings had the news of this great revolution been received in France. The politics of a long, eventful, and glorious reign had been confounded in a day. England was again the England of Elizabeth and Cromwell; and all the relations of all the states of Christendom were completely changed by the sudden introduction of this new power into the system. The Parisians could talk of nothing but what was passing in London.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 552.

4238. — — —. The Restoration. Every one hoped in this desire to change their condition and disown all things they had before advised. Every ballad singer sang up and down the streets ribald rhymes, made in reproach of the late commonwealth.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 14, p. 235.

4239. POLITICS, Clerical. James II. [William, Prince of Orange, had invaded England, and James was anxious.] To the prelates he spoke with peculiar acrimony. "I could not," he said, "prevail on you the other day to declare against this invasion; but you are ready enough to declare against me. Then you would not meddle with politics. You have no scruple about meddling now. You would be better employed in teaching your flocks how to obey than in teaching me how to govern. You have excited this rebellious temper among them; and now you foment it."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 467.

4240. POLITICS a Compromise. England. [After the flight of James II. to France.] It was moved that King James II., having endeavored to subvert the Constitution of the kingdom by breaking the original contract between king and people, and, by the advice of Jesuits and other wicked persons, having violated the fundamental laws, and having withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, had abdicated the government, and that the throne had thereby become vacant. . . . It is idle, however, to examine these memorable words, as we should examine a chapter of Aristotle or of Hobbes. Such words are to be considered not as words, but as deeds. If they effect that which they are intended to effect, they are rational, though they may be contradictory. If they fail of attaining their end, they are absurd, though they carry demonstration with them. Logic admits of no compromise. The essence of politics is compromise. It is therefore not strange that some of the most important and most useful political instruments in the world should be among the most illogical compositions that ever were penned.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 579.

4241. POLITICS, Contradiction in. Election of 1848. General Cass was born in New England of Puritan stock. All his mature life had been spent in the free Northwest. . . . General Taylor was born in Virginia, was reared in Kentucky, . . . had passed all his life in the South. . . . and was the owner of a large number of slaves. Yet in the face of these facts General Cass ran as the distinctive pro-slavery candidate, and General Taylor . . . was supported throughout the North by the anti-slavery Whigs. . . . But this contradiction was apparent, not real.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 86.

4242. POLITICS, Controversial. Reign of Charles II. Never before had political controversy been carried on with so much freedom; never before had political clubs existed with so elaborate an organization or so formidable an influence. The one question of the exclusion occupied the public mind. All the presses and pulpits of the realm took part in the conflict. On one side it was maintained that the Constitution and religion of the State would never be secure under a popish king; on the other, that the right of James to wear the crown in his turn was derived from God, and could not be annulled, even by the consent of all the branches of the Legislature. Every county, every town, every family, was in agitation. The civilities and hospitalities of neighborhood were interrupted. The dearest ties of friendship and of blood were sundered. Even schoolboys were divided into angry parties; and the Duke of York and the Earl of Shaftesbury had zealous adherents on all the forms of Westminster and Eton. The theatres shook with the roar of the contending factions.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 239.

4243. POLITICS, corrupted. "Treats." It was a shrewd saying, whoever said it, that the man who first ruined the Roman people was he who first gave them treats and gratuities.—PLUTARCH'S CAIUS MARCIUS.

4244. ———. Reign of Charles II. Scarcely any rank or profession escaped the infection of the prevailing immorality; but those persons who made politics their business were perhaps the most corrupt part of the corrupt society.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 170.

4245. ———. Reign of Charles II. Among those politicians who, from the Restoration to the accession of the house of Hanover, were at the head of the great parties in the State, very few can be named whose reputation is not stained by what, in our age, would be called gross perfidy and corruption. It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that the most unprincipled public men who have taken part in affairs within our memory would, if tried by the standard which was in fashion during the latter part of the seventeenth century, deserve to be regarded as scrupulous and disinterested.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 171.

4247. POLITICS, Disappointments in. Henry Clay. Old "Rough and Ready," as Taylor was called by his troops, . . . was chosen over Mr. Clay as the standard-bearer of his party. . . . To the overwhelming chagrin of Mr. Clay a man unknown in political circles was preferred as the candidate of the party of which he felt himself to have been the creator. Mr. Clay was enraged by the insult, and never became reconciled to it. Though he gave in the end a quiet vote for Taylor, he stubbornly refused during the campaign to open his lips or write a word in favor of his election.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 76.

4248. POLITICS, Dislike for. Samuel Johnson. I mentioned politics. JOHNSON: "Sir, I'd as soon have a man to break my bones as talk to me of public affairs, internal or external. I have lived to see things all as bad as they can be."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 484.

4249. POLITICS, disrelished. Gibbon in Parliament. Gibbon's political career is the side of his history from which a friendly biographer would most readily turn away. Not that it was exceptionally ignoble or self-seeking if tried by the standard of the time, but it was altogether commonplace and unworthy of him. The fact that he never even once opened his mouth in the House is not in itself blameworthy, though disappointing in a man of his power. It was indeed laudable enough if he had nothing to say. But why had he nothing to say? His excuse is timidity and want of readiness. We may reasonably assume that the cause lay deeper. With his mental vigor he would soon have overcome such obstacles if he had really wished and tried to overcome them. The fact is, that he never tried because he never wished. It is a singular thing to say of such a man, but nevertheless true, that he had no taste or capacity whatever for politics. He lived at one of the most exciting periods of our history; he assisted at debates in which constitutional and imperial questions of the highest moment were discussed by masters of eloquence and state policy, and he hardly appears to have been aware of the fact.—MORRISON'S GIBBON, ch. 6.

4250. POLITICS, Duplicity in. Leo X. [In the early part of the sixteenth century, when France and Austria were warring against each other for twenty-eight years, with short intervals of peace, the authorities at Rome pursued a double policy toward the contending sovereigns.] It is related of Leo X. that he avowed "that when he had concluded a treaty with one party, he did not on that account cease to negotiate with the other."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 17, p. 381.

4251. POLITICS, Eminence in. Martin Van Buren. In point of intellectual force, he must rank below the really eminent men with whom he was long associated in public life. But he was able, industrious, and, in political management, clever beyond any man who has thus far appeared in American politics.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 85.

4252. POLITICS, eschewed. Romans. The seat of justice has been publicly debauched. Resolutions are introduced against corruption, but no law can be carried. The knights are alienated. The Senate has lost its authority. The concord of the orders is gone, and the pillars of the commonwealth which I set up are overthrown. We have not a statesman, or the shadow of one. My friend Pompey, who might have done something, sits silent, admiring his fine clothes. Crassus will say nothing to make himself unpopular, and the rest are such idiots as to hope that although the constitution fall, they will save their own fishponds. [So Cicero wrote.]—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 12.

4253. POLITICS, Failure of. *Poor Ireland. [In 1515 the oppression of the poor in Ireland was universal.] The noble folk, whether English or Irish, were oppressors. They seized upon horse meat and man's meat of the king's poor subjects by compulsion, for naught, without any penny paying therefor. . . . The deputy and his council were extortioners. The Church was wholly abandoned to lucre, none preaching or teaching but the mendicant friars. In every department of lay or spiritual rule the private weal, and not the common weal, was alone regarded. . . . The people despaired of a remedy for these complicated miseries, and said, "No medicine can be had now for the said infirmity but such as have been had afore this time; and folks were as wise that time as they be now; and since they never could find remedy, how should remedy be found by us?" [Quoted from State papers.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 24, p. 387.

4254. POLITICS, Forgiveness in. *Napoleon I. [After Napoleon's escape from exile at Elba, and his re-ascension of the throne of France,] members of that senate which had pronounced Napoleon's forfeiture of the throne called, tremblingly, with their congratulations. The emperor received them with courtesy, and gave no indication of the slightest resentment. "I leave that act," said he, "for history to relate. For my part, I forget all past occurrences."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 26.

4255. POLITICS, Generous. *William Penn. The next care of Penn was to draw up a frame of government for his province [of Pennsylvania]. Herein was his great temptation. He had almost exhausted his father's estate in aiding the persecuted Quakers. A stated revenue would be very necessary in conducting his administration. His proprietary rights under the charter were so ample that he might easily reserve for himself large prerogatives and great emoluments in the government. He had before him the option of being a consistent, honest Quaker or a politic wealthy governor. He chose like a man; right triumphed over riches. The constitution which he framed was liberal almost to a fault; and the people were allowed to adopt or reject it as they might deem proper.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 25, p. 210.

4256. POLITICS, Hypocrisy in. *Augustus. The tender respect of Augustus for a free constitution which he had destroyed can only be explained by an attentive consideration of the character of that subtle tyrant. . . . a cool head, an unfeeling heart, and a cowardly disposition prompted him at the age of nineteen to assume the mask of hypocrisy, which he never afterward laid aside. With the same hand, and probably with the same temper, he signed the proscription of Cicero, and the pardon of Cinna. His virtues, and even his vices, were artificial; and according to the various dictates of his interest, he was at first the enemy, and at last the father, of the Roman world. When he framed the artful system of the Imperial authority, his moderation was inspired by his fears. He wished to deceive the people by an image of civil liberty, and the armies by an image of civil government.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 3, p. 87.

4257. POLITICS, Idealist in. *John Milton. On the course of affairs Milton's voice had no influence, as he had no part in their transaction. Milton was the last man of whom a practical politician would have sought advice. He knew nothing of the temper of the nation, and treated all that opposed his own view with supreme disdain. On the other hand, idealist though he was, he does not move in the sphere of speculative politics, or count among those philosophic names, a few in each century, who have influenced not action, but thought. Accordingly, his opinions have for us a purely personal interest. They are part of the character of the poet Milton, and do not belong to either world, of action or of thought.—MILTON, BY M. PATTISON, ch. 11.

4258. POLITICS, Insincerity in. *James II. To Barillon [the French minister] James expressed the strongest dislike of Halifax. "I know him well; I never can trust him. He shall have no share in the management of public business. As to the place which I have given him, it will just serve to show how little influence he has." But to Halifax it was thought convenient to hold a very different language. "All the past is forgotten," said the king, "except the service which you did me in the debate on the Exclusion bill."—MACAULAY'S ENGLAND, ch. 4, p. 416.

4259. POLITICS, Judas in. *Robert Ferguson. Robert Ferguson, the Judas of Dryden's great satire, . . . belonged to the class whose office it is to render in troubled times to exasperated parties those services from which honest men shrink in disgust and prudent men in fear—the class of fanatical knaves. Violent, malignant, regardless of truth, insensible to shame, insatiable of notoriety, delighting in intrigue, in tumult, in mischief for its own sake, he toiled during many years in the darkest mines of faction. He lived among libellers and false witnesses. He was the keeper of a secret purse from which agents too vile to be acknowledged received hire, and the director of a secret press whence pamphlets, bearing no name, were daily issued. There is strong reason to believe that he provided for his own safety by pretending at Whitehall to be a spy on the Whigs, and by furnishing the government with just so much information as sufficed to keep up his credit. He was deeply engaged in the Rye House Plot. . . . When the conspiracy was detected and his associates were in dismay, he bade them farewell with a laugh, and told them that they were novices.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 492.

4260. POLITICS mismanaged. *William, Prince of Orange. [His invading army was successful on English soil, and James II. a fugitive in France.] Till after the suppression of the western insurrection grave causes of dissension had separated William both from Whigs and Tories. He had seen with displeasure the attempts of the Whigs to strip the executive government of some powers which he thought necessary to its efficiency and dignity. He had seen with still deeper displeasure the countenance given by a large section of that party to the pretensions of Monmouth. The Opposition, it seemed, wished first to make the crown of England not worth the wearing, and then to place it on the head of a bastard and impostor.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 167.

4261. POLITICS misplaced. In Camp. There were not wanting persons who warned him [Pompey] that Cæsar's legions might still be dangerous. Both Cicero and Cato had advised him to avoid a battle, to allow Cæsar to wander about Greece till his supplies failed and his army was worn out by marches. Pompey himself was inclined to the same opinion. But Pompey was no longer able to act on his own judgment. The senators who were with him in the camp considered that in Greece, as in Rome, they were the supreme rulers of the Roman Empire. All along they had held their sessions and their debates, and they had voted resolutions which they expected to see complied with. . . . They had gradually wrested his authority out of his hands, and reduced him to the condition of an officer of the Senatorial Directory.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 22.

4262. POLITICS modified. Reign of James II. The bigotry of the most sturdy Churchman would not bear exportation across St. George's Channel. As soon as the Cavalier arrived in Ireland, and found that, without the hearty and courageous assistance of his Puritan neighbors, he and all his family would run imminent risk of being murdered by rapparees, his hatred of Puritanism, in spite of himself, began to languish and die away. It was remarked by eminent men of both parties, that a Protestant who, in Ireland, was called a high Tory, would in England have been considered as a moderate Whig.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 122.

4263. POLITICS, Parties in. Needed. The kings presided in the senate, and had a double suffrage. They were likewise the generals of the republic; but in other respects their power was extremely limited. They could form no enterprise without the sanction of a council of the citizens, whose duty was to watch over their measures. On considering this circumscribed authority of the kings, Condillac has well remarked that the throne seemed preserved in the line of the Heracliadæ, only with the view of preventing any citizen aspiring to it; and two kings were in reality less dangerous to liberty than one, since they constantly kept alive two opposite parties, each restraining the other's ambition, and thus preventing all approach to tyranny.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9, p. 91.

4264. POLITICS, Partisan. Samuel Johnson. An eminent public character being mentioned: JOHNSON: "I remember being present when he showed himself to be so corrupted, or at least something so different from what I think right, as to maintain that a member of Parliament should go along with his party, right or wrong. Now, sir, this is so remote from native virtue, from scholastic virtue, that a good man must have undergone a great change before he can reconcile himself to such a doctrine. It is maintaining that you may lie to the public; for you lie when you call that right which you think wrong, or the reverse. A friend of ours, who is too much an echo of that gentleman, observed that a man who does not stick uniformly to a party is only waiting to be bought.

Why then, said I, he is only waiting to be what that gentleman is already."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON.

4265. POLITICS, Power in. "King-Maker." Warwick found an opportunity of revenge. His daughter was married to the Duke of Clarence, the king's brother. This prince he seduced from his allegiance, as well as many of the nobles of the York faction, and Warwick now openly stood forth the champion of the house of Lancaster. After various intermediate changes, Edward [IV.] was deposed from the throne, and Henry VI. once more reinstated by the hands of Warwick, who was now distinguished by the epithet of the king-maker.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14, p. 236.

4266. — — — Charles James Fox. I asked him if it was true, as reported, that he had said lately, "I am for the king against Fox; but I am for Fox against Pitt." JOHNSON: "Yes, sir; the king is my master; but I do not know Pitt; and Fox is my friend." "Fox," added he, "is a most extraordinary man; here is a man . . . who has divided the kingdom with Cæsar; so that it was a doubt whether the nation should be ruled by the sceptre of George III. or the tongue of Fox."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 522.

4267. POLITICS, Prayer in. Samuel Johnson. [His prayer, in view of becoming a politician, was found in his diary:] "Enlighten my understanding with the knowledge of right, and govern my will by thy laws, that no deceit may mislead me, nor temptation corrupt me; that I may always endeavor to do good, and hinder evil."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 137.

4268. POLITICS, Preaching. Puritan. While nobles and statesmen were cowering in silence before the dreaded power of the kingship, the preachers spoke bluntly out. Not only Latimer, but Knox, Grindal, and Lever had uttered fiery remonstrances against the plunderers of Edward's [VI.] reign. Bradford had threatened them with the divine judgment which at last overtook them. "The judgment of the Lord! The judgment of the Lord!" cried he, with a lamentable voice and weeping tears.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 685.

4269. — — — Under Cromwell. Under no English government since the Reformation had there been so little religious persecution. The unfortunate Roman Catholics, indeed, were held to be scarcely within the pale of Christian charity; but the clergy of the fallen Anglican Church were suffered to celebrate their worship on condition that they would abstain from preaching about politics.—MACAULAY'S HIST. OF ENG., ch. 1, p. 129.

4270. — — — Jonathan Mayhew. [Pastor of West Church, Boston. The king's stamp officer had been resisted by a mob.] On the next Lord's day but one, before a crowded audience, choosing as his text, "I would they were even cut off which trouble you; for, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty." He preached fervidly in behalf of civil and religious freedom. "I hope," said he, "no persons among ourselves have encouraged the bringing of such a burden as the Stamp Act on the country."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 16.

4271. — — — Connecticut. A.D. 1708. It was first the custom, and afterward the order, that "the ministers of the gospel should preach a sermon on the day appointed by law for the choice of civil rulers, proper for the direction of the towns in the work before them."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 19.

4272. — — — Friars. When, in 1346, he [Edward III.] resolved upon the invasion of France, he published a manifesto upon the cause of the war, which he addressed to the Provincial of the Order of Preaching Friars in England, in which he exhorts him to urge his brethren to set forth his cause in their sermons.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 27, p. 451.

4273. — — — Reign of Charles II. The pulpits resounded with harangues against the sin of rebellion. The treatises in which Filmer maintained that hereditary despotism was the form of government ordained by God, and that limited monarchy was a pernicious absurdity, had recently appeared, and had been favorably received by a large section of the Tory party. The University of Oxford, on the very day on which Russell was put to death, adopted by a solemn public act these strange doctrines, and ordered the political works of Buchanan, Milton, and Baxter to be publicly burned in the court of the schools.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 252.

4274. POLITICS without Principle. Professional. He catches without effort the tone of any sect or party with which he chances to mingle. He discerns the signs of the times with a sagacity . . . with which a Mohawk warrior follows a track through the woods. But we shall seldom find, in a statesman so trained, integrity, constancy, or any of the virtues of the noble family of Truth. He has no faith in any doctrine, no zeal for any cause. . . . He sneers alike at those who are anxious to preserve and at those who are eager to reform. There is nothing in the State which he could not, without a scruple or a blush, join in defending or in destroying. Fidelity to opinions and to friends seems to him mere dulness and wrongheadedness. Politics he regards not as a science of which the object is the happiness of mankind, but as an exciting game of mixed chance and skill, at which a dexterous and lucky player may win.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 171.

4275. POLITICS, Reverses in. Tyler's Administration. For the first and only time in our political history, an administration conducting a war [with Mexico], victorious at every step, steadily lost ground in the country. The House of Representatives, which declared war on the 11th of May, 1846, was Democratic by a large majority. The House elected in the ensuing autumn, amid the resounding acclamations of Taylor's memorable victory at Monterey, had a decided Whig majority. This political reverse was due to three causes: the enactment of the tariff of 1846, which offended the manufacturing interests of the country; the receding of the administration on the Oregon question, which embarrassed the position and wounded the pride of the Northern Democrats; and the widespread apprehension that the war was undertaken for the purpose of extending and perpetuating slavery.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 64.

4276. POLITICS, Revulsion toward. Dishonor. [The Duke of Shrewsbury, formerly the favorite minister and secretary of State for William III., in 1700, when party violence had reached its climax, wrote Somers, the lord-chancellor:] I wonder that a man can be found in England who has bread that will be concerned in public business. Had I a son, I would sooner breed him a cobbler than a courtier, and a hangman than a statesman.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 16, p. 240.

4277. POLITICS, Sagacity in. Henry Clay. Mr. Clay possessed extraordinary sagacity in public affairs, seeing and foreseeing where others were blinded by ignorance or prejudice. He was a statesman by intuition, finding a remedy before others could discover the disease. His contemporaries appreciated his rare endowments. On the day of his first entrance into the House of Representatives he was chosen speaker, though but thirty-four years of age. This was all the more remarkable because the House was filled with men of recognized ability, who had been long in the public service.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 107.

4278. POLITICS in Saloons. Reign of Charles II. The coffee-house must not be dismissed with a cursory mention. It might, indeed, at that time, have been not improperly called a most important political institution. No Parliament had sat for years. The municipal council of the city had ceased to speak the sense of the citizens. Public meetings, harangues, resolutions, and the rest of the modern machinery of agitation had not yet come into fashion. Nothing resembling the modern newspaper existed. In such circumstances the coffee-houses were the chief organs through which the public opinion of the metropolis vented itself.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 341.

4279. POLITICS, Selfishness in. Romans. The Senate gave a notable evidence of their incapacity for selecting competent governors for the provinces by appointing in his [Crassus'] place Cæsar's old colleague, Bibulus. In their whole number there was no such fool as Bibulus. When he arrived in Syria he shut himself into a fortified town, leaving the Parthians to plunder and burn at their pleasure. Cicero mocked at him. The Senate thanked him for his distinguished services. The few serious men in Rome thought that Cæsar or Pompey should be sent out; or, if they could not be spared, at least one of the consuls of the year—Sulpicius Rufus or Marcus Marcellus. But the consuls were busy with home politics, and did not wish to go, nor did they wish that others should go and gather laurels instead of them. Therefore nothing was done at all, and Syria was left to fate and Bibulus.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 20.

4280. POLITICS, Trifles in. Whigs and Tories. [William III. had two parties in Parliament who were very bitter toward each other.] He met with such treatment from both as once gave him occasion to say, in a pet, to Lord Halifax, that all the difference he knew between the two parties was that the Tories would cut his throat in the morning, and the Whigs in the afternoon.—Knight's Eng., vol. 5, ch. 16, p. 244.

4281. POLITICS, Vexation in. Horace Greeley. As the standard-bearer of the Liberal Republican and Democratic parties, Horace Greeley, editor of the New York Tribune, was nominated. This was the last act in that remarkable man's career. For more than thirty years he had been an acknowledged leader of public opinion in America. He had discussed with vehement energy and enthusiasm almost every question in which the people of the United States have any interest. After a lifetime of untiring industry he was now, at the age of sixty-one, called to the forefront of political strife. The canvass was one of wild excitement and bitter denunciations. Mr. Greeley was overwhelmingly beaten, and died in less than a month after the election. In his death the nation lost a great philanthropist, and journalism its brightest light.—Ridpath's U. S., ch. 68, p. 558.

4282. POLITICS, Woman in. Reign of Charles II. A negotiation was arranged which lasted several months. The chief agent between the English and French courts was the beautiful, graceful, and intelligent Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans, sister of [King] Charles, sister-in-law of [King] Louis XIV., and a favorite with both. The King of England offered to declare himself a Roman Catholic, to dissolve the Triple Alliance, and join with France against Holland, if France would engage to lend him such military and pecuniary aid as might make him independent of his Parliament.—Macaulay's Eng., ch. 2, p. 192.

4283. POLITICS, Young Men in. Disdained. [Lord Clarendon, counsellor under Charles II.] Toward the young orators, who were rising to distinction and authority in the Lower House, his deportment was ungracious; and he succeeded in making them, with scarcely an exception, his deadly enemies. Indeed, one of his most serious faults was an inordinate contempt for youth, and this contempt was the more unjustifiable, because his own experience in English politics was by no means proportioned to his age; for so great a part of his life had been passed abroad, that he knew less of the world in which he found himself on his return than many who might have been his sons. . . . For these reasons he was disliked by the Commons.—Macaulay's Eng., ch. 2, p. 183.

4284. POMP in private Life. General Wallenstein. [Being dismissed from the army, where he had won renown,] repose was the last thing that Wallenstein contemplated when he returned to private life. In his retreat he surrounded himself with a regal pomp which seemed to mock the sentence of degradation. Six gates led to the palace he inhabited in Prague, and a hundred houses were pulled down to make way for his courtyard. Similar palaces were built on his other numerous estates. Gentlemen of the noblest houses contended for the honor of serving him, and even imperial chamberlains resigned the golden key to the emperor, to fill a similar office under Wallenstein. He maintained sixty pages, who were instructed by the ablest masters. His antechamber was protected by fifty life-guards. His table never consisted of less than one hundred covers, and his seneschal was a person of distinction. When he travelled his baggage and suite accompanied him in a hundred wagons, drawn by six or four horses; his court followed in sixty carriages, attended by fifty led horses. The pomp of his liveries, the splendor of his equipages, and the decorations of his apartments were in keeping with all the rest. Six barons and as many knights were in constant attendance about his person, and ready to execute his slightest order. Twelve patrols went their rounds about his palace, to prevent any disturbance. His busy genius required silence. The noise of coaches was to be kept away from his residence, and the streets leading to it were frequently blocked up with chains. His own circle was as silent as the approaches to his palace; dark, reserved, and impenetrable, he was more sparing of his words than of his gifts, while the little that he spoke was harsh and imperious. He never smiled, and the coldness of his temperament was proof against sensual seductions.—THIRTY YEARS' WAR, § 228.

4285. POMP, Oriental. Royal. While the successors of Cyrus reigned over Asia, the province of Assyria alone maintained, during a third part of the year, the luxurious plenty of the table and household of the great king. Four considerable villages were assigned for the subsistence of his Indian dogs; eight hundred stallions and sixteen thousand mares were constantly kept, at the expense of the country, for the royal stables; and as the daily tribute which was paid to the satrap amounted to one English bushel of silver, we may compute the annual revenue of Assyria at more than twelve hundred thousand pounds sterling.—Gibbon's Rome, ch. 24, p. 481.

4286. POMPOSITY, Expression of. Samuel Johnson. Lord Lucan tells a very good story, which . . . is certainly characteristic: that when the sale of Thrane's brewery was going forward, Johnson appeared bustling about, with an ink-horn and pen in his button-hole, like an excise-man; and on being asked what he really considered to be the value of the property which was to be disposed of, answered, "We are not here to sell a parcel of boilers and vats, but the potentiality of growing rich beyond the dreams of avarice."—Boswell's Johnson, p. 456.

4287. POOR benefited. By Civilization. Of the blessings which civilization and philosophy bring with them, a large proportion is common to all ranks, and would, if withdrawn, be missed as painfully by the laborer as by the peer. The market-place which the rustic can now reach with his cart in an hour was, a hundred and sixty years ago, a day's journey from him. The street which now affords to the artisan, during the whole night, a secure, a convenient, and a brilliantly lighted walk, was, a hundred and sixty years ago, so dark after sunset that he would not have been able to see his hand, so ill paved that he would have run constant risk of breaking his neck, and so ill watched that he would have been in imminent danger of being knocked down and plundered of his small earnings. Every bricklayer who falls from a scaffold, every sweeper of a crossing who is run over by a carriage, now may have his wounds dressed and his limbs set with a skill such as, a hundred and sixty years ago, all the wealth of a great lord like Ormond, or of a merchant prince like Clayton, could not have purchased.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 393.

4288. POOR burdened. For the Rich. More frequently than usual, in consequence of the king's captivity [Richard I. was captured while returning from the crusade, and imprisoned more than a year by the Emperor of Germany] and other accidents, aids of no small amount were imposed upon the citizens; and the rich men, sparing their own purses, wanted the poor to pay everything.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 22, p. 321.

4289. POOR, Children of the. Wesleys. [Samuel Wesley, the father of John Wesley, reared a family of ten children on] his Epworth living, which afforded but £130; . . . he lived in continual conflict with poverty; . . . he was imprisoned for debt and died in debt. . . . The economy by which so large a family were reared and educated is a remarkable fact in its history.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 59.

4290. POOR, Conspiracy against the. English Legislation. In some points, such as his [Thomas More's] treatment of the question of labor, he still remains far in advance of current opinion. The whole system of society around him seemed to him "nothing but a conspiracy of the rich against the poor." Its economic legislation, from the statute of laborers to the statutes by which the parliament of 1515 strove to fix a standard of wages, was simply the carrying out of such a conspiracy by process of law. "The rich are ever striving to pare away something further from the daily wages of the poor by private fraud and even by public law, so that the wrong already existing (for it is a wrong that those from whom the State derives most benefit should receive least reward) is made yet greater by means of the law of the State." "The rich devise every means by which they may, in the first place, secure to themselves what they have amassed by wrong, and then take to their own use and profit, at the lowest possible price, the work and labor of the poor. And so soon as the rich decide on adopting these devices in the name of the public, then they become law." The result was the wretched existence to which the labor class was doomed, "a life so wretched that even a beast's life seems enviable."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 523.

4291. POOR, Decrease of the. England. There can hardly be a more important test of the condition of the common people than the ratio which this class bears to the whole society. At present the men, women, and children who receive relief are, in bad years, one tenth of the inhabitants of England, and, in good years, one thirtieth. Gregory King estimated them in his time at more than a fifth; and this estimate, which all our respect for his authority will scarcely prevent us from calling extravagant, was pronounced by Davenant eminently judicious.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 391.

4292. POOR, Discrimination against the. Law. In 1704, . . . by the statute "for raising recruits for the land forces and marines," justices of the peace and mayors or other head officers of borough were empowered "to raise and levy such able-bodied men as have not any lawful calling or employment, or visible means for their maintenance and livelihood, to serve as soldiers. The constables were to receive 10s. per head for bringing the tattered prodigals before the justices. This statute was renewed in 1705 and the system was also tried in the latter end of the reign of George II."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 18, p. 272.

4293. POOR, Dwellings of the. Cellars. In 1837 . . . in Liverpool there were 8000 cellars occupied by 30,000 people, few of which cellars, from the absence of drains and sewers, were entirely free from damp, and most of them were inundated after a fall of rain. In a report laid before the British Association for the Advancement of Science, it was stated that the proportion of the population who lived in cellars was 13 per cent; of Manchester, 11½ per cent; of Salford, 8 per cent; of Bury, 3¼ per cent.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 22, p. 393.

4294. POOR, Hardships of the. Miners. The report of a commission appointed by Parliament in 1840, to inquire into the employment of the children of the poorer classes in mines and collieries, exhibited in some mining districts a state of things, with regard not only to children but to women, which could scarcely be paralleled. . . . A child of six years of age, with a girdle round his or her waist, to which was attached a chain passing under the legs, and fastened to a cart, had thus to drag a load on all fours through avenues not so good as a common sewer. Children and women who were not employed in dragging loads by the girdle and chain had to carry loads of coal on their backs up steep ascents equal in distance to the height of St. Paul's fourteen times a day.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 22, p. 395.

4295. POOR, First Laws for the. England. The tentative process by which the principle of a public contribution for the relief of the poor was first approached, is distinctly set forth by the statute of 1551-52. A book was to be kept for each parish, in which should be entered the names of the householders, and of the impotent poor. In whitsun-week two or more persons were to be appointed as collectors of alms; and on the Sunday following, when the people are at church, "the said collectors shall gently ask and demand of every man and woman what they of their charity will give weekly toward the relief of the poor." The sums so collected weekly were to be distributed by the same collectors, "after such sort that the more impotent may have the more help, and such as can get part of their living have the less; and by the discretion of the collector to be put in such labor as they be able to do." If any person, being able, refuse to contribute, he was to be gently exhorted by the parson and churchwardens; and if their exhortations failed, he was to be sent for by the bishop, to be induced and persuaded to so charitable a deed. . . . The same principle is maintained by the statute of 1562-63: "If any person of his froward or wilful mind shall obstinately refuse to give weekly . . . according to his ability," the bishop had power to bind him to appear at the next sessions, when the justices, if he continued obstinate, might determine what sum he should pay, and commit him to prison if he persisted in his refusal,

[This was the first assertion of the principle of a compulsory assessment of property for the relief of the poor.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 17, p. 267.

4296. POOR oppressed by Law, England. [In 1388 no workingman, skilled or unskilled, was permitted to] bear buckler, sword, nor dagger except in the time of war. They were to abandon "all idle games of tennis, football, quoits, skittles, dice and casting stone." [An act of Parliament forbade it.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 1, p. 14.

4297. POOR, Oppression of the. Servants. [In the middle of the eighteenth century the justice of the peace] would commit a servant to Bridewell at any time when a master or mistress desired it.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 108.

4298. ———. Roman. [When during the wars against the Sabines the poor of the city of Rome vainly plead for toleration,] they left the city, and withdrew to the hill now called Sacred, near the river Anio, but without committing any violence or other act of sedition. Only as they went along, they loudly complained that it was now a great while since the rich had driven them from their habitations; that Italy would anywhere supply them with air and water and a place of burial; and that Rome, if they had stayed in it, would afford them no other privilege, unless it were such, to bleed and die in fighting for their wealthy oppressors. The Senate was then alarmed, and from the oldest men of their body selected the most moderate and popular to treat with the people. At the head of them was Menenius Agrippa, who after much entreaty addressed to them, and many arguments in defence of the Senate, concluded his discourse with this celebrated fable: "The members of the human body once mutinied against the belly, and accused it of lying idle and useless, while they were all laboring and toiling to satisfy its appetites; but the belly only laughed at their simplicity, who knew not that, though it received all the nourishment into itself, it prepared and distributed it again to all parts of the body. Just so, my fellow-citizens," said he, "stands the case between the Senate and you. For their necessary counsels and acts of government are productive of advantage to you all, and distribute their salutary influence among the whole people."—PLUTARCH'S CAIUS MARCIUS.

4299. POOR, Refuge for. James Oglethorpe. Georgia, the thirteenth American colony, was founded in a spirit of pure benevolence. The laws of England permitted imprisonment for debt. Thousands of English laborers, who through misfortune and thoughtless contracts had become indebted to the rich, were annually arrested and thrown into jail. There were desolate and starving families. The miserable condition of the debtor class at last attracted the attention of Parliament. In 1728 a commissioner was appointed, at his own request, to look into the state of the poor, to visit the prisons of the kingdom, and to report measures of relief. The work was accomplished, the jails were opened, and the poor victims of debt returned to their homes. The noble commissioner was not yet satisfied. . . . To provide a refuge for the down-trodden poor of England, and the distressed Protestants of other countries, he now appealed to George II. for the privilege of planting a colony in America. The petition was favorably heard, and on the 9th of June, 1732, a royal charter was issued by which the territory between the Savannah and Altamaha rivers, and westward from the upper fountains of those rivers to the Pacific, was organized and granted to a corporation for twenty-one years, to be held in trust for the poor.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 29, p. 238.

4300. POOR, Remembrance of the. In Trade. Samuel Pepys writes of his visit to the Hague in 1660: "In every house of entertainment there hangs in every room a poor man's box, it being their custom to confirm all bargains by putting something into the box, and that binds as fast as anything."

4301. POPE superseded, The. Henry VIII. Yet Henry, though he had quarrelled with the pope [Clement VII.], and despoiled and abolished the monasteries, had not renounced the religion of the Church of Rome. He still prided himself on his title of Defender of the Faith, and he continued, in every respect, to be a good Catholic, except that he chose to be pope in his own kingdom.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 20, p. 301.

4302. POPE, Supremacy of the. Beneficial. Even the spiritual supremacy arrogated by the pope was, in the Dark Ages, productive of far more good than evil. Its effect was to unite the nations of Western Europe in one great commonwealth. What the Olympian chariot course and the Pythian oracle were to all the Greek cities, from Trebizond to Marseilles, Rome and her bishop were to all Christians of the Latin communion, from Calabria to the Hebrides. Thus grew up sentiments of enlarged benevolence. Races separated from each other by seas and mountains acknowledged a fraternal tie and a common code of public law.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 8.

4303. POPERY, Enslavement by. History. [Lord Shaftesbury said in 1678:] Popery and slavery, like two sisters, go hand in hand; and sometimes one goes first, and sometimes the other; but whosoever the one enters, the other is following close behind.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 20, p. 332.

4304. POPERY, Struggle with. Frederick II. [The Emperor of Germany,] Frederick II., by his policy and his arms, carried on a vigorous contest with four popes successively without bringing any of them to submission. By two of these popes, Gregory IX. and Innocent IV., he was excommunicated and solemnly deposed; but Frederick kept possession of his throne and maintained his independence. In consequence of the last sentence of deposition, he wrote, in the most spirited manner, to all the princes of Germany, "I am not the first," says he, "whom the clergy have treated so unworthily, and I shall not be the last. But you are the cause of it, by obeying those hypocrites, whose ambition, you are sensible, is carried beyond all bounds. How many infamous actions may you not discover in the court of Rome! While those pontiffs are abandoned to the vices of the age, and intoxicated with pleasure, the greatness of their wealth extinguishes in their minds all sense of religion. It is, therefore, a work of charity to deprive them of those pernicious treasures which are their ruin; and in this cause you ought all to co-operate with me."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 9, p. 152.

4305. POPES, Disreputable. John XII. The influence of two sister prostitutes, Marozia and Theodora, was founded on their wealth and beauty, their political and amorous intrigues; the most strenuous of their lovers were rewarded with the Roman mitre, and their reign may have suggested to the darker ages the fable of a female pope. The bastard son, the grandson, and the great-grandson of Marozia, a rare genealogy, were seated in the chair of St. Peter, and it was at the age of nineteen years that the second of these became the head of the Latin church. His youth and manhood were of a suitable complexion; and the nations of pilgrims could bear testimony to the charges that were urged against him in a Roman Synod, and in the presence of Otho the Great. As John XII. had renounced the dress and decencies of his profession, the soldier may not perhaps be dishonored by the wine which he drank, the blood that he spilt, the flames that he kindled, or the licentious pursuits of gaming and hunting. His open simony might be the consequence of distress; and his blasphemous invocation of Jupiter and Venus, if it be true, could not possibly be serious. But we read, with some surprise, that the worthy grandson of Marozia lived in public adultery with the matrons of Rome; that the Lateran palace was turned into a school for prostitution, and that his rapes of virgins and widows had deterred the female pilgrims from visiting the tomb of St. Peter, lest, in the devout act, they should be violated by his successor.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 49, p. 61.

4306. POPULARITY, Dangers of. Pompey. A Roman commander, on landing in Italy after foreign service, was expected to disband his legions, and relapse into the position of a private person. A popular and successful general was an object of instinctive fear to the politicians who held the reins of government. The Senate was never pleased to see any individual too much an object of popular idolatry; and in the case of Pompey their suspicion was the greater on account of the greatness of his achievements, and because his command had been forced upon them by the people against their will.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 12.

4307. POPULARITY deserved. Emperor Titus. The desolation of Campania, occasioned by this terrible eruption of Vesuvius, was remedied to the utmost by the beneficence of Titus, who set apart large funds for the relief of the sufferers. In order to judge of their losses, he went himself to Campania, and by a kind of fatality, while absent on this benevolent expedition, a fire, which broke out in the city, desolated a great part of Rome. The losses occasioned to his subjects by these reiterated calamities he repaired at his own charges, not from the public money, which is generally the treasury of the prince's bounties, but from the sale of the superfluous ornaments and riches of his palaces. Thus this virtuous prince occupied himself by every means which generosity or benevolence could dictate in diffusing happiness among all classes of his subjects, when, to their unspeakable regret, he was cut off in the third year of his reign. He died at the age of forty, leaving behind him the most merited and exalted epithet, Delicia humani generis—the delight of the human race.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 494.

4308. POPULARITY, Doctrinal. Arminian. The Arminian doctrine, a doctrine less austere logical than that of the early Reformers, but more agreeable to the popular notions of the divine justice and benevolence, spread fast and wide. The infection soon reached the court. Opinions which, at the time of the accession of James [I.], no clergyman could have avowed without imminent risk of being stripped of his gown, were now the best title to preferment. A divine of that age who was asked by a simple country gentleman what the Arminians held, answered with as much truth as wit, that they held all the best bishoprics and deaneries in England.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 74.

4309. POPULARITY, An evil. Sale of Indulgences. The region round about Magdeburg, Halberstadt, Zerbst, and Halle was traversed by Tetzel as if he were a distinguished prelate of the Church. He rode in a magnificent wagon surrounded by a mounted body-guard. He was met at the gates of every city he entered by the monks and other clergy, the municipal councillors, teachers and students, men and women, old and young, amid the ringing of bells, the singing of church choirs, and the burning of torches. At the head of the procession was carried the papal bull upon a velvet cushion and taken into the church. Here was erected a red cross, on which was fastened the papal banner. Then Tetzel mounted the pulpit and importuned the people with his admonitions and recommendations of indulgences: "Now, now is the day of grace come to your very doors! Ye women, sell your veils and purchase indulgences with the proceeds!" He classified sins and misdemeanors, and fixed a definite tax for each and all. Thus, sacrilege or church robbery and perjury were rated at nine ducats; a murder already committed, at eight ducats; adultery, at six ducats, etc. It is said that upon his treasure-chest was inscribed the motto:

"Soon as the coin in the box doth ring,
The soul can into heaven spring."

—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 2, p. 13.

4310. POPULARITY without Fame. Clay vs Webster. It was not . . . in Mr. Webster's nature to become a partisan chief. Mr. Clay, on the other hand, was naturally and inevitably a leader. In all the discussions of the Senate in which constitutional questions were involved, Mr. Clay instinctively deferred to Mr. Webster. In the parliamentary debates which concerned the position of parties and the fate of measures, which enchained the Senate and led captive the people, Mr. Clay was facile princeps. Mr. Webster argued the principle. Mr. Clay embodied it in a statute. Mr. Webster's speeches are still read with interest and studied with profit. Mr. Clay's speeches swayed listening senates and moved multitudes, but reading them is a disappointment.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 107.

4311. POPULARITY hindered. Reign of Charles II. Among the statesmen of that age,

Halifax was, in genius, the first. His intellect was fertile, subtle, and capacious. His polished, luminous, and animated eloquence, set off by the silver tones of his voice, was the delight of the House of Lords. His conversation overflowed with thought, fancy, and wit. His political tracts well deserve to be studied for their literary merit, and fully entitle him to a place among English classics. To the weight derived from talents so great and various, he united all the influence which belongs to rank and ample possessions. Yet he was less successful in politics than many who enjoyed smaller advantages. Indeed, those intellectual peculiarities which make his writings valuable, frequently impeded him in the contests of active life; for he always saw passing events, not in the point of view in which they commonly appear to one who bears a part in them, but in the point of view in which, after the lapse of many years, they appear to the philosophic historian. With such a turn of mind, he could not long continue to act cordially with any body of men.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 227.

4312. POPULARITY, A just. Julius Cæsar. He was recognized as the greatest soldier which Rome had produced, the army, the people, Italy, the provinces all adoring his name. . . . No fault could be found with his administration. His wars had paid their own expenses. He had doubled the pay of his troops, but his military chest was still full, and his own wealth seemed boundless. He was adorning the Forum with new and costly buildings. Senators, knights, young men of rank who had been extravagant, had been relieved by his generosity, and were his pensioners. Gaul might have been impatient at its loss of liberty, but no word of complaint was heard against Cæsar for oppressive government. The more genius he had shown the more formidable he was. Let him be consul, and he would be the master of them all.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, p. 49.

4313. POPULARITY, Loss of. Sir Henry Vane. The former governor of Massachusetts, the benefactor of Rhode Island, the ever-faithful friend of New England, adhered with undaunted firmness to the "glorious cause" of popular liberty, and, shunned by every man who courted the returning monarch [Charles II.], he became noted for the most catholic unpopularity. He fell from the affections of the English people, when the English people fell from the jealous care of their liberties. He had ever been incorrupt and disinterested, merciful and liberal.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 11.

4314. POPULARITY Lost. President John Adams. Not to be once re-elected was then considered as a disgrace, and Mr. Adams was, for many years, regarded as a man who had been tried in a high place and found wanting. His grandson mentions that his letters, during the last year of his presidency, may be counted by thousands; while those of the next year averaged less than two a week! Gradually, however, as party passions subsided, the real and great merits of John Adams were once more recognized, and his errors and foibles were first forgiven, and then forgotten.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 179.

4315. POPULARITY, Means of. Themistocles. [Themistocles, the Athenian general, sought popularity by] charging his memory with the names of the citizens, so that he readily called each by his own.—PLUTARCH'S THEMISTOCLES.

4316. POPULARITY misjudged. Murdered Cæsar's. The tyrannicides, as the murderers of Cæsar called themselves, had expected that the Roman mob would be caught by the cry of liberty, and would hail them as the deliverers of their country. They found that the people did not respond as they had anticipated. The city was stunned. The Forum was empty. The gladiators, whom they had secreted in the Temple, broke out and plundered the unprotected booths. A dead and ominous silence prevailed everywhere. At length a few citizens collected in knots. Brutus spoke, and Cassius spoke. They extolled their old constitution. They said that Cæsar had overthrown it; that they had slain him, not from private hatred or private interest, but to restore the liberties of Rome. The audience was dead and cold.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 27.

4317. POPULARITY necessary. Henry I. An usurper must secure his power by acts of popularity. Henry, soon after his accession to the throne, granted a charter, extremely favorable to the liberties of the people, and which has been justly regarded as the groundwork of the claim of privileges made by the English barons in the reign of King John, which he confirmed by Magna Charta. These privileges, it is even contended by the zealous advocates for the rights of the people, were of a much more ancient date. "Henry I.," says Lord Lyttelton, "by this charter restored the Saxon laws which were in use under Edward the Confessor;" but with such alterations, or, as he styled them, emendations, as had been made by his father, with the advice of his parliament; at the same time annulling all civil customs and illegal exactions, by which the realm had been unjustly oppressed.—TYTTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 8, p. 134.

4318. POPULARITY, Reaction of. Lafayette. He made one more attempt to save the king [Louis XVI.] by inducing him to come to his camp and fight for his throne. This project being rejected, and the author of it denounced by Robespierre, his bust publicly burned in Paris, and the medal formerly voted him broken by the hand of the executioner, he deemed it necessary to seek an asylum in a neutral country. Having provided for the safety of his army, he crossed the frontiers, in August, 1792, accompanied by twenty-one persons, all of whom, on passing an Austrian post, were taken prisoners, and Lafayette was thrown into a dungeon. His noble wife, who had been for fifteen months a prisoner in Paris, hastened, after her release, to share her husband's captivity.

4319. POPULARITY sacrificed. Lafayette. From this moment dates the decline of Lafayette's popularity; and his actions, moderate and wise, continually lessened it. He demanded, as a member of the National Assembly, that persons accused of treason should be fairly tried by a jury, and he exerted all his power, while giving a constitution to his country, to preserve the monarchy. To appease the suspicions of the people that the king meditated a flight from Paris, he declared that he would answer with his head for the king's remaining. When, therefore, in June, 1791, the king and queen made their blundering attempt to escape, Lafayette was immediately suspected of having secretly aided it. Danton cried out at the Jacobin club: "We must have the person of the king or the head of the commanding general!"—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 482.

4320. POPULARITY by Simplicity. Charles II. He rose early, and generally passed three or four hours a day in the open air. He might be seen, before the dew was off the grass in St. James' Park, striding among the trees, playing with his spaniels, and flinging corn to his ducks; and these exhibitions endeared him to the common people, who always love to see the great unbend.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 398.

4321. POPULARITY sought. Cimon. To raise himself to some sort of equality with Cimon, who was then at the height of glory, Pericles made his court to the people. And as Cimon was his superior in point of fortune, which he employed in relieving the poor Athenians, in providing victuals every day for the necessitous, and clothing the aged, and beside this levelled his fences with the ground, that all might be at liberty to gather his fruit, Pericles had recourse to the expedient of dividing the public treasure.—PLUTARCH'S PERICLES.

4322. POPULARITY, Strange. David Crockett. Some men have talked, others have written, others have fought themselves into Congress; but David Crockett shot himself thither. It was his wonderful skill as a marksman and his daring as a bear-hunter which made him so popular in his district, that when he chose to run for office he usually distanced all competitors. He could shoot a humming-bird on the wing with a single ball. Seated upon the margin of a river, he would aim at a fish, and as soon as the crack of his rifle was heard, one of the little inmates of the stream would be seen struggling on the surface. He used to speak of his battered old rifle in words like these: "She's a mighty rough old piece, but I love her; for she and I have seen hard times. She mighty seldom tells me a lie. If I hold her right, she always sends the ball where I tell her."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 662.

4323. POPULARITY, Tide of. Duke of Monmouth. [He was the illegitimate son of Charles II.] The interest which the populace took in him whom they regarded as the champion of the true religion, and the rightful heir of the British throne, was kept up by every artifice. When Monmouth arrived in London at midnight, the watchmen were ordered by the magistrates to proclaim the joyful event through the streets of the city; the people left their beds; bonfires were lighted; the windows were illuminated; the churches were opened, and a merry peal rose from all the steeples. When he travelled, he was everywhere received with not less pomp, and with far more enthusiasm, than had been displayed when kings had made progresses through the realm. He was escorted from mansion to mansion by long cavalcades of armed gentlemen and yeomen. Cities poured forth their whole population to receive him. Electors thronged round him, to assure him that their votes were at his disposal.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 235.

4324. POPULARITY, Vanity of. Cromwell's. The pomp and enthusiasm which greeted him on his return from the double conquest of Ireland and Scotland dazzled not his constancy. "You see that crowd, you hear those shouts," he whispered in the ear of a friend who attended in the procession; "both would be still greater if I were on my way to the gallows." A light from above impressed on his clear judgment the emptiness of worldly popularity.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 55.

4325. POPULARITY, A vicious. Nero's. He was popular because he presented to the degraded populace their own image and similitude. The froglike unclean spirits which proceeded, as it were, out of his mouth were potent with these dwellers in an atmosphere of pestilence. They had lost all love for freedom and nobleness; they cared only for doles and excitement. Even when the infamies of a Petronius had been superseded by the murderous orgies of Tigellinus, Nero was still everywhere welcomed with shouts as a god on earth, and saluted on coins as Apollo, as Hercules, as "THE SAVIOUR OF THE WORLD." The poets still assured him that there was no deity in heaven who would not think it an honor to concede to him his prerogative; that if he did not place himself well in the centre of Olympus, the equilibrium of the universe would be destroyed. Victims were slain along his path, and altars raised for him—for this wretch, whom an honest slave could not but despise and loathe—as though he was too great for mere human honors. Nay, more, he found adorers and imitators of his execrable example—an Otho, a Vitellius, a Domitian, a Commodus, a Caracalla, an Heliogabalus—to poison the air of the world. The lusts and hungers of the world lamented him, and cherished his memory, and longed for his return.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 5, p. 41.

4326. POPULATION, Changes of. Constantinople. [Why Constantine formed] his design of altering the seat of empire, it is not easy to determine. He fixed his eyes, however, on Byzantium, to which he gave the name of Constantinople. He erected there the most superb structures, and in order to people his new city, he made a law by which no Asiatic should have the right of disposing of his estate by testament, unless he possessed a dwelling-house in Constantinople. Those, again, who resided there were gratified by a variety of alluring privileges; and by means of these he drew the poorer inhabitants from Rome, while the richer voluntarily followed the prince and his court. The grandees brought with them their slaves, and Rome in a few years became almost depopulated. Italy was also greatly exhausted of her inhabitants, and Constantinople swelled at once to the most overgrown dimensions. When the empire was thus divided, all riches naturally centred in the new capital.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 2, p. 510.

4327. POPULATION, Extension of. Westward. [In 1840] the population had reached the aggregate of seventeen million souls, being an increase since 1830 of over six millions. It was found from the tables that eleven twelfths of the people lived outside of the larger cities and towns, showing the strong preponderance of the agricultural over the manufacturing and commercial interest. One of the most interesting lessons of the census was found in the fact that the wonderful growth of the United States was in extent and area, and not in accumulation; in the spread of civilization rather than in intensity. For since 1830 the average population of the country had not increased by so much as one person to the square mile.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 53, p. 440.

4328. ——. United States. The centre of "representative population" has continually tended westward. In 1790 it was twenty-two miles east of Washington; it has never been east of the national metropolis since, and never can be again. At the census of 1800 it had been transferred thirty miles west of Washington; in 1820 it was seventy-one miles west of that city; in 1830 one hundred and eight miles. Its westward movement from 1830 to 1840 was no less than fifty-two miles—more than five miles a year. During about fifty years it has kept nearly the same parallel of latitude, having deviated only about ten miles southward, while it has advanced about two hundred miles westward.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 1, p. 25.

4329. PORTRAIT prohibited. Queen Elizabeth's. A curious proof of how desirous Elizabeth was of the praise of beauty exists in a proclamation issued by her in 1563, in the thirty-third year of her age, and fifth of her reign, which sets forth, that, from the great desire which all ranks of people have shown to have portraits of her Majesty, there have been a great number of pictures made "which do not sufficiently express the natural representation of her Majesty's person, favor, or grace, but for the most part have erred therein;—And for that her Majesty perceiveth that a great number of her loving subjects are much grieved, and take great offence with the errors and deformities already committed by sundry persons in this behalf;—Therefore she straitly charges all manner of persons to forbear from painting, graving, printing, or making any portrait of her Majesty, or from showing or publishing such as are apparently deformed, until some perfect pattern or example shall be made by some coming person, which shall be approved by her."—NOTE IN TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 28, p. 392.

4330. POSITION, Value of. Battle of Issus. Darius was impatient to check the presumption of Alexander, and, advancing to meet him, rashly entered the passes between the mountains of Cilicia, near the town of Issus, a situation where, from the nature of the ground, the greatest part of his army, if then attacked, could not possibly be brought to act with effect against the enemy. Alexander, though then weakened by disease (the consequence of a fever caught by imprudently bathing, when overheated, in the river Cydnus), no sooner received intelligence of the critical situation of the Persians in the defiles of a mountainous country than he hastened with the utmost ardor to attack them. . . . Historians have lavished all the powers of description in painting the splendor, riches, and magnificence of the military equipage of this immense host. That body of the Persians named the Immortals consisted of 10,000 chosen troops, who were clothed in robes of gold embroidery, adorned with precious stones, and wore about their necks massy collars of pure gold. The chariot of Darius was supported by statues of gold; and the beams, axle, and wheels were studded with precious stones. Ten thousand horsemen followed the chariot with lances plated with silver. The mother and the wife of Darius had their separate chariots, attended by a numerous train of females on horseback; and the pageant was closed by a vast retinue of the wives of the Persian nobles and their children, guarded by some companies of foot lightly armed. Darius, caught thus at unawares, in the mountains of Cilicia, with this immense but most inefficient force, was taught, in the battle of Issus, how little confidence is to be placed in numbers, when matched against a few experienced and well-disciplined troops. The Persians were defeated with immense slaughter, their loss amounting, as is said, to 110,000 men, while that of the Macedonians, according to Diodorus and Quintus Curtius, was no more than 450.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4, p. 183.

4331. POSSESSION, Right of. Micmac Indians. [Edward Cornwallis, Governor of English colony at Halifax, demanded an oath of allegiance, and threatened confiscation of their lands if they refused.] "The land on which you sleep is mine," such was the message of the implacable tribe; "I sprung out of it as the grass does; I was born on it from sire to son; it is mine forever." So the council that met at Halifax voted all the poor red men to be "so many banditti, ruffians or rebels."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 2.

4332. POST-OFFICE opposed. Reign of Charles II. An enterprising citizen of London, William Dockwray, set up, at great expense, a penny post, which delivered letters and parcels six or eight times a day in the busy and crowded streets near the Exchange, and four times a day in the outskirts of the capital. This improvement was, as usual, strenuously resisted. The porters complained that their interests were attacked, and tore down the placards in which the scheme was announced to the public. The excitement caused by Godfrey's death, and by the discovery of Colemans' papers, was then at the height. A cry was therefore raised that the penny post was a popish contrivance. The great Doctor Oates, it was affirmed, had hinted a suspicion that the Jesuits were at the bottom of the scheme, and that the bags, if examined, would be found full of treason. The utility of the enterprise was, however, so great and obvious that all opposition proved fruitless.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 360.

4333. POSTERITY denied. Mahomet. In the largest indulgence of polygamy, the founder of a religion and empire might aspire to multiply the chances of a numerous posterity and a lineal succession. The hopes of Mahomet were fatally disappointed. The virgin Ayesha and his ten widows of mature age and approved fertility were [unproductive of any son].—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 151.

4334. POVERTY a Blessing. Ministerial. When Bishop George was a young itinerant on his first circuit, the discouragements were so great and so numerous that he concluded to abandon the work and return home, but was detained for want of the money to pay his travelling expenses. He attempted to get it by teaching school, but was defeated. He was led to further reflection, and saw the snare into which he had well-nigh fallen, and abhorred the idea of relinquishing his post dishonorably.—STEVENS' HISTORY OF M. E. CHURCH.

4335. POVERTY, Blessings of. Blaise Pascal. Poverty and sickness he regarded as among the chief of blessings. He almost went as far as the modern French philosopher, Proudhon, who said, "Property is robbery." "No Christian," he used to say, "has a right to use any more of his property than is strictly necessary for his maintenance and the maintenance of those dependent upon him;" all the rest, he thought, belonged to the poor and needy, and could not be withheld from them without injustice. He acted upon this principle most scrupulously. With regard to sickness, he considered it a signal favor of Heaven. "Pity me not," said he, when some one expressed sympathy for his sufferings—"pity me not, for sickness is the natural state of Christians; because, when a man is sick, he is just as he ought to be always—suffering pain, enduring the privation of all the good and all the pleasures of sense, exempt from the evil passions which work within him all his life, without ambition, free from avarice, and in the continual expectation of death."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 104.

4336. POVERTY, Crime of. In Law. Under the law of Henry VIII. destitution was treated as a crime, and wandering poverty was to be stockaded and scourged out of existence. [For a long time their own parish was the boundary within which the poor might endeavor to obtain a livelihood; beyond that circle they could not pass. In those parishes where there was the most capital and consequently the most labor,] there the poor people would endeavor to settle themselves. A natural struggle took place between those who wanted to come in and the authorities who were resolved to keep them out. A dread that under-tenants might become chargeable led to a domestic inquisition of a very tyrannous nature. At Leicester they were searched for every month. At Brighton no incomer was to be allowed until the constable and church-wardens had ascertained that he was unlikely to become burdensome to the town. A new tailor comes to Lynne, he receives a peremptory notice of a day on which he is to depart. The jury in that place even present a man who "harboreth his wife's sister."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 269.

4337. POVERTY, Devices in. Oliver Goldsmith. [He set up as a doctor in the suburbs of London.] His coat was a second-hand one, of rusty velvet, with a patch on the left breast, which he adroitly covered with his three-cornered hat during his medical visits; and we have an amusing anecdote of his contest of courtesy with a patient who persisted in endeavoring to relieve him from the hat, which only made him press it more devoutly to his heart.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 6, p. 56.

4338. POVERTY vs. Extravagance. Reign of Charles II. [In 1666] there were large numbers of the humble retainers of the royal household who, when Lady Castlemain [mistress of the profligate king] ordered of her tradesman every jewel and service of plate that she fancied, and told her servant to send a note of their cost to the privy purse, were themselves absolutely starving. . . . One of the king's musicians, Evans, the famous man upon the harp, having not his equal in the world, died for mere want, and was buried by the alms of the parish.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 17, p. 293.

4339. POVERTY, Genius in. Isaac Newton. It is interesting to know that, during the ten years when he made his greatest discoveries, he was so poor that the two shillings a week which he paid as a member of the Royal Society was a serious burden to him, and some of his friends wished to get him excused from the payment. But this he would not permit.—PARTON'S NEWTON, p. 86.

4340. POVERTY, Happiness with. General Grant. [When a poor man at St. Louis he sold wood to Hon. H. T. Blow. At a grand reception at Washington he met his old acquaintances. He said to Mrs. Blow:] "Do you recollect when I used to supply your husband with wood, and pile it myself, and measure it, too . . . ?" "Oh yes, General, your face was familiar in those days." "Mrs. Blow, those were happy days; for I was doing the best I could to support my family."—HEADLEY'S GENERAL GRANT, p. 43.

4341. POVERTY, Honorable. Admiral Blake. [See No. 2131.] The Protector sent to him, after his last victory, a jewelled ring of the value of £500, and great would have been the acclamation greeting him on his return to his native land. But it was not decreed that he should stand upon her shores again. He returned homeward, and coveted a sight of old England's shores once more, and once more he beheld them—and that was all. He expired as his fleet was entering Plymouth Sound, on the 27th of August, 1657. A true model of a British sailor—he died poor. After all his triumphs and opportunities of accumulating wealth, he was not worth £500! A magnificent public funeral, and a resting-place in Henry VIII.'s chapel, was decreed for him; and there were few in the country who did not feel that his strength had been a mighty bulwark to the land.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 17, p. 209.

4342. POVERTY inherited. Oliver Goldsmith. Oliver Goldsmith was born on the 10th of November, 1728, at the hamlet of Pallas, or Pallasmore, County of Longford, in Ireland. He sprang from a respectable but by no means a thrifty stock. Some families seem to inherit kindness and incompetency, and to hand down virtue and poverty from generation to generation. Such was the case with the Goldsmiths. "They were always," according to their own accounts, "a strange family; they rarely acted like other people; their hearts were in the right place, but their heads seemed to be doing anything but what they ought." "They were remarkable," says another statement, "for their worth, but of no cleverness in the ways of the world." Oliver Goldsmith will be found faithfully to inherit the virtues and weaknesses of his race.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 1, p. 12.

had enough to eat ; but it was three or four years more before his patent began to bring him in any considerable return.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 219.

4344. ——. Elias Howe. [He invented the needle having the eye in the middle, also the sewing-machine.] "Before his wife left London," testifies Mr. Inglis, "he had frequently borrowed money from me in sums of £5, and requested me to get him credit for provisions. On the evening of Mrs. Howe's departure, the night was very wet and stormy, and, her health being delicate, she was unable to walk to the ship. He had no money to pay the cab-hire, and he borrowed a few shillings from me to pay it, which he repaid by pledging some of his clothing. Some linen came home from his washerwoman for his wife and children on the day of her departure. She could not take it with her on account of not having money to pay the woman." After the departure of his family, the solitary inventor was still more severely pinched. "He has borrowed a shilling from me," says Mr. Inglis, "for the purpose of buying beans, which I saw him cook and eat in his own room." After three or four months of labor the machine was finished. It was worth £50. The only customer he could find for it was a workman of his acquaintance, who offered £5 for it, if he could have time to pay it in. The inventor was obliged to accept this offer. The purchaser gave his note for the £5, which Charles Inglis succeeded in selling to another mechanic for £4. To pay his debts and his expenses home, Mr. Howe pawned his precious first machine and his letters-patent.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 688.

4345. POVERTY, Land. United States. When the administration of Washington was organized in 1789, the government which he represented did not command a single dollar of revenue. They inherited a mountain of debt from the Revolutionary struggle ; they had no credit, and the only representative of value which they controlled was the vast body of public land in the Northwest Territory ; . . . but this called for expenditure in the extensive surveys, which were a prerequisite to sale and settlement. . . . The government . . . was land poor.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS, ch. 9, p. 182.

4346. POVERTY, Ministerial. Luther. In the last will and testament of Martin Luther occurs the following remarkable passage : "Lord God, I thank Thee that Thou hast been pleased to make me a poor and indigent man upon earth. I have neither house, nor land, nor money, to leave behind me. Thou hast given me wife and children, whom I now restore to Thee. Lord, nourish, teach, and preserve them, as Thou hast me."

———. Bishop Asbury. [He was a minister unsurpassed in labors and usefulness. He received] an allowance of only $64 a year. His horses and carriages were given him by his friends ; all donations of money received by him he transferred to his fellow-laborers [who were in greater need. And] at one of the Western Conferences, affected by the painful evidences of want, he parted with his watch, his coat, and his shirts for them.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 2, p. 509.

4347. POVERTY overestimated. Samuel Johnson. Miss Adams . . . happened to tell him that a little coffee-pot, in which she had made him coffee, was the only thing she could call her own. He turned to her with a complacent gallantry : "Don't say so, my dear ; I hope you don't reckon my heart as nothing."—BOSWELL'S JOHN-SON, p. 522.

4348. POVERTY and Politics. Romans. The war required new levies, and the senate ordered that the plebeians should enroll and arm in defence of the common liberties. These peremptorily refused the summons, declaring that they knew no liberties to defend, since a foreign yoke could not be more intolerable than the bondage they experienced at home. The senate was assembled, and the matter solemnly deliberated. Some of the higher order generously gave their opinion for an entire remission of the debts of the poorer class of people ; others opposed the proposal, as sanctioning a violation of faith, and a criminal breach of legal obligation. Appius Claudius, a violent and proud patrician, maintained that the people suffered nothing more than their deserts, and that if not kept in poverty they would be forever factious and unruly. Amid these contending opinions, the senate was at a loss what decision to pronounce. An alarm spread of the approach of the enemy to attack the city, and this report gave fresh spirit to the populace. They persisted in their refusal to enter the rolls, and declared that if their grievances were not immediately redressed, they would quit the city.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 3, p. 312.

4349. POVERTY with Pride. Samuel Johnson. Mr. Bateman's lectures were so excellent that [young] Johnson used to come and get them at second-hand from Taylor, till his poverty being so extreme that his shoes were worn out, and his feet appeared through them, he saw that this humiliating circumstance was perceived by the Christ Church men, and he came no more. He was too proud to accept of money, and somebody having set a pair of new shoes at his door, he threw them away with indignation.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 15.

4350. POVERTY, Protected by. Caledonians. The native Caledonians preserved, in the northern extremity of the island, their wild independence, for which they were not less indebted to their poverty than to their valor. Their incursions were frequently repelled and chastised ; but their country was never subdued. The masters of the fairest and most wealthy climates of the globe turned with contempt from gloomy hills, assailed by the winter tempest, from lakes concealed in a blue mist, and from cold and lonely heaths, over which the deer of the forest were chased by a troop of naked barbarians.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 6.

4351. POVERTY, Punishment of. Great Britain. In the days when protection of property was avowed to be the end of government, the gallows was set up as the penalty of a petty theft ; and each year in Great Britain, at least four thousand unhappy men were immured in prison for the misfortune of poverty. A small debt exposed to a perpetuity of imprisonment ; one indiscreet contract doomed the miserable dupe to life-long confinement.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 24.

4352. POVERTY ridiculed. Scots. WILKES: "Pray, Boswell, how much may be got in a year by an Advocate at the Scotch bar?" BOSWELL: "I believe £2000." WILKES: "How can it be possible to spend that money in Scotland?" JOHNSON: "Why, sir, the money may be spent in England; but there is a harder question. If one man in Scotland gets possession of £2000, what remains for all the rest of the nation?" WILKES: "You know, in the last war, the immense booty which Thurot carried off by the complete plunder of seven Scotch isles; he re-embarked with three and sixpence." Here, again, Johnson and Wilkes joined in extravagant, sportive rallery upon the supposed poverty of Scotland. [Boswell was a Scotchman.]—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 461.

4353. POVERTY, Royal. German Emperor Charles IV. The gold of Italy secured the election of the son; but such was the shameful poverty of the Roman emperor, that his person was arrested by a butcher in the streets of Worms, and was detained in the public inn, as a pledge or hostage for the payment of his expenses.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 49, p. 71.

4354. ——. Baldwin II. In the palace, or prison, of Constantinople, the successor of Augustus demolished the vacant houses for winter fuel, and stripped the lead from the churches for the daily expenses of his family. Some usurious loans were dealt with a scanty hand by the merchants of Italy; and Philip, his son and heir, was pawned at Venice as the security for a debt. Thirst, hunger, and nakedness are positive evils; but wealth is relative; and a prince who would be rich in a private station may be exposed by the increase of his wants to all the anxiety and bitterness of poverty.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 61, p. 121.

4355. POVERTY, School of. Dr. Samuel Johnson. Johnson was a poor man's son, and had himself tasted the bitter cup of extreme indigence. . . . He had paced the streets of London all night long, from not having where to lay his head; he had escaped prison for a trifle he owed by begging an alms of Richardson . . . and even knew what it was from sheer want to go without a dinner. When better days came, he loved the poor as few else loved them; and he nursed, in his house, whole nests of the lame, the blind, the sick and the sorrowful.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 24.

4356. POVERTY, Sorrows of. Woman's Lot. [Among the Turks], each chief of a tent had the absolute right of life and death over his family and his slaves. A barbarous usage authorized the father and mother, when poor, to bury alive their daughters at the moment of birth, to the end of preventing either the wretched lot which slavery reserves for woman, or the outrage and dishonor which a daughter may one day bring upon their name.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 47.

4357. POVERTY, Spirit with. Samuel Johnson. Johnson and Savage were sometimes in such extreme indigence, that they could not pay for a lodging; so that they have wandered together whole nights in the streets. . . . He told Sir Joshua Reynolds, that one night in particular, when Savage and he walked round St. James's Square for want of a lodging, they were not at all depressed by their situation; but, in high spirits and brimful of patriotism, traversed the square for several hours, inveighed against the minister, and "resolved they would stand by their country."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 41.

4358. POVERTY a Tyrant. Suffolk Workmen. [Henry VIII. attempted to collect a tax of one third of every man's property, which was granted by the Suffolk clothiers who levied the burden on the poor workmen; they became riotous. The Duke of Norfolk, high treasurer of England interviewed them.] He asked who was their captain and bade that he should speak; then a well-aged man of fifty years and above, asked license of the duke to speak, which [was] granted with good will. "My Lord, . . . since you ask who is our captain, forsooth his name is Poverty, for he and his cousin Necessity hath brought us to this doing." [The tax was abandoned.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 18, p. 302.

4359. POVERTY unknown. In Athens. [During the time of Solon there were none who asked for alms in Athens.] "In those days," says Isocrates, "there was no citizen that died of want, or begged in the streets, to the dishonor of the community." This was owing to the laws against idleness and prodigality, and the care which the areopagus took that every man should have a visible livelihood.—LANGHORNE'S NOTE, PLUTARCH'S OLON.

4360. POVERTY and Vice. One-fifth Paupers. [In the early part of the eighteenth century] one fifth of the whole population were paupers. Locke attributed the rapid increase of the poor rates "to the relaxation of discipline and the corruption of manners."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 4, p. 60.

4361. POVERTY, Virtuous. Mixam, the Indian Chief. A.D. 1652. The West India Company, dreading an attack from New England, had instructed their governor, "to engage the Indians in his cause." But the friendship of the Narragansetts for the Puritans could not be shaken. "I am poor," said Mixam, one of their sachems, "but no presents of goods, or of guns, or of powder and shot shall draw me into a conspiracy against my friends the English."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

4362. POWER, Authority by. Charles II. [When Charles II. was deserted by his army and left at the mercy of the Parliament, he was visited by a soldier named Joyce, who summoned him to go to the army.] Joyce said he was sent by the authority of the army. "Where is your commission?" said the king. "There, behind me," pointing to the soldiers. "Believe me," replied Charles, "your instructions are written in a very legible character."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 5, p. 71.

4363. POWER, Balance of. Origin. Charles [VIII.] was now master of Naples; he entered the city in triumph, took the titles of Emperor and Augustus, and after giving a few entertainments to exhibit his magnificence, and imposing some enormous taxes to exemplify his authority, this most impolitic prince returned to France five months after he had left it, thinking his conquest sufficiently secured by leaving it to be defended by three or four thousand men, while almost all Europe had entered into a combination to deprive him of it. . . . Such had been the sudden and decisive effect of this great confederacy against Charles VIII., that the princes of Europe thence derived a most useful lesson, and from that period considered it as a general law of policy to be always united in a tacit league to prevent the exorbitant increase of the power of any particular State or sovereign. Robertson, in his "History of Charles V.," asserts that the idea of the preservation of a balance of power in Europe has its date from this confederacy against Charles VIII.; and "from this era," says he, "we can trace the progress of that intercourse between nations which has linked the powers of Europe so closely together, and can discern the operations of that provident policy which, during peace, guards against remote and contingent dangers, and which in war has prevented rapid and destructive conquests."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 13, p. 215.

4364. ——. Reign of Charles II. The King of Spain was a sickly child. It was likely that he would die without issue. His eldest sister was Queen of France. A day would almost certainly come, and might come very soon, when the house of Bourbon might lay claim to that vast empire on which the sun never set. The union of two great monarchies under one head would doubtless be opposed by a Continental coalition; but for any continental coalition France, single handed, was a match. England could turn the scale. . . . Nothing, therefore, could be more gratifying to Louis [XIV.] than to learn that [Charles II.] the princes of the house of Stuart needed his help, and were willing to purchase that help by unbounded subserviency. He determined to profit by the opportunity, and laid down for himself a plan to which, without deviation, he adhered, till the Revolution of 1688 disconcerted all his politics.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 194.

4365. POWER, Boast of. Pompey. Pompey was so much elated, . . . and his confidence made him so extremely negligent, that he laughed at those who seemed to fear the war. And when they said that if Cæsar should advance in a hostile manner to Rome they did not see what forces they had to oppose him, he bade them, with an open and smiling countenance, give themselves no pain. "For if in Italy," said he, "I do but stamp upon the ground, an army will appear."—PLUTARCH'S POMPEY.

4366. POWER, Humbled. Roman. Alaric. . . . the king of the Goths, who no longer dissembled his appetite for plunder and revenge, appeared in arms under the walls of the capital; and the trembling Senate, without any hopes of relief, prepared, by a desperate resistance, to delay the ruin of their country. But they were unable to guard against the secret conspiracy of their slaves and domestics, who, either from birth or interest, were attached to the cause of the enemy. At the hour of midnight the Salarian gate was silently opened, and the inhabitants were awakened by the tremendous sound of the Gothic trumpet. Eleven hundred and sixty-three years after the foundation of Rome, the imperial city, which had subdued and civilized so considerable a part of mankind, was delivered to the licentious fury of the tribes of Germany and Scythia.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 81, p. 282.

4367. POWER, Personal. Napoleon I. [When the allied sovereigns were in congress at Vienna, in 1815, dividing the spoils resulting from the overthrow of Bonaparte, he escaped from his exile at Elba. The news created consternation.] A proscribed exile, without money and without arms, floating upon the waters of the Mediterranean, simply by the magic of his name plunged all the courts and all the armies of Europe into commotion. Two powers at that moment equally divided Europe. One power was Napoleon Bonaparte, solitary and alone; the other power was all the combined monarchs and armies and navies of Christendom.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 26.

4368. ——. Napoleon I. [See No. 4367.] Chateaubriand had pithily said: "If the cocked hat and surtout of Napoleon were placed on a stick on the shores of Brest, it would cause Europe to run to arms, from one end to the other."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 26.

4369. POWER, Threat of. Agrippina. At last the quarrel between [young] Nero and Agrippina [his mother] became so fierce that she, did not hesitate to reveal to him all the crimes which she had committed for his sake [including murder], and if she could not retain her sway over his mind by gratitude, she terrified him with threats that she who had raised him to the throne could hurl him from it. Britannicus was the true heir; Nero, but for her, would have remained a mere Ahenobarbus [his former name]. She was the daughter of Germanicus; she would go in person to the prætorian camp, with Britannicus by her side, and then let the maimed Burrhus and the pedagogic Seneca see whether they could prevent her from restoring to the throne of his fathers the injured boy who had been ousted by her intrigues on behalf of an adopted alien. "I made you emperor, I can unmake you. Britannicus is the true emperor, not you."—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 4, p. 23.

4370. PRAISE, Demoralized by. Cicero. Cicero followed the counsel of Cato. He set off in the middle of the night, and embarked at Brundisium for Macedonia, on his way to Thessalonica, where he had fixed the scene of his exile. Here he betrayed in a lamentable degree the weakness of his mind. The letters which he wrote to Atticus . . . "resemble more the wailings of an infant or the strains of a tragedy composed to draw tears, than the language of a man supporting the cause of integrity in the midst of unmerited trouble." "I wish I may see the day (he thus writes to his friend) when I shall be disposed to thank you for having prevented me from resorting to a voluntary death; for I now bitterly regret that I yielded in that matter to your entreaty. What species of misfortune have I not endured? Did ever any one fall from so high a state, in so good a cause, with such abilities and knowledge, and with such a share of the public esteem? Cut off in such a career of glory, deprived of my fortune, torn from my children, debarred the sight of a brother dearer to me than myself—but my tears will not allow me to proceed." . . . The historian I have just quoted truly says, "It appears from this and many other scenes of the life of this remarkable man, that though he loved virtuous actions, yet his virtue was accompanied with so unsuitable a thirst of the praise to which it entitled him, that his mind was unable to sustain itself without this foreign assistance; and when the praise to which he aspired for his consulate was changed into obloquy and scorn, he seems to have lost the sense of good or evil in his own conduct and character." How different this conduct from the sentiments he had expressed as a philosopher.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1, p. 403.

4371. PRAISE, Extravagant. Cicero. Speeches of acknowledgment he had naturally to make both to the Senate and the Assembly. In addressing the people he was moderately prudent; he glanced at the treachery of his friends, but he did not make too much of it. He praised his own good qualities, but not extravagantly. He described Pompey as "the wisest, best, and greatest of all men that had been, were, or ever would be."—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 15.

4372. PRAISE, Offensive. John Howard. [The philanthropist and prisoners' friend.] News reached him that a number of his admirers were preparing to erect a monument in his honor. It is no exaggeration to say that he was horrified at the intelligence. He wrote immediately to England to say that if the design were carried out he should be ashamed to return to his country. Nothing, he added, that his worst enemy could devise could be such a "punishment" to him as the erection of the proposed monument, and he wondered his friends should not have known him better than to sanction such a project. He declared that he claimed no credit for anything he had done, but that in his exertions on behalf of prisoners, he had been merely "riding his hobby-horse." In consequence of his urgent entreaties, the scheme was given up.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 74.

4373. PRAISE, Servile. Nero. He gave a loose rein to the meanest and most vicious passions. He prompted the young nobility to exhibit themselves as actors upon the stage; he forced the Roman knights to fight, like gladiators, in the arena; and in these disgraceful amusements he bore himself a principal part. Burrhus, the captain of the prætorian guards, a man of talents and of virtue—although, at times, he had appeared to show too much compliance with the will of his master—was not, in the opinion of Nero, sufficiently obsequious, and was therefore removed by poison. Upon his death, Seneca, who lost a powerful friend, retired from the court. Nero had no longer any around him but the profligate and abandoned like himself. Poppæa, a woman of great beauty but abandoned morals, had been seduced from her husband by Otho, who in his turn prostituted her to the emperor, to serve his own purposes of ambition. She soon gained such an ascendancy over Nero, that he was induced to divorce his wife Octavia to make way for her to the throne; and such was, at this time, the infamous servility of the Roman Senate, that a panegyric was pronounced in praise of the emperor, and a deputation sent to congratulate him on this auspicious event.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 487.

4374. PRAISE, Undiscerning. Rebuked. When Aristides gave in his accounts, Themistocles raised a strong party against him, accused him of misapplying the public money, and . . . got him condemned. But the principal and most respectable of the citizens, incensed at this treatment of Aristides, interposed and prevailed, not only that he might be excused the fine, but chosen again chief treasurer. He now pretended that his former proceedings were too strict, and, carrying a gentler hand over those that acted under him, suffered them to pilfer the public money, without seeming to find them out, or reckoning strictly with them; so that, fattening on the spoils of their country, they lavished their praises on Aristides, and, heartily espousing his cause, begged of the people to continue him in the same department. But when the Athenians were going to confirm him by their suffrages, he gave them this severe rebuke: "While I managed your finances with all the fidelity of an honest man, I was loaded with calumnies; and now when I suffer them to be a prey to public robbers, I am become a mighty good citizen; but I assure you, I am more ashamed of the present honor than I was of the former disgrace; and it is with indignation and concern that I see you esteem it more meritorious to oblige ill men than to take proper care of the public revenue." By thus speaking and discovering their frauds, he silenced those that recommended him with so much noise and bustle, but at the same time received the truest and most valuable praise from the worthiest of the citizens.—PLUTARCH'S ARISTIDES.

4375. PRAYER, Brief. Dying. The Princess Anne, daughter of Charles I., died when she was very young. On her dying-bed she was requested by one of her attendants to pray. She said she was not able to say her long prayer, meaning the Lord's Prayer, but she would say her short one, "Lighten mine eyes, O Lord, that I sleep not the sleep of death." She had no sooner pronounced these few words than her gentle spirit entered that bright and happy world where prayer is exchanged for praise.

4376. PRAYER, Brief. A Busy Man's. [Sir Jacob Astley] before the charge at the battle of Edgehill made a most excellent, pious, short, and soldierly prayer: for he lifted up his eyes and hands to Heaven, saying, "O Lord, Thou knowest how busy I must be this day; if I forget Thee, do not Thou forget me." And with that rose, crying, "March on, boys."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 1, p. 4.

4377. PRAYER at Death. Samuel Johnson, previous to his receiving the Holy Sacrament in his apartment, composed, and fervently uttered this prayer: "Almighty and most merciful Father, I am now, as to human eyes it seems, about to commemorate, for the last time, the death of Thy Son Jesus Christ, our Saviour and Redeemer. Grant, O Lord, that my whole hope and confidence may be in His merits, and Thy mercy; enforce and accept my imperfect repentance; make this commemoration available to the confirmation of my faith, the establishment of my hope, and the enlargement of my charity; and make the death of Thy Son Jesus Christ effectual to my redemption. Have mercy upon me, and pardon the multitude of my offences. Bless my friends, have mercy upon all men. Support me, by Thy Holy Spirit, in the days of weakness, and at the hour of death, and receive me at my death, to everlasting happiness, for the sake of Jesus Christ. Amen.

4378. PRAYER before Fighting. General Skipton. [During the conflict of the Revolution, . . . Skipton, the general of the London trained bands, called them about him, and made the following famous oration:] Come, my boys, my brave boys, let us pray heartily and fight heartily. I will run the same fortunes and hazards with you. Remember the cause is for God, and for defence of yourselves, your wives, and children. Come, my honest, brave boys, pray heartily and fight heartily, and God will bless us.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 1, p. 11.

4379. PRAYER of Gratitude. Abraham Lincoln. On the day of the receipt of the capitulation of Lee, . . . the Cabinet meeting was held an hour earlier than usual. Neither the President nor any member . . . was able, for a time, to give utterance to his feelings. At the suggestion of Mr. Lincoln all dropped on their knees, and offered in silence and in tears their humble and heartfelt acknowledgments to the Almighty for the triumph He had granted to the National cause.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 735.

4380. PRAYER, Helpful. Abraham Lincoln. Mr. Noah Brooks, one of Mr. Lincoln's most intimate and personal friends, in . . . Harper's Magazine gives the following: . . . To the remark that he might remember that in all these cares, he was daily remembered by those who prayed, not to be heard of men, as no man had ever before been remembered . . . he . . . said . . . I have been told so, and I have been a good deal helped by just that thought. Then he solemnly and slowly added, "I should be the most presumptuous blockhead upon this footstool if I for one day thought I could discharge the duties which have come upon me since I came into this place without the aid and enlightenment of One who is stronger and wiser than all others."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 732.

4381. PRAYER a necessity. Mahomet. [After the siege of Mecca], he was followed by the deputies of Tayef, who dreaded the repetition of a siege. "Grant us, O apostle of God, a truce of three years, with the toleration of our ancient worship!" "Not a month, not an hour." "Excuse us at least from the obligation of prayer." "Without prayer religion is of no avail." They submitted in silence; their temples were demolished, and the same sentence of destruction was executed on all the idols of Arabia.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 140.

4382. PRAYER, Refuge in. Washington. Mr. Potts the Quaker . . . relates that one day while the Americans were reencamped at Valley Forge [during the darkest days of the Revolution] he strolled up the creek, and when not far from his dam, heard a solemn voice. He walked quietly in the direction of it, and saw Washington's horse tied to a sapling. In a thicket near by was the beloved chief upon his knees in prayer, his face suffused with tears. Like Moses at the bush, Isaac felt that he was on holy ground, and withdrew unobserved.—BENSON J. LOSSING'S NOTE IN CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 6.

4383. PRAYER refused. Cromwell. The army and the Parliament, instigated by the Puritans and republicans, determined on the king's trial.

Cromwell appeared to hesitate before the enormity of the outrage. From his place in the House he spoke more in the tone of an inspired enthusiast than a rational politician, and appeared to surrender his consent under the influence of a supernatural impression. "If any one," said he, with an extravagant emotion which approached insanity, "had voluntarily proposed to me to judge and punish the king, I should have looked upon him as a prodigy of treason; but since Providence and necessity have imposed this burden on us, I pray Heaven to bless your deliberations, although I am not prepared to advise you in this weighty matter. Shall I confess to you," added he, in a tone and attitude of inward humiliation, "that when, a short time since, I offered up a prayer for the preservation of his Majesty, I felt my tongue cleave to my palate? I took this extraordinary sensation as an unfavorable answer from Heaven, rejecting my humble entreaty."—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 41.

4386. PRAYER, Subdued by. A Miser. [Samuel Hick, an early English Methodist preacher, once plead in vain with a rich miser for a donation to Coke's West India missions.] At last he fell upon his knees in prayer. "I will give thee a guinea if thou wilt give over," said the covetous man; but he continued to pray for the miser, and for the heathen for whose salvation a guinea would have been so insignificant a pittance. "I tell thee to give over," exclaimed the miser again; "I will give thee two guineas if thou wilt give it up." Hick bore it away to a missionary meeting.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 3, p. 126.

4387. PRAYER and Swearing. Andrew Johnson. Colonel Moody "the fighting Methodist parson was in Nashville the day it was reported that [General] Buell had decided to evacuate the city. The rebels, strongly reinforced, were said to be within two miles of the city. Said Moody . . . I found him in his office . . . walking the floor . . . manifesting intense feeling, he said, "Moody, we are sold out! Buel is a traitor!" . . . Then he commenced pacing the floor, twisting his hands and chafing like a chained tiger. Suddenly he turned and said, "Moody, can you pray?" . . . As the prayer became fervent, Johnson came over on his hands and knees to Moody's side and put his arm over him and manifested the deepest emotion. Closing the prayer with a hearty, "Amen" from each, they arose. Johnson . . . said, "Moody, I feel better!" Shortly afterward he said, "Moody, will you stand by me?" "Certainly I will," was the answer. . . . The current of his thought having changed, he said, "Oh, Moody, I don't want you to think I have become a religious man because I asked you to pray. I am sorry to say it, but I am not, and have never pretended to be religious. . . . But, Moody, there is one thing about it—I do believe in Almighty God. And I believe also in the Bible, and I say damn me if Nashville shall be surrendered!" And Nashville was not surrendered.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 747.

4388. PRAYERS, Attendance at. Josiah Quincy. For sixteen years Mr. Quincy was President of Harvard College—a difficult and laborious office. His son tells us, that, during the whole sixteen years of his presidency, he was never absent from the six-o'clock morning prayers but three times, and that was occasioned by his being obliged to attend a distant court as a witness on behalf of the college.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 759.

4389. PREACHER, Remarkable. "Black Harry." Harry Hosier, better known as "Black Harry," was the travelling servant of Bishop Asbury, and had a popularity as a preacher which excelled that of the bishop himself. Dr. Rush, whose predilections for Methodist preaching are well known, did not disdain to hear him, and making allowance for his illiteracy (for he could not read), pronounced him "the greatest orator in America."—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 2, p. 174.

4390. PREACHERS, Lay. Puritans. [In 1653, Whitelock, ambassador extraordinary to Sweden, was informed by the famous Queen Christina that she had been told that many officers of the Commonwealth under Cromwell "will themselves pray and preach to the soldiers." And she asked, "Is that true?" Whitelock replied, "Yes, madam, it is . . . very true. While their enemies are swearing, or debauching, or pillaging, the officers and the soldiers of the Parliament's army used to be encouraging and exhorting one another out of the Word of God, and praying together to the Lord of Hosts for His blessing to be with them, who hath showed His approbation of this military preaching by the success He hath given them. . . . 'Tis the opinion of many good men with us, that a long cassock, with a silk girdle and a great beard, do not make a learned or good preacher, without gifts of the Spirit of God, and laboring in His vineyard; and whosoever studies the Holy Scripture, and is enabled to do good to the souls of others, and endeavors the same, is nowhere forbidden by that Word, nor is it blamable."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 9, p. 144.

4391. — — — Puritans. [In 1642 the Puritan clergy were hated and called "preaching cobblers," "pulpit praters." Some defended them "in a merry way," saying that, when such men first began to "take up that duty which the prelates let fall," they each invaded the other's calling]—that chandlers, cutlers, weavers, and the like preached, while the archbishop himself, instead of preaching, was busied in projects about leather, salt, soap, and such commodities as belonged to those tradesmen.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 30, p. 485.

4392. PREACHING a Crime. In Scotland. [By act of . . . Parliament under James II.] His commands were obeyed. A statute framed by the ministers of the crown was promptly passed, which stands forth, even among the statutes of that unhappy country at that unhappy period, pre-eminent in atrocity. It was enacted, in few but emphatic words, that whoever should preach in a conventicle under a roof, or should attend, either as preacher or as hearer, a conventicle in the open air, should be punished with death and confiscation of property.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 460.

4393. PREACHING a Duty. John Bunyan. Mr. Wingate, when the information was first brought to him, supposed that he had fallen on a nest of Fifth Monarchy men. He inquired, when Bunyan was brought in, how many arms had been found at the meeting. When he learned that there were no arms, and that it had no political character whatever, he evidently thought it was a matter of no consequence. He told Bunyan that he had been breaking the law, and asked him why he could not attend to his business. Bunyan said that his object in teaching was merely to persuade people to give up their sins. He could do that and attend to his business also. Wingate answered that the law must be obeyed. He must commit Bunyan for trial at the Quarter Sessions; but he would take bail for him, if his securities would engage that he would not preach again meanwhile. Bunyan refused to be bailed on any such terms. Preach he would and must, and the recognizances would be forfeited. After such an answer, Wingate could only send him to jail; he could not help himself.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 5.

4394. PREACHING, Genuine. Reign of James II. [The king courted the favor of Dissenters for the secret purpose of advancing the Roman Catholic faith. By general indulgence they were relieved from persecutions. The Puritan] soon began to regret the days of persecution. While the penal laws were enforced, he had heard the words of life in secret and at his peril; but still he had heard them. When the brethren were assembled in the inner chamber, when the sentinels had been posted, when the doors had been locked, when the preacher, in the garb of a butcher or a drayman, had come in over the tiles, then at least God was truly worshipped. No portion of Divine truth was suppressed or softened down for any worldly object. All the distinctive doctrines of the Puritan theology were fully and even coarsely set forth. [To secure the favor of the court the preachers became conservative and hesitating.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 213.

4395. PREACHING to please. Dangerous. [Preamble to the statute of 1703, for making settled provision for the clergy, says:] "Divers mean and stipendary preachers are in many places entertained to serve the curés and officiate there, who, depending for necessary maintenance upon the good-will and liking of their hearers, have been and are thereby under temptation of too much complying and suiting their doctrine to the humors, rather than the good, of their hearers; which hath been a great occasion of faction and schism, and contempt of the ministry."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 17, p. 271.

4396. PREACHING, Profitless. "Hung in Chains." [In 1539] there was an image in Wales called Garvell Gathern, to which the people resorted by hundreds, believing that the wooden block had power to save. Darvell Gathern was brought to London and burnt in Smithfield. But the "huge and great image" was brought under the gallows, where an observant friar, Forest, was hung in chains alive; and the idol being set on fire under the wretched man, who was accused of heresy and treason, they were consumed together. Worst of all, "there was also prepared a pulpit, where a right reverend father in God, and a renowned and pious clerk, the Bishop of Worcester, called Hugh Latimer, declared to him [Forest] his errors, and openly and manifestly by the Scripture of God confuted them, and with many and godly exhortations moved him to repentance. But such was his frowardness, that he neither would hear nor speak."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 25, p. 408.

4397. PREACHING by Women. Samuel Johnson. [Boswell said,] I told him I had been that morning at a meeting of the people called Quakers, where I had heard a woman preach. JOHNSON: "Sir, a woman's preaching is like a dog's walking on his hind legs. It is not done well; but you are surprised to find it done at all."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 128.

4398. PRECEDENCE, Infinitesimal. Samuel Johnson. JOHNSON, for sport perhaps, or from the spirit of contradiction, eagerly maintained that Derrick had merit as a writer. Mr. Morgann argued with him directly in vain. At length he had recourse to this device. "Pray, sir," said he, "whether do you reckon Derrick or Smart the best poet?" JOHNSON at once felt himself roused, and answered, "Sir, there is no settling the point of precedence between the louse and the flea."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 489.

4399. PRECEDENCE, Quarrels for. Ambassadors. An idle dispute about precedence had happened in London between the Spanish and French ambassadors. Louis immediately ordered the Spanish ambassador at Paris to quit the kingdom, and recalled his own from the court of Spain. Philip IV. was threatened with a renewal of the war, unless a proper submission should be made, and an acknowledgment of the precedence of France, to which that monarch was obliged to consent. A similar affront offered to the French ambassador at Rome was followed by a yet more humiliating satisfaction. The pope was obliged to beg pardon by his legate, and a pillar was erected at Rome to perpetuate the affront and the reparation.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 36, p. 457.

4400. — — —. Greeks. When the confederates came to have their several posts assigned them [in their conflict with the Persians], who had invaded Greece, there was a great dispute between the Tegetæ and the Athenians, the Tegetæ insisting that, as the Lacedæmonians were posted in the right wing, the left belonged to them, and, in support of their claim, setting forth the gallant actions of their ancestors. As the Athenians expressed great indignation at this, Aristides stepped forward and said: "Time will not permit us to contest with the Tegetæ the renown of their ancestors and their personal bravery; but to the Spartans and to the rest of the Greeks we may say that the post neither gives valor nor takes it away, and whatever post you assign us, we will endeavor to do honor to it, and take care to reflect no disgrace upon our former achievements. For we are not come hither to quarrel with our allies, but to fight our enemies; not to make encomiums upon our forefathers, but to approve our own courage in the cause of Greece. And the battle will soon show what value our country should set on every State, every general, and private man." After this speech the council of war declared in favor of the Athenians, and gave them the command of the left wing.—PLUTARCH'S ARISTIDES.

4401. PRECEDENCE valued. Cæsar. When Julius Cæsar came to a little town, in passing the Alps, his friends, by way of mirth, took occasion to say, "Can there here be any disputes for offices, any contentions for precedence, or such envy and ambition as we see among the great?" To which Cæsar answered, with great seriousness, "I assure you, I had rather be the first man here than the second man in Rome."—PLUTARCH'S CÆSAR.

4402. PRECOCITY, Remarkable. James Watt. On one occasion, when he was bending over a marble hearth, with a piece of chalk in his hand, a friend of his father said: "You ought to send that boy to a public school, and not allow him to trifle his time at home." "Look how my child is occupied before you condemn him," replied the father. Though only six years of age, he was trying to solve a problem in geometry.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 4.

4403. — — —. Alexander Pope. The precocious boy, after the age of twelve, had to form his own mind, and work out his own aspirations, in his "paternal cell" at Binfield. In this modest dwelling he wrote his "Pastorals," his "Windsor Forest," his "Temple of Fame," his "Essay on Criticism," his "Rape of the Lock." He set to learning Latin and Greek by himself about twelve, and when he was about fifteen he resolved that he would go up to London and learn French and Italian. At sixteen he formed an acquaintance with Wycherley, a man of seventy. He was known at that time to Congreve. At an earlier age he had been taken to a coffee-house to see Dryden.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 26, p. 416.

4404. PREDESTINATION, Belief in. William, Prince of Orange. The Princes of Orange had generally been the patrons of the Calvinistic divinity, and owed no small part of their popularity to their zeal for the doctrines of election and final perseverance. . . . His theological opinions, however, were even more decided than those of his ancestors. The tenet of predestination was the keystone of his religion. He even declared that if he were to abandon that tenet, he must abandon with it all belief in a superintending Providence, and must become a mere Epicurean.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 152.

4405. ———. Scandinavians. They believed implicitly in fate or predestination, and in the absolute impossibility of a man's avoiding that course or destiny which was prescribed for him. But while this was their firm persuasion, they allowed likewise the moral agency of man, and the possibility of his deserving rewards and punishments for his actions, a difficulty which more enlightened people have long labored to reconcile.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 6, p. 28.

4406. PREDICTIONS, Editorial. Civil War. The New York people derided the rebellion. The Tribune declared that it was nothing "more or less than the natural recourse of all mean-spirited and defeated tyrannies to rule or ruin, making, of course, a wide distinction between the will and power, for the hanging of traitors is sure to begin before one month is over. . . . Jeff Davis & Co. will be swinging from the battlements of Washington, at least by the Fourth of July."—POLLARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 3, p. 70.

4407. PREDICTIONS, Parental. For Peter Cooper. While the ex-lieutenant Cooper was making and selling hats in a shop in Little Dock Street, a son was born to him, whom he named Peter, after the great apostle, with a full conviction that "the boy would come to something," and with the conscientious conviction that he had been instructed to do so by what he firmly believed to be a celestial vision. If it were but a superstition, the probability seems very strong that somebody was right.—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 10.

4408. PREDICTIONS realized. New York. In one of the letters written to Etuyvesant [the colonial governor] by the secretary of the [West India Company], the remarkable prediction is made that the commerce of New Amsterdam should cover every ocean and the ships of all nations crowd into her harbor. But for many years the growth of the city was slow. As late as the middle of the century the better part of Manhattan Island were still divided among the farmers, Central Park was a forest of oaks and chestnuts. [17th century.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 19, p. 168.

4409. PREJUDICE, Commercial. National Bank. The original plan of a national bank was met . . . by every sort of objection. Some said it was a new thing, and they did not understand it. Others said the project came from Holland, and there were too many Dutch things already. Tories said that a bank and a monarchy could not exist together. Whigs said that a bank and liberty were incompatible, for that the Crown would command the wealth of the bank. [It was established in 1694.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 11, p. 171.

4410. PREJUDICE, Deluded by. Reign of Charles II. The Marquess of Worcester . . . observed the expansive power of moisture rarified by heat. After many experiments, he had succeeded in constructing a rude steam-engine, which he called a fire water-work, and which he pronounced to be an admirable and most forcible instrument of propulsion. But the marquess was suspected to be a madman, and known to be a Papist. His inventions, therefore, found no favorable reception. His fire water-work might, perhaps, furnish matter for conversation at a meeting of the Royal Society, but was not applied to any practical purpose.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 346.

4411. PREJUDICE in History. Dionysius. It is not improbable that the hatred which the Greeks ever affected to bear to the name of tyrant has made their historians blacken the character of Dionysius more than he deserved. We read of the constant terror he was under of assassination; of his never venturing to harangue the people but from the top of a tower; of the dungeon he contrived for the imprisonment of state criminals, constructed in the form of the cavity of the ear, which, communicating with an aperture in his private apartment, he could distinctly hear any word that the prisoner uttered; of the horror he had of allowing himself to be shaved, and of his making his daughters singe off his beard with nut-shells. But how is all this consistent with the certain facts—of his commanding his armies in person; his overseeing his numerous artisans employed in the public works; his familiar intercourse with men of science, his magnificent entertainments, and, at length, his dying of a debauch at a public festival? Great allowance must be made for the prejudices of those writers who have given us the character of Dionysius.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 8, p. 360.

4412. PREJUDICE, Investigation with. Roman Emperor Julian. Instead of listening to the proofs of Christianity with that favorable attention which adds weight to the most respectable evidence, he heard with suspicion, and disputed with obstinacy and acuteness, the doctrines for which he already entertained an invincible aversion. Whenever the young princes were directed to compose declamations on the subject of the prevailing controversies, Julian always declared himself the advocate of Paganism; under the specious excuse that, in the defence of the weaker cause, his learning and ingenuity might be more advantageously exercised and displayed.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 22, p. 412.

4413. PREJUDICE, National. French—English. The English . . . are the only people who have been unable to claim the authorship of the "Imitation of Jesus"; a Frenchman might write it, a German, an Italian, never an Englishman. From Shakespeare to Milton, from Milton to Byron, their beautiful and sombre literature is sceptical, Judaical, Satanic, in a word antichristian. "As regards law," as a legist well says, "the English are Jews, the French Christians." A theologian might express himself in the same manner as regards faith. The American Indians, with that penetration and originality they so often exhibit, expressed this distinction in their fashion. "Christ," said one of them, "was a Frenchman whom the English crucified in London; Pontius Pilate was an officer in the service of Great Britain."—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 51.

4414. PREJUDICE, Opposition of. Reign of Charles II. [See No. 4882.] An act, the first of our many turnpike acts, was passed, imposing a small toll on travellers and goods, for the purpose of keeping some parts of this important line of communication in good repair. This innovation, however, excited many murmurs, and the other great avenues to the capital were long left under the old system. A change was at length effected, but not without great difficulty; for unjust and absurd taxation to which men are accustomed is often borne far more willingly than the most reasonable impost which is new. It was not till many toll-bars had been violently pulled down, till the troops had in many districts been forced to act against the people, and till much blood had been shed, that a good system was introduced. By slow degrees reason triumphed over prejudice.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 350.

4415. PREJUDICE against Progress. Iron by Coal. A man wiser than others in his generation, Edward, Lord Dudley, obtained in 1619 a patent for smelting iron ore by pit coal. He would probably have bestowed immense riches upon his country had not his iron works been destroyed in an outbreak of that popular ignorance which has too often interrupted the course of scientific improvement. The notion of smelting iron ore by coal was not fairly tried till 1740.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 1, p. 13.

4416. PREJUDICE, Reaction of. Methodism. The fear of being called Methodists was one of the causes that made too many of the clergy careless in their lives and indifferent in their vocation [in the middle of the eighteenth century].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 110.

4417. PREJUDICE, Sectional. North and South. The Southern people considered that they were opposing [in the secession struggle] an enemy who had proved himself a foe to mankind, religion, and civilization.—POLLARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 11, p. 263.

4418. PREJUDICE and Superstition. Lepers. [In 1321] the Lepers . . . were popularly accused of having poisoned all the wells and fountains in Poitou and Guienne. The grounds of this horrible charge are not distinctly known; the Lepers were reported to be under the influence of sorcery and magic, the belief in which was then universal; another account represented them as hired agents of the Moorish King of Granada; a third, as accomplices of the Jews. The Lepers were arrested in all parts of France, and barbarously tortured; every petty official in the kingdom was authorized to deal with them at his sole discretion; and great multitudes, thus condemned in defiance of all forms of justice, perished in the flames.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 9, § 23.

4419. PREMONITION, Accidental. Charles I. [In 1643, during the civil wars, Charles I. was at Oxford, and, in the public library, one of his lords suggested, as a diversion, that the king make a trial of his fortune by Sortes Virgilianæ, which was a usual kind of augury some ages past. The king opened a Virgil at the part giving] Dido's imprecation against Æneas, which Mr. Dryden translates:

"Yet let a race untam'd and haughty foes,
His peaceful entrance with dire arms oppose;
Oppress'd with numbers in th' unequal field,
His men discourag'd, and himself expell'd,

Let him for succor sue from place to place,
Torn from his subjects, and his son's embrace,
First let him see his friends in battle slain,
And their untimely fate lament in vain;
And when, at length, the cruel war shall cease,
On hard conditions may he buy his peace.
Nor let him then enjoy supreme command,
But fall untimely by some hostile hand,
And lie unburied on the barren sand."

Charles seemed concerned at the accident [which, in some measure, proved a prediction of his overthrow].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 2, p. 26.

4420. PREMONITION of Death. Charles V. A deadly poison had been administered to . . . in his early youth, through the unnatural machinations of the King of Navarre. A German physician arrested the progress of the venom by opening an issue in his arm, forewarning him that, if at any time the issue should close, his death was inevitable within fifteen days.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 10.

4421. — — — Abraham Lincoln. "No man," said Mrs. Stowe, "has suffered more and deeper, albeit with a dry, weary, patient pain, that seemed to some like insensibility, than President Lincoln." "Whichever way it [the rebellion] ends," he said to her, "I shan't last long after it is over."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 726.

4422. — — — Abraham Lincoln. "He told me," says a correspondent of the Boston Journal, "that he was certain he should not outlast the rebellion." . . . There was dissension among the Republican leaders. Many of his best friends had deserted him, and were talking of an opposition . . . convention to nominate another candidate; and universal gloom was among the people. [He also said,] "I feel a presentiment that I shall not outlast the rebellion. When it is over my work will be done."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 727.

4423. PREPARATION, Constant. "Minute-men." A.D. 1774. Out of Boston the power of [last royal governor] Gage was at an end. In the county of Worcester, the male inhabitants, from the age of sixteen to seventy, formed themselves into companies and regiments, chose their own officers, and agreed that one third part of the enrolled should hold themselves ready to march "at a minute's warning." "In time of peace, prepare for war," was the cry of the country.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 11.

4424. PREPARATION for Oratory. Demosthenes. The substance of the speeches which he heard he committed to memory, and afterward reduced them to regular sentences and periods, meditating a variety of corrections and new forms of expression, both for what others had said to him and he had addressed to them. Hence it was concluded that he was not a man of much genius, and that all his eloquence was the effect of labor. A strong proof of this seemed to be, that he was seldom heard to speak anything extempore, and though the people often called upon him by name, as he sat in the assembly, to speak to the point debated, he would not do it unless he came prepared. For this, many of the orators ridiculed him; and Pytheas, in particular, told him that all his arguments smelled of the lamp. Demosthenes retorted sharply upon him, "Yes, indeed, but your lamp and mine, my friend, are not conscious to the same labors." To others he did not pretend to deny his previous application, but told them he neither wrote the whole of his orations, nor spoke without first committing part to writing. He further affirmed, that this showed him a good member of a democratic state; for the coming prepared to the rostrum was a mark of respect for the people. Whereas, to be regardless of what the people might think of a man's address showed his inclination for oligarchy, and that he had rather gained his point by force than by persuasion. Another proof they give us of his want of confidence on any sudden occasion, is, that when he happened to be put into disorder by the tumultuary behavior of the people, Demades often rose up to support him in an extempore address, but he never did the same for Demades.—PLUTARCH'S DEMOSTHENES.

4425. PREROGATIVE, Royal. Reign of Severus. The lawyers and historians concurred in teaching that the inspired authority was held, not by the delegated commission, but by the irrevocable resignation of the Senate, that the [Roman] Emperor was freed from the restraints of the civil laws, and could command by his arbitrary will the lives and fortunes of his subjects, and might dispose of the empire as of his private patrimony.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 5, p. 149.

4426. ———. James II. James... was resolved to bring to issue the question of the king's dispensing power—that is, the right of the sovereign to abrogate express laws by the exercise of his prerogative. This prerogative had been exercised in the earliest times of the Constitution; but had gradually become more and more limited, as the legislative power had become more defined.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 25, p. 407.

4427. PRESBYTERIANISM despised. By Charles II. Lauderdale related to Burnet that the king [Charles II.] told him to let presbytery go, "for it was not a religion for gentlemen." [A religion of blindness and servility was the religion wanted.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 15, p. 253.

4428. PRESENT declined. William Pitt. [In 1747 William Pitt was paymaster-general for George II.] When a subsidy was advanced to a foreign power, it had been customary for the itching palm of office to demand a half per cent as its honorarium. Pitt astonished the King of Sardinia by sending him the sum without deduction which Parliament had voted; and he raised his majesty's astonishment still higher when he refused a present as a compliment to his integrity. Pitt was a poor man.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 12, p. 179.

4429. PRESENT, A perplexity. The French Minister. A dry humor, nay, sometimes a most droll humor, guides his [Cromwell's] dealings with him. [Cardinal] Mazarin was, we know, a most miserable miser, a kind of griffin in threadbare wings, watching his heaps and cellars of gold. How well Cromwell knew him. He sent presents to Cromwell, we find—the richest and the stateliest presents of hangings and pictures and jewels. Whereupon Cromwell came out generously too, and sent the Frenchman what he knew, to his market eye, would be of more value than hangings, pictures, or books; he sent him some tons of British tin! Was it not characteristic of the shrewdness of the man? The supple Mazarin never found himself so perplexed.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 210.

4430. PRESENTIMENT, A true. John Howard. He had a strong presentiment that from this journey [to the East] he should never return, and therefore thought it wrong to expose his servant to its manifold perils. The man, however, so earnestly entreated to be allowed to accompany him, that his scruples were at last overcome. All his preparations were made with a view to the probability of his never again seeing his native land. He made his will with great deliberation, bequeathing a great number of small legacies to his dependents and friends, overlooking no one who had the slightest claim to his favor. [He went to investigate the plague near its place of origin.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 73.

4431. PRESENTS bring Presents. Pudding. Stow records that the widow Cornwallis obtained a fair house and tenements of a dissolved priory by the timely present of some fine puddings to the king [Henry VIII.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 25, p. 418.

4432. PRESENTS, Solicitation of. Alexander. [Alexander the Great was generally more offended at those who refused his presents than at those who asked... favors.] He had given nothing to Serapion, one of the youths that played with him at ball, because he asked nothing. One day, when they were at their diversion, Serapion took care always to throw the ball to others of the party; upon which Alexander said, "Why do you not give it me?" "Because you did not ask for it," said the youth. The repartee pleased the king much; he laughed, and immediately made him very valuable presents.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

4433. PRESS defended. The Liberty. [In 1830 Charles X. of France signed an ordinance by which the liberty of the periodical press was suspended. The proprietors and editors of the chief opposition papers consulted the most eminent lawyers, who gave their opinion that the ordinance was not legal, and ought not to be submitted to. Forty-four conductors of newspapers signed a protest in which they declared their intention to resist the ordinance. The government said, "This protest has this day lost that character of legality which commands obedience; we resist it." There was occasionally a cry in the streets of "Long live the Charter! Down with the ministers!" The next day a more ominous cry went forth—"Up with Liberty! Down with the Bourbons!" Sentinels were placed around the offices of the four principal newspapers to prevent their sale, but they were thrown out of the window; then the presses were broken. Then followed the three terrible days of July—the revolution against the family of Bourbons and the uncrowning of Charles X.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 13, p. 253.

4434. PRESS, Education by the. Edgar Allan Poe. [Poe became joint-editor of the Southern Literary Messenger.] Here we have Edgar Poe installed at twenty-two as a public teacher through the medium of the press; a young man incompetent to manage a small store, unable to manage himself, and yet a public writer. Not many months pass before he lapses into his old habits of drunkenness.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 339.

4435. PRESS, Freedom of the. Safety by. When, in 1695, the English press became seditious, [John Milton] advocated its freedom, saying: "Though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so truth be in the field, we do injuriously, by licensing and prohibiting, to misdoubt her strength. Let her and falsehood grapple. Who ever knew truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?"—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 12, p. 177.

4436. ———. Libellous. [In 1803 Bonaparte, having been greatly irritated by the articles published in England, asked that the government suppress the newspapers which published articles unfriendly to himself. He was informed that the press was free, and beyond the power of the government to suppress. He then demanded the prosecution of a French publisher for "a libel on a friendly government." Bonaparte gained the case.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 24, p. 421.

4437. ———. Frederick the Great. One bookseller sent to the palace a copy of the most stinging lampoon that perhaps was ever written in the world, the "Memoirs of Voltaire," published by Beaumarchais, and asked for his Majesty's orders. "Do not advertise it in an offensive manner," said the king, "but sell it by all means. I hope it will pay you well." Even among statesmen accustomed to the license of a free press such steadfastness of mind as this is not very common.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 48.

4438. ———. At New York, A.D. 1734. A newspaper was established to defend the popular cause; . . . its printer, John Peter Zenger, was imprisoned on the charge of publishing false and malicious libels. . . . At the trial the publishing was confessed; but the aged Andrew Hamilton, . . . of Philadelphia, pleading for Zenger, justified the publication by asserting its truth. "You cannot be admitted," interrupted the chief-justice, "to give the truth of a libel in evidence." "Then," said Hamilton to the jury, "we appeal to you for witnesses of the facts. The jury have the right to determine both the law and the facts, and they ought to do so." [He plead for the cause of liberty.] . . . "the liberty of opposing arbitrary power by speaking and writing the truth." The jury gave their verdict, "Not guilty." The people of the colonies exulted. . . . A patriot of the Revolution esteemed this trial to have been the morning star of the American Revolution.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 23.

4439. PRESS, Political, Feared. [Roger L'Estrange, inspector of the press for Charles II, in 1666, said:] A public mercury makes the multitude "too familiar with the actions and councils of their superiors, too pragmatical and censorious, and gives them, not only an itch, but a colorable right and license to be meddling with the government." . . . "To keep the multitude in the right course he thinks the prudent management of a gazette may contribute to a very high degree."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 17, p. 281.

4440. PRESS, Power of the. Feared. [The great Duke of Marlborough, and hero of Blenheim, was a brave soldier, but a moral coward. To his wife he wrote,] "The villainous way of printing stabs me to the heart." This moral cowardice is a curious revelation of human inconsistency. "The villainous way of printing" was ever a terror to the man who would charge a redoubt with the utmost coolness. "Paper-bullets of the brain" were far more terrible to him than a volley of grape-shot.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 24, p. 374.

4441. PRESS, Progress of. America. As early as 1704 the Boston News-Letter, first of periodicals in the New World, was published in the city of the Puritans; but fifteen years elapsed before another experiment of the same sort was made. In 1721 the New England Courant, a little sheet devoted to free thought and the extinction of rascality, was established at Boston by the two Franklins—James and Benjamin. In 1740, New York had but one periodical, Virginia one, and South Carolina one, and at the close of the French and Indian war there were no more than ten newspapers published in the Colonies. The chief obstacles to such publications were the absence of great cities and the difficulty of communication between distant sections of the country. Boston and Philadelphia had each no more than eighteen thousand inhabitants; New York but twelve thousand. In all Virginia there was not one important town; while as far south as Georgia there was scarcely a considerable village; to reach this widely scattered population with periodical publications was quite impossible.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 36, p. 282.

4442. PRESS, Responsibility of the. False News. The publisher of false news was a person for whom the pillory was an especial terror [in 1709].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 26, p. 403.

4443. PRESUMPTION, Foolish. Rienzi the Roman. At the hour of worship, he [Rienzi] showed himself to the returning crowds in a majestic attitude, with a robe of purple, his sword, and gilt spurs; but the holy rites were soon interrupted by his levity and insolence. Rising from his throne, and advancing toward the congregation, he proclaimed in a loud voice: "We summon to our tribunal Pope Clement, and command him to reside in his diocese of Rome; we also summon the sacred college of cardinals. We again summon the two pretenders, Charles of Bohemia and Lewis of Bavaria, who style themselves emperors; we likewise summon all the electors of Germany, to inform us on what pretence they have usurped the inalienable right of the Roman people, the ancient and lawful sovereigns of the empire." Unsheathing his maiden sword, he thrice brandished it to the three parts of the world, and thrice repeated the extravagant declaration, "And this, too, is mine!" The Pope's vicar, the Bishop of Orvieto, attempted to check this career of folly; but his feeble protest was silenced by martial music.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 70, p. 488.

4444. PRESUMPTION, Reward of. Indignity. [Darius the Great sent ambassadors to the Athenians to demand earth and water, which denoted submission.] The Athenians threw them into a ditch, and told them, There was earth and water enough.—PLUTARCH'S THEMISTOCLES.

4445. PRETENDER, An honored. Michael. A Greek, who styled himself the father of Constantine, . . . appeared at Salerno, and related the adventures of his fall and flight. That unfortunate friend was acknowledged by the duke [Robert Guiscard] and adorned with the pomp and titles of imperial dignity; in his triumphal progress through Apulia and Calabria, Michael was saluted with the tears and acclamations of the people; and Pope Gregory VII. exhorted the bishops to preach, and the Catholics to fight, in the pious work of his restoration. His conversations with Robert were frequent and familiar; and their mutual promises were justified by the valor of the Normans and the treasures of the East. Yet this Michael, by the confession of the Greeks and Latins, was a pageant and an impostor; a monk who had fled from his convent, or a domestic who had served in the palace. The fraud had been contrived by the subtle Guiscard; and he trusted that, after this pretender had given a decent color to his arms, he would sink, at the nod of the conqueror, into his primitive obscurity.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 36, p. 467

4446. PRETENDERS, Numerous. Mustapha. [Mustapha, the pretender, called himself the son of the Great Bajazet, and claimed to have been concealed twelve years among the Greeks; he was discovered to be an impostor and executed.] A similar character and claim was asserted by several rival pretenders; thirty persons are said to have suffered under the name of Mustapha; and these frequent executions may perhaps insinuate that the Turkish court was not perfectly secure of the death of the lawful prince.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65, p. 279.

4447. PRIDE, Absence of. Julius Cæsar. About himself and his own exploits there is not one word of self-complacency or self-admiration. In his writings, as in his life, Cæsar is always the same—direct, straightforward, unmoved, save by occasional tenderness, describing with unconscious simplicity how the work which had been forced upon him was accomplished.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 28.

4448. PRIDE, Characteristic. Sir Edward Seymour. [William of Orange had invaded England and he was welcomed by the people.] The most important of the new-comers was Seymour, who had recently inherited a baronetcy which added little to his dignity, and who, in birth, in political influence, and in parliamentary abilities, was beyond comparison the foremost among the Tory gentlemen of England. At his first audience he is said to have exhibited his characteristic pride in a way which surprised and amused the prince. "I think, Sir Edward," said William, meaning to be very civil, "that you are of the family of the Duke of Somerset." "Pardon me, sir," said Sir Edward, who never forgot that he was the head of the elder branch of the Seymours, "the Duke of Somerset is of my family."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 469.

4449. PRIDE concealed. By Humility. [Agessilaus was a Lacedæmonian.] We have no portrait or statue of him. He would not suffer any to be made while he lived, and at his death he utterly forbade it. We are only told that he was a little man, and that he had not a commanding aspect.—PLUTARCH'S AGESILAUS.

4450. PRIDE, Defensive. Samuel Johnson. Dr. Adams expostulated with Johnson, and suggested that his not being admitted when he called on him was probably not to be imputed to Lord Chesterfield. Chesterfield kept Johnson waiting in an anteroom while other company received his attention, . . . and in confirmation of this, he insisted on Lord Chesterfield's general affability and easiness of access, especially to literary men. "Sir," said Johnson, "that is not Lord Chesterfield; he is the proudest man this day existing." "No," said Dr. Adams, "there is one person, at least, as proud; I think, by your own account, you are the prouder man of the two." "But mine" (replied Johnson instantly) "was defensive pride." This, as Dr. Adams well observed, was one of those happy turns for which he was so remarkably ready.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 69.

4451. PRIDE, Folly of. Destructive. [Alp Arslan the Turk] meditated the . . . glorious conquest of Turkestan. . . . But the progress of the great king was retarded by the governor of Berzem; and Joseph the Carizmian presumed to defend his fortress against the powers of the East. When he was produced a captive in the royal tent, the sultan, instead of praising his valor, severely reproached his obstinate folly; and the insolent replies of the rebel provoked a sentence, that he should be fastened to four stakes, and left to expire in that painful situation. At this command, the desperate Carizmian, drawing a dagger, rushed headlong toward the throne; the guards raised their battle-axes; their zeal was checked by Alp Arslan, the most skilful archer of the age; he drew his bow, but his foot slipped, the arrow glanced aside, and he received in his breast the dagger of Joseph, who was instantly cut in pieces. The wound was mortal; and the Turkish prince bequeathed a dying admonition to the pride of kings. "In my youth," said Alp Arslan, "I was advised by a sage to humble myself before God; to distrust my own strength, and never to despise the most contemptible foe. I have neglected these lessons; and my neglect has been deservedly punished. Yesterday, as from an eminence I beheld the numbers, the discipline, and the spirit of my armies, the earth seemed to tremble under my feet; and I said in my heart, Surely thou art the king of the world, the greatest and most invincible of warriors. These armies are no longer mine; and, in the confidence of my personal strength, I now fall by the hand of an assassin."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 57, p. 519.

4452. PRIDE, Humiliated. Samuel Johnson. Sir Joshua [Reynolds] told me a pleasant characteristic anecdote of Johnson, about the time of their first acquaintance. When they were one evening together at the Miss Cotterells', the then Duchess of Argyle, and another lady of high rank, came in. Johnson, thinking that the Miss Cotterells were too much engrossed by them, and that he and his friend were neglected, as low company of whom they were somewhat ashamed, grew angry; and resolving to shock their supposed pride, by making their great visitors imagine that his friend and he were low indeed, he addressed himself in a loud tone to Mr. Reynolds, saying, "How much do you think you and I could get in a week if we were to work as hard as we could?"—as if they had been common mechanics.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 64.

4453. PRIDE, Mortified. Oliver Goldsmith's. Goldsmith's incessant desire of being conspicuous in company was the occasion of his sometimes appearing to such disadvantage as one should hardly have supposed possible in a man of his genius. When his literary reputation had risen deservedly high, and his society was much courted, he became very jealous of the extraordinary attention which was everywhere paid to Johnson. One evening, in a circle of wits, he found fault with me for talking of Johnson as entitled to the honor of unquestionable superiority. "Sir," said he, "you are for making a monarchy of what should be a republic." He was still more mortified, when, talking in a company with fluent vivacity, and, as he flattered himself, to the admiration of all who were present, a German who sat next him, and perceived Johnson rolling himself, as if about to speak, suddenly stopped him, saying, "Stay, stay—Doctor Shonson is going to say something."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 219.

4454. PRIDE of Rivalry. Cicero. Cicero's natural place was at Cæsar's side; but to Cæsar alone of his contemporaries he was conscious of an inferiority which was intolerable to him. In his own eyes he was always the first person. He had been made unhappy by the thought that posterity might rate Pompey above himself. Closer acquaintance had reassured him about Pompey, but in Cæsar he was conscious of a higher presence, and he rebelled against the humiliating acknowledgment.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 27.

4455. PRIDE, Sacrifices for. Oliver Goldsmith. [He had suddenly resolved to go beyond the sea—anywhere. His mortification because of reproof in college was the cause. See No. 5369.] He accordingly sold his books and clothes, and sallied forth from the college walls the very next day, intending to embark at Cork for—he scarce knew where—America, or any other part beyond sea. With his usual heedless imprudence, however, he loitered about Dublin until his finances were reduced to a shilling; with this amount of specie he set out on his journey. . . . For three whole days he subsisted on his shilling; when that was spent, he parted with some of the clothes from his back, until, reduced almost to nakedness, he was four-and-twenty hours without food, inasmuch that he declared a handful of gray pease, given to him by a girl at a wake, was one of the most delicious repasts he had ever tasted. Hunger, fatigue, and destitution brought down his spirit and calmed his anger. Fain would he have retraced his steps, could he have done so with any salvo for the lingerings of his pride.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, p. 25.

4456. PRIDE, Subjugation of. Luther. In the monastery every one was proud to see the youthful and learned scholar in the garb of the order—the black cowl with the scapulary. Yet the new arrival could not be exempted from any of the most menial services which it was customary to impose upon the novices in order to break their self-will and to overcome their pride. Thus Luther was obliged to assist in the cleaning of the cells. He was also sent out with the beggar's sack, through the streets of the city, to solicit food and money. And although he himself did not feel humiliated in the performance of these menial duties—for he was inspired with a burning desire faithfully to fulfil his vows of poverty and obedience—yet the professors of the university interposed their objections.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 3, p. 30.

4457. PRIDE, Vainglorious. Henry VIII. He had one great object ever present to his mind in peace or in war: to display Henry the king, in his presumed superiority of mind and body, made doubly impressive by his regal magnificence. A more vainglorious and self-willed coxcomb never wore a crown. In his first experience in war, in 1513, his qualities were exhibited in a way which sufficiently betokens the total absence of real greatness of character.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 16, p. 267.

4458. PRIESTS, Interference of. Meddling. The interference of the clergy with men's temporal affairs was never-ceasing; and the officiousness was often hastily resented by members of the family where the priest was supreme. John Paston complains that his mother's chaplain has turned her affection from her sons: "Sir James [the priest] and I be twain; we fell out before my mother with 'thou proud priest,' and 'thou proud squire,' my mother taking his part, so I have almost shut the bolt of my mother's house." [A.D. 1450-1485.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 8, p. 125.

4459. PRIMOGENITURE disregarded. Old Testament. Their whole history, far from favoring the notion that primogeniture is of divine institution, would rather seem to indicate that younger brothers are under the especial protection of Heaven. Isaac was not the eldest son of Abraham, nor Jacob of Isaac, nor Judah of Jacob, nor David of Jesse, nor Solomon of David. Indeed, the order of seniority among children is seldom strictly regarded in countries where polygamy is practised.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 67.

4460. PRINCIPLE, Importance of. Tax on Tea. "You are quarrelling for threepence a pound on tea, an atom on the shoulders of a giant," said the Tories; . . . [Alexander Hamilton] answered, "The Parliament claims a right to tax us in all cases whatever; its late acts are in virtue of that claim; it is the principle against which we contend."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 19.

4461. PRINCIPLES limited. James II. A fatal delusion had taken possession of his mind, which was never dispelled till it had ruined him. He firmly believed that, do what he might, the members of the Church of England would act up to their principles. It had, he knew, been proclaimed from ten thousand pulpits, it had been solemnly declared by the University of Oxford, that even tyranny as frightful as that of the most depraved of the Cæsars did not justify subjects in resisting the royal authority, and hence he was weak enough to conclude that the whole body of Tory gentlemen and clergymen would let him plunder, oppress, and insult them without lifting an arm against him. [He made the attempt and was driven from the throne into exile in France.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 58.

4462. PRINCIPLES, Weight of. Independence Day. The nation, when it made choice of a day for its great anniversary, selected not the day of the resolution of independence, when it closed the past, but that of the declaration of the principles on which it opened its new career.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 70.

4463. PRINTING, Beginning of. An Almanac. In 1638, Stephen Daye, an English printer, arrived at Boston, bringing a font of types, and in the following year set up a press at Cambridge. The first American publication was an almanac calculated for New England, and bearing the date of 1639. During the next year Thomas Welde and John Eliot, two ministers of Roxbury, and Richard Mather, of Dorchester, translated the Hebrew Psalms into English verse, and published their rude work in a volume of three hundred pages—the first book printed on this side of the Atlantic.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 13, p. 132.

4464. PRINTING restricted. Punishment. [In 1638 the Star-Chamber attempted to regulate the press. By its decree, "printing in corners without a license" was punishable by the orthodox process of whipping and the pillory.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 27, p. 431.

4465. PRINTING, Suspicious. Magic. The circumstance which, of all others, most conduced to the advancement and universal dissemination of learning at this period was the admirable invention of the art of printing. Printing seems to have been invented about the year 1440, at Strasburg, by John Gutenberg, but considerably improved by John Faust and Peter Schöffer. This noble invention was, at its first appearance, deemed so extraordinary that the servants of John Faust, who came to Paris to sell some of his early publications, were accused of magic, and the Parliament ordered all their books to be committed to the flames. It must be owned, however, to the honor of Louis XI., that he condemned this decision of the Parisian judges, and ordered the value of the books to be paid to their proprietors.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 16, p. 253.

4466. PRISONERS, Cruelty to. England. [In 1637, the sheriff of London was sent for to answer a charge of having been kind to Mr. Prynne as he passed on his way to prison at Carnarvon. Mr. Prynne had written a book against theatres.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 26, p. 423.

4467. — — —. "The Fleet." Those prisoners who refused to bear their oppressions [from extortionate and avaricious keepers] without remonstrance were put in irons, and were confined in damp and loathsome dungeons. [In the same city, a similar prison for debtors, the Marshalsea, disclosed similar enormities.] Thumb-screws and iron skull-caps were here the received instruments of torture. Three hundred and thirty prisoners were crowded into a few narrow wards, forty or fifty being locked up through the night in a room sixteen feet square. The prison allowance was insufficient to support life, and the donations of the charitable were intercepted by the scoundrels in authority.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 4, p. 65.

4468. PRISONERS, Enslaved. Indian. In the prosecution of the war the colonists were actuated by a shameful spirit of avarice. The object was not so much to punish or destroy the savages as to take them prisoners. A bounty was offered for every captured Indian, and as fast as the warriors were taken they were sold as slaves for the West Indies. The petty strife continued for a year, and was then concluded with a treaty of peace.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 28, p. 232.

4469. PRISONERS, Extortion from. Fleet. [In 1730, in the management of the Fleet, one of the London debtors' prisons [a system of fraud and extortion was laid bare by a committee of Parliament], which showed how impossible it was for any but the affluent prisoner to obtain the humblest lodging and the coarsest food. Those without money were handed over to "the common side;" too happy if disease, engendered by filth and starvation, soon released them from their miseries.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 4, p. 64.

4470. PRISONS of Tyranny. France. France had many Bastilles, where, without legal trial or sentence, men suspected of designs against the government, or who had given offence to a royal courtier or a royal mistress, might be shut up even to the end of their days, under the authority of a lettre de cachet, through whose mysterious agency they vanished out of society, and were as if dead.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 9, p. 171.

4471. PRIVACY of Conversation. Lacedæmonian. [All the Lacedæmonian people ate their daily food at the public tables. The following custom prevailed:] When they first entered, the oldest man present pointed to the door, and said, Not a word spoken in this company goes out there.—PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

4472. PRIVATIONS, Ministerial. John Wesley. Returning from St. Hilary Downs, Mr. Wesley and his assistant, John Nelson, stopped to pick blackberries. Wesley said, "Brother Nelson, we ought to be thankful that there are plenty of blackberries, for this is the best country I ever saw for getting a stomach, but the worst I ever saw for getting food. Do the people think we can live by preaching?" Nelson replied, "I know not what they may think; but one asked me to eat something as I came from St. Just, when I ate heartily of barley bread and honey." He said, "You are well off; I had a thought of begging a crust of bread of the woman where I met the people at Morvah, but forgot it till I had got some distance from the house."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 193.

4473. PRIVILEGES, Pre-eminent. Conquest of Scotland. [By King Edward I. of England.] The flight of Bruce left his followers at Edward's mercy. Noble after noble was sent to the block. The Earl of Athole pleaded kindred with royalty. "His only privilege," burst forth the king, "shall be that of being hanged on a higher gallows than the rest."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 292.

4474. PROCESSION, Funeral. Alexander's. Aridæus having been deputed . . . to take upon himself the care of that solemnity, had employed two years in preparing everything that could possibly render it the most pompous and splendid funeral that had ever been seen. When all things were ready . . . orders were given for the procession to begin. This was preceded by a great number of pioneers and other workmen, whose office was to make all the ways practicable through which the procession was to pass. As soon as these were levelled, that magnificent chariot, the invention and design of which raised as much admiration as the immense riches that glittered all over it, set out from Babylon. The body of the chariot rested upon two axletrees, that were inserted into four wheels, made after the Persian manner; the naves and spokes of which were covered with gold, and the felloses plated over with iron. The extremities of the axletrees were made of gold, representing the muzzles of lions biting a dart. The chariot had four poles, to each of which were harnessed four sets of mules, each set consisting of four of those animals; so that this chariot was drawn by sixty-four mules. The strongest of those creatures and the largest were chosen on this occasion. They were adorned with crowns of gold, and collars enriched with precious stones and golden bells.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 16, § 3.

4475. PROCESSION, Royal. Greek Emperor's. The rites of policy were connected with those of religion, and his visits to the principal churches were regulated by the festivals of the Greek calendar. On the eve of these processions, the gracious or devout intention of the monarch was proclaimed by the heralds. The streets were cleared and purified; the pavement was strewn with flowers; the most precious furniture, the gold and silver plate, and silken hangings, were displayed from the windows and balconies, and a severe discipline restrained and silenced the tumult of the populace. The march was opened by the military officers at the head of their troops; they were followed in long order by the magistrates and ministers of the civil government; the person of the emperor was guarded by his eunuchs and domestics, and at the church door he was solemnly received by the patriarch and his clergy. The task of applause was not abandoned to the rude and spontaneous voices of the crowd. The most convenient stations were occupied by the bands of the blue and green factions of the circus; and their furious conflicts, which had shaken the capital, were insensibly sunk to an emulation of servitude. From either side they echoed in responsive melody the praises of the emperor; their poets and musicians directed the choir, and long life and victory were the burden of every song. The same acclamations were performed at the audience, the banquet, and the church; and, as an evidence of boundless sway, they were repeated in the Latin, Gothic, Persian, French, and even English language, by the mercenaries who sustained the real or fictitious character of those nations.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53, p. 358.

4476. PROCESSION, Triumphant. Roman Emperor Aurelian. Since the foundation of Rome, no general had more nobly deserved a triumph than Aurelian; nor was a triumph ever celebrated with superior pride and magnificence. The pomp was opened by twenty elephants, four royal tigers, and above two hundred of the most curious animals from every climate of the North, the East, and the South. They were followed by sixteen hundred gladiators, devoted to the cruel amusement of the amphitheatre. The wealth of Asia, the arms and ensigns of so many conquered nations, and the magnificent plate and wardrobe of the Syrian queen, were disposed in exact symmetry or artful disorder. The ambassadors of the most remote parts of the earth, of Æthiopia, Arabia, Persia, Bactriana, India, and China, all remarkable by their rich or singular dresses, displayed the fame and power of the Roman Emperor, who exposed likewise to the public view the presents that he had received, and particularly a great number of crowns of gold, the offerings of grateful cities. The victories of Aurelian were attested by the long train of captives who reluctantly attended his triumph, Goths, Vandals, Sarmatians, Alemanni, Franks, Gauls, Syrians, and Egyptians. Each people was distinguished by its peculiar inscription, and the title of Amazons was bestowed on ten martial heroines of the Gothic nation who had been taken in arms. But every eye, disregarding the crowd of captives, was fixed on the Emperor Tetricus and the Queen of the East. The former, as well as his son, whom he had created Augustus, was dressed in Gallic trousers, a saffron tunic, and a robe of purple. The beautiful figure of Zenobia was confined by fetters of gold; a slave supported the gold chain which encircled her neck, and she almost fainted under the intolerable weight of jewels. She preceded on foot the magnificent chariot, in which she once hoped to enter the gates of Rome. It was followed by two other chariots, still more sumptuous, of Odenathus and of the Persian monarch. The triumphal car of Aurelian (it had formerly been used by a Gothic king) was drawn, on this memorable occasion, either by four stags or by four elephants. The most illustrious of the Senate, the people, and the army, closed the solemn procession. So long and so various was the pomp of Aurelian's triumph that although it opened with the dawn of day, the slow majesty of the procession ascended not the Capitol before the ninth hour; and it was already dark when the emperor returned to the palace. The festival was protracted by theatrical representations, the games of the circus, the hunting of wild beasts, combats of gladiators, and naval engagements.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53, p. 359.

under his robe, massacred the governor and the whole of the Spartan officers, before they had time to stand upon their defence.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3, p. 162.

4478. PRODIGALITY checked. By Instruction. [James I. was ignorantly lavish of his favors. He gave Robert Carr an order on the lord treasurer for £20,000; but the treasurer, apprehending] that the king was ignorant of the worth of what was demanded, as of the person who had begged it [placed the £20,000 in specie upon the floor of a room to which the king was coming]. "Whose money is this?" said James. "It was your Majesty's before you gave it away." The king threw himself upon the heap, and swore that Carr should have no more than a few hundred pounds.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 22, p. 341.

4479. PRODIGALITY encouraged. Ruinous. Philosophers rose to tell the prodigal great that they were in the right course, for that private vices were public benefits; and so, in very charity to the provider of luxuries, the country squire became a rake upon the town, and his estates went to ruin, and all "his poor dependents felt the curse of his licentiousness."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 4, p. 49.

4480. PROFANITY irrepressible. Washington. [The advance of the army was in retreat at Monmouth by the cowardice and incapacity of General Lee, its commander.] The chief was exasperated. . . . When he met Lee, he exclaimed, in fierce tones, "What is the meaning of all this, sir?" Lee hesitated a moment, when, according to Lafayette, the aspect of Washington became terrible, and he again demanded, "I desire to know the meaning of this disorder and confusion!" The fiery Lee, stung by Washington's manner, made an angry reply, when the chief, unable to control himself, called him "a damned poltroon." "This," said Lafayette, . . . "was the only time I ever heard General Washington swear."—CUSTIS'S WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 5.

4481. PROFANITY punished. Puritans. [In 1653 profaners were punished by the officers of the law.] Swearing had been a statutory crime since the time of James I., but the extreme Puritans not only visited profane cursing with fine and the stocks, but punished even such as followed Lady Percy's example of "Good sooth;" and "God shall mend me," "Plague take you," was fisible.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 11, p. 173.

4482. PROFANITY, Ruinous. Robespierre. The "Fête de l'Être Suprême" . . . was a theatrical exhibition of very questionable taste, in which Robespierre, as president of the convention, played the part of high-priest, with ill-concealed self-exaltation and triumph. At this moment the tyrant may be said to have attained the summit of his extraordinary fortunes; and, by a strange fatality, it was on this occasion that the first seeds were sown of that hostile coalition which in the course of a few weeks was to achieve his ruin. Great dissatisfaction was excited by the pre-eminence assumed at the festival by Robespierre over his colleagues. Various threatening hints were dropped in his hearing: "It is but a step from the Capitol to the Tarpelan Rock," said one; "He would accustom the republic to adore some one, in order to make himself adore by and by," exclaimed another.—STUDENTS FRANCE, ch. 27, § 6.

4483. PROFANITY, Suppression of. Christopher Wren. When Sir Christopher Wren was building St. Paul's Cathedral, he caused the following notice to be affixed to several parts of the structure: "Whereas, among laborers and others, that ungodly custom of swearing is so frequently heard, to the dishonor of God and contempt of His authority; and to the end that such impiety may be utterly banished from these works, which are intended for the service of God and the honor of religion, it is ordered that profane swearing shall be a sufficient crime to dismiss any laborer that comes to the call; and the clerk of the works, upon a sufficient proof, shall dismiss him accordingly; and that if any master, working by task, shall not, upon admonition, reform the profanation among his apprentices, servants, and laborers, it shall be construed his fault, and he shall be liable to be censured by the commissioners."

4484. PROFESSION, Choice of. Accidental. It was by accident that [Julius] Cæsar took up the profession of a soldier; yet perhaps no commander who ever lived showed greater military genius. The conquest of Gaul was by a force numerically insignificant, which was worked with the precision of a machine. The variety of uses to which it was capable of being turned implied, in the first place, extraordinary forethought in the selection of materials. Men whose nominal duty was merely to fight were engineers, architects, mechanics of the highest order. In a few hours they could extemporize an impregnable fortress on an open hill-side. They bridged the Rhine in a week. They built a fleet in a month. The legions at Alesia held twice their number pinned within their works, while they kept at bay the whole force of insurgent Gaul, entirely by scientific superiority. The machine, which was thus perfect, was composed of human beings who required supplies of tools, and arms, and clothes, and food, and shelter, and for all these it depended on the forethought of its commander.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 28.

4485. PROFESSION by Coercion. Dr. Andrew Combe. Although he had chosen to be "a doctor," when finally asked "what he would be," his answer . . . was, "I'll no be naething." He would give no further answer; and, after all kinds of "fleechin'" and persuading were tried, he had at length to be carried by force out of the house to begin his professional career! [Between his father and brother he was carried] several hundred yards before he would put his feet to the ground.—SMILES'S BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 369.

4486. PROFESSION, Hereditary. Egyptians. All professions in Egypt were hereditary, a piece of policy . . . which deserves much more to be condemned than applauded. If the same dispositions and the same talents descended invariably from father to son, we might agree with M. Bosuet in holding it presumable that men would execute in greater perfection what they had always seen done, and what had been their sole employment from infancy; but daily experience shows that neither talents nor inclinations are invariably hereditary, and therefore the argument is futile.

But not only were all professions hereditary among this people; the rank and dignity of each was most scrupulously settled, nor could any eminence of merit or of fortune entitle an individual to higher respect or honor than what belonged to the meanest of his class; a policy repressive of all emulation, and of that generous ambition on which every species of excellence depends; while, at the same time, it was a fertile source of jealousy, animosity, and disunion.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4, p. 46.

4487. PROFESSION ignored. Reign of Charles II. Any lad of noble birth, any dissolute courtier for whom one of the king's mistresses would speak a word, might hope that a ship of the line, and with it the honor of the country and the lives of hundreds of brave men, would be committed to his care. It mattered not that he had never in his life taken a voyage except on the Thames; that he could not keep his feet in a breeze; that he did not know the difference between latitude and longitude. No previous training was thought necessary; or, at most, he was sent to make a short trip in a man-of-war, where he was subjected to no discipline, where he was treated with marked respect, and where he lived in a round of revels and amusements. If, in the intervals of feasting, drinking, and gambling, he succeeded in learning the meaning of a few technical phrases and the names of the points of the compass, he was fully qualified to take charge of a three-decker.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 281.

4488. PROFESSION, A suspicious. Reign of James II. [Pledges of support were sent to William Prince of Orange, if he would come from Holland and deliver England from the oppressions of James.] Lord . . . Churchill, in a letter written with a certain elevation of language, which was the sure mark that he was going to commit a baseness, declared that he was determined to perform his duty to Heaven and to his country, and that he put his honor absolutely into the hands of the Prince of Orange. William doubtless read those words with one of those bitter and cynical smiles which gave his face its least pleasing expression. It was not his business to take care of the honor of other men; nor had the most rigid casuist pronounced it unlawful in a general to invite, to use, and to reward the services of deserters whom he could not but despise.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 407.

4489. PROFITS, Eagerness for. Tobacco. Hitherto the labor of the settlers had been directed to the planting of vineyards and to the manufacture of potash, soap, glass and tar. The managers of the London Company had at last learned that these articles could be produced more cheaply in Europe than in America. They had also discovered that there were certain products peculiar to the New World which might be raised and exported with great profit. Chief among such native products was the plant called tobacco, the use of which had already become fashionable in Spain, England, and France. This, then, became the leading staple of the colony, and was even used for money. So entirely did the settlers give themselves to the cultivation of the famous weed that the very streets of Jamestown were ploughed up and planted with it.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 11, p. 109.

4491. PROGRESS Checked. Family. It is recorded that the man who picked up the body [of William II., who had been accidentally shot in the forest in 1100], was a charcoal-burner, of the name of Purkess, living in the village of Minstead, in the forest, and that on his cart was the corpse removed to Winchester. In that village in 1843 we saw the name of Purkess over a little shop; and Mr. Stewart Rose, who held an office in the forest, records that the charcoal-burner's descendants have always lived in this village, where they still live, the possessors of one horse and cart, and no more.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 16, p. 281.

4492. PROGRESS by Competition. Isaac Newton. [He had vanquished an insolent bully in a fist-fight. See No. 179.] The next morning, however, he had again the mortification of seeing his enemy at the head of the class, while he occupied his usual place at the foot. He began to reflect. Could he regard himself in the light of a victor while his foe lorded it over him in the school-room? The applauding shouts of his school-fellows had been grateful to his ears, but his enemy enjoyed the approval of the teacher. The laurels of the play-ground seemed to fade in comparison with the nobler triumphs of the mind. The result of his reflections was that he determined to conquer his adversary again by getting to the head of his class. From that time he became as studious as he had before been idle, and soon attained the second place. A long and severe struggle ensued between him and his adversary for the first, in the course of which each triumphed in turn; but, at length, Isaac Newton remained permanently at the head. He never relapsed into idleness. He was a student thenceforth to the end of his life of nearly eighty-five years.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 245.

4493. PROGRESS by Development. Farm Stock. The average weight of the ox and the sheep has been doubled since the beginning of the eighteenth century.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 1, p. 12.

4494. PROGRESS, Feeble. Syrians—Egyptians. [The slothful effeminacy of the former exposed them to the contempt, the sullen ferociousness of the latter excited the aversion, of the conquerors. Those nations had submitted to the Roman power, but they seldom desired or deserved the freedom of the city; and it was remarked, that more than two hundred and thirty years elapsed, after the ruin of the Ptolemies, before an Egyptian was admitted into the Senate of Rome.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 46.

4495. PROGRESS, Hopeless. Explorers. [Sir William Parry in the Polar Sea.] At last, however, a difficulty arose which was wholly insurmountable by mortal power. Soon after they had reached tolerably firm ice, over which they could draw their sleds with comparative ease, a strong, steady north wind met them, which rendered their march exceedingly fatiguing. This they could have endured, but imagine their dismay when they discovered that this wind was blowing the whole mass of ice toward the south faster than they could march northward. As long as possible Captain Parry concealed this crushing fact from the men; but when, at the end of laborious and distressing days, he found that they were actually farther from the Pole than in the morning, he was compelled to disclose the secret, and retrace his steps. They had travelled, since leaving the ship, six hundred and sixty-eight miles, and had only made one hundred and seventy-two miles. They reached the ship sixty-one days after leaving her, and soon after sailed for England.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 389.

4496. PROGRESS, Human. Germany. The most civilized nations of modern Europe issued from the woods of Germany; and in the rude institutions of those barbarians we may still distinguish the original principles of our present laws and manners.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 250.

4497. PROGRESS ignored. Charles I. It may be allowed, on an impartial estimate of the character and personal qualities of Charles I., that had the nation in his reign entertained no higher ideas of the liberty of the subject, or of the powers of parliament, than those which prevailed during the two preceding centuries, this prince would have reigned with high popularity. It was his misfortune to fill the throne of England at the period of this remarkable crisis in the public opinions, and to be educated in the highest notions of the powers of the crown at the time when those usurped powers were justly doomed to come to an end. It was his misfortune, too, that with many good dispositions, and a very large share of mental endowments, he wanted that political prudence which should have taught him to yield to the necessity of the times, and that it was wiser to abandon a little of that power which he conceived to be his right, than, by obstinately maintaining it to its utmost extent, to risk an entire deprivation of it.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 29, p. 298.

4498. PROHIBITION, Colonial. Bacon's Assembly. [The reform assembly of Virginia, 1676.] The church aristocracy was broken up . . . the sale of wine and ardent spirits was absolutely prohibited, if not at Jamestown, yet otherwise through the whole country . . . two of the magistrates, notorious for raising county taxes for their private gains, were disfranchised.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 14.

4499. PROHIBITION, Incipient. New Jersey. In November of 1681, Jennings, the deputy-governor of West Jersey, convened the first general assembly of the province. The men who had so worried the aristocracy of England by wearing their hats in the presence of great men, and by saying "thee" and "thou" now met together to make their own laws. The code was brief and simple. The sale of ardent spirits to the Red men was prohibited. Taxes should be voted by the representatives of the people. The lands of the Indians should be acquired by honorable purchase. Finally, a criminal—unless a murderer, a traitor, or a thief—might be pardoned by the person against whom the offence was committed.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 24, p. 206.

4500. PROHIBITION, Ineffective. Colony of Georgia. Another regulation which prohibited the introduction of ardent spirits could not be enforced; it led only to clandestine traffic. [The colonists were chiefly poor people, debtors, and persecuted Protestants.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 24.

4501. PROHIBITION, Plea for. Dutch and Indians. A.D. 1642. The trader did not learn humanity, nor the savage forget revenge; the son of a chief, stung by the conviction of having been defrauded and robbed, aimed an unerring arrow at the first Hollander exposed to his fury. A deputation of river chieftains hastened to express their sorrow; . . . they offered to purchase security for the murderer by a fine for blood. . . . "You yourselves," they added, "are the cause of this evil; you ought not to craze the young Indians with brandy. Your own people, when drunk, fight with knives, and do foolish things; and you cannot prevent mischief till you cease to sell strong drink to the Indians."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

4502. PROHIBITION, Protection by. Colonial. The colony of Georgia [established as a refuge for the poor] interdicted the importation of spirituous liquors. The cap of Liberty was on its seal, and its motto—Non sibi sed aliis, Not for themselves, but others—declared the philanthropic purpose of its projectors.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 1, p. 22.

4503. PROHIBITION resisted. American Indians. Prohibitory laws were hardly sanctioned by savage opinion. The wild man hates restraint, and loves to do what is right in his own eyes.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

4504. PROMISES, Broken. Queen Mary. [In 1559, when Mary Queen of Scots was reminded by the leading reformers of her promises of toleration, she replied:] Promises ought not to be urged upon princes unless they can conveniently fill them.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 8, p. 118.

4505. PROMISES, Deceptive. To Heretics. [Luther went to Worms to meet his accusers, and was promised safe-conduct.] The Papists, on the other hand, sought to persuade his Imperial Majesty to seize Luther and to put him to death. They adduced the example of John Huss, and said, "To a heretic one is under no obligation, either to grant a safe-conduct or to keep it." But the Emperor Charles [V.] replied, "Whatever promise has been made must be fulfilled."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 9, p. 85.

4506. PROMISES, Regard for. Romans. The goddess of Faith (of human and social faith) was worshipped, not only in her temples, but in the lives of the Romans; and if that nation was deficient in the more amiable qualities of benevolence and generosity, they astonished the Greeks by their sincere and simple performance of the most burdensome engagements. Yet among the same people, according to the rigid maxims of the patricians and decemvirs, a naked pact, a promise, or even an oath, did not create any civil obligation, unless it was confirmed by the legal form of a stipulation. Whatever might be the etymology of the Latin word, it conveyed the idea of a firm and irrevocable contract, which was always expressed in the mode of a question and answer. "Do you promise to pay me 100 pieces of gold?" was the solemn interrogation of Seius. "I do promise," was the reply of Sempronius.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 365.

4507. PROMOTION earned. General Grant. Governor Yates, of his State, . . . put him on his staff as adjutant, to assist him in arranging the quota of the State. . . . He acquitted himself so well, that when Lincoln sent on to the governor to forward two names from the State for the position of brigadier-general, the latter proposed to Grant to send him on. But he declined, saying he preferred to earn his promotion. He, however, accepted the colonelcy of the Twenty-first Regiment. . . . On the 7th of August, . . . 1861, he received his appointment as brigadier-general.—HEADLEY'S GENERAL GRANT, p. 47.

4508. PROMOTION, Jocular. Napoleon I. [Napoleon was the second to cross the bridge at Lodi.] Some of the veterans of the army, immediately after the battle, met together, and jocosely promoted their general, who had so distinguished himself by bravery, and who was so juvenile in his appearance, to the rank of corporal. When Napoleon next appeared upon the field he was greeted with enthusiastic shouts by the whole army, "Long live our little corporal!" . . . and never lost . . . this honorary and affectionate nickname.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 5.

4509. PROMOTION, Loss by. Saturninus. [One of the thirty tyrants.] When the clamor of the soldiers invested the reluctant victims with the ensigns of sovereign authority, they sometimes mourned in secret their approaching fate. "You have lost," said Saturninus, on the day of his elevation—"you have lost a useful commander, and you have made a very wretched emperor."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 10, p. 324.

4510. PROMOTION, Offensive. Roman Senators. Julius Cæsar . . . increased the number of the senate to nine hundred, filling its ranks from eminent provincials, introducing even barbarian Gauls, and, still worse, libertini, the sons of liberated slaves, who had risen to distinction by their own merit. The new members came in slowly, and it is needless to say were unwillingly received; a private handbill was sent round recommending the coldest of greetings to them.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 26.

4511. PROMOTION, Providential. Queen Elizabeth. [Daughter of Henry VIII.] Tradition still points out the tree in Hatfield Park beneath which Elizabeth was sitting when she received the news of her peaceful accession to the throne. She fell on her knees, and drawing a long breath, exclaimed at last, "It is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes." To the last these words remained stamped on the golden coinage of the queen.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 692.

4512. PROMOTION, Remarkable. Cromwell. The storm is up in England, and Oliver has become a marked man; he probably knows that he will have to take a prominent part in the affairs of the kingdom. Halt we awhile to reflect on this. This obscure man, lone English farmer, untitled, unwealthy, no grace of manner to introduce himself, ungainly in speech and in action, unskilled in war, unused to the arts of courts and the cabals of senates and legislators—this man whose life had passed altogether with farmers and religious-minded men, was, at almost a bound, to leap to the highest place in the people's army, grasping the baton of the marshal. This man was to strike the successful blows on the field, shivering to pieces the kingly power in the land; himself was to assume the truncheon of the Dictator; was to sketch the outline of laws, of home and foreign policy, which all succeeding legislators were to attempt to embody and imitate; was to wring concessions to his power from the most haughty monarchies of ancient feudal Europe, and to bear up, in arms, England, fast dwindling into contempt, to the very foremost place among the nations; was to produce throughout the world homage to the Protestant religion, making before his name the fame and terror of Gustavus, of Henry IV., of Zisca, to dwindle and look pale. And this with no prestige of birth or education. Is it too much, then, to call him the most royal actor England, if not the world, has produced?—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 47.

4513. PROMOTION, Unexpected. Cromwell. No doubt Cromwell was amazed at the lofty elevation to which he ascended; for he commenced his public career without any plan; he threw himself, and his fortunes, and his life into the scale against the king, and on the side of the people. He was at that time a plain country yeoman. We do not believe that he had any ambition other than to serve the cause with a brave, pure heart. Could he, whose unnoticed days had been passed by a farmer's ingle, see gleaming before his eyes a crown, which he might refuse? Could he, who had spent his later years in following the plough, dream that he should draw the sword, only to find himself at last the greatest general of his own age, and one of the greatest soldiers of any age? Well might he say, "One never mounts so high as when one does not know where one is going." It is the sublime of human philosophy and character to be able to say this; it is faith in Providence and in destiny alone which can say this.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 1, p. 21.

4514. PROMPTNESS, Success by. Charles XII. Three powerful enemies joined in a league to oppress him. Sweden was then in possession of the territories of Estonia and Livonia; and Charles XI., his father, had violated the privileges of the Livonians, which they had asserted by a deputation, at the head of which was a nobleman of the name of Patkul, who had incensed the monarch by too bold a remonstrance in favor of the liberties of his country; he was condemned to death, but he escaped, and denounced a signal vengeance against the King of Sweden; he found means to persuade Augustus, King of Poland, and the czar, Peter, that they had now an opportunity of recovering, during the weakness of that monarchy, all the provinces they had formerly lost. They were joined by Frederick IV., King of Denmark, and it was not doubted that Sweden would fall a victim to so formidable an alliance. . . . It was the opinion of Charles' counsellors that a negotiation should be set on foot to avert the impending ruin ; but the king himself instantly gave orders to prepare for war. "I shall attack the first," said he, "who declares against me, and by defeating him, I hope to intimidate the rest." From that time Charles dedicated his life to a series of fatigues and dangers, and enjoyed not a moment of ease or relaxation.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 35, p. 477.

4515. PROOF of Intentions. Cleopatra. [Antony was suspicious that she might poison him, and required his food to be tasted at her banquets.] She employed a very extraordinary method to make him sensible how ill-founded his fears were, and at the same time, if she had so had an intention, how ineffectual all the precautions he took would be. She caused the extremities of the flowers to be poisoned, of which the wreaths, worn by Antony and herself at table, according to the custom of the ancients, were composed. When their heads began to grow warm with wine, in the height of their gaiety, Cleopatra proposed to Antony to drink off those flowers. He made no difficulty ; and, after having plucked off the ends of his wreath with his fingers, and thrown them into his cup filled with wine, he was upon the point of drinking it, when the queen, taking hold of his arm, said to him, "I am the poisoner against whom you take such mighty precaution. If it were possible for me to live without you, judge now whether I wanted either the opportunity or means for such an action." Having ordered a prisoner, condemned to die, to be brought thither, she made him drink that liquor, upon which he died immediately.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 24, § 3.

4516. PROPERTY, Conservatism of. James-town Colony. The greatest change in the condition of the colonists resulted from the incipient establishment of private property. To each man a few acres of ground were assigned for his orchard and to plant at his pleasure and for his own use. So long as industry had been without its special reward, reluctant labor, wasteful of time, had been followed by want.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 4.

4517. PROPERTY, Hereditary. Roman Laws. The jurisprudence of the Romans appears to have deviated from the equality of nature much less than the Jewish, the Athenian, or the English institutions. On the death of a citizen all his descendants, unless they were already freed from his paternal power, were called to the inheritance of his possessions. The insolent prerogative of primogeniture was unknown ; the two sexes were placed on a just level ; all the sons and daughters were entitled to an equal portion of the patrimonial estate ; and if any of the sons had been intercepted by a premature death, his person was represented, and his share was divided, by his surviving children.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 360.

4518. PROPERTY, Ownership of. Production. The savage who hollows a tree, inserts a sharp stone into a wooden handle, or applies a string to an elastic branch becomes in a state of nature the just proprietor of the canoe, the bow, or the hatchet. The materials were common to all, the new form, the produce of his time and simple industry, belongs solely to himself. His hungry brethren cannot, without a sense of their own injustice, extort from the hunter the game of the forest overtaken or slain by his personal strength and dexterity. If his provident care preserves and multiplies the tame animals, whose nature is tractable to the arts of education, he acquires a perpetual title to the use and service of their numerous progeny, which derives its existence from him alone. If he encloses and cultivates a field for their sustenance and his own, a barren waste is converted into a fertile soil ; the seed, the manure, the labor, create a new value, and the rewards of harvest are painfully earned by the fatigues of the revolving year. In the successive states of society, the hunter, the shepherd, the husbandman, may defend their possessions by two reasons which forcibly appeal to the feelings or the human mind ; that whatever they enjoy is the fruit of their own industry ; and that every man who envies their felicity may purchase similar acquisitions by the exercise of similar diligence.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4, p. 355.

4519. PROPERTY, Titles to. Reign of James II. [He favored the destruction of titles, so as to advance the adherents of the Roman Catholic faith, whose property had long ago been confiscated.] He ought to have determined that the existing settlement of landed property [in Ireland] should be inviolable ; and he ought to have announced that determination in such a manner as effectually to quiet the anxiety of the new proprietors, and to extinguish any wild hopes which the old proprietors might entertain. Whether, in the great transfer of estates, injustice had or had not been committed, was immaterial. That transfer, just or unjust, had taken place so long ago that to reverse it would be to unfix the foundations of society. There must be a time of limitation to all rights. After thirty-five years of actual possession, after twenty-five years of possession solemnly guaranteed by statute, after innumerable leases and releases, mortgages and devises, it was too late to search for flaws in titles.—MA-CAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 124.

4520. PROPERTY, Tyranny of. Rev. John Ball. "Mad" as the landowners held him to be, it was in the preaching of John Ball that England first listened to a declaration of the natural equality and rights of man. "Good people," cried the preacher, "things will never be well in England so long as goods be not in common, and so long as there be villains and gentlemen. By what right are they whom we call lords greater folk than we ? On what grounds have they deserved it ? Why do they hold us in serfage ? If we all came of the same father and mother, of Adam and Eve, how can they say or prove that they are better than we, if it be not that they make us gain for them by our toil what they spend in their pride ? They are clothed in velvet and warm in their furs and their ermines, while we are covered with rags. They have wine and spices and fair bread, and we oat-cake and straw and water to drink. They have leisure and fine houses ; we have pain and labor, the rain and the wind in the fields. And yet it is of us and of our toil that these men hold their state." It was the tyranny of property that then as ever roused the defiance of socialism.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 345.

4521. PROPERTY, Wrongs in. English Law. A.D. 1763. The right of primogeniture made its chief victims in the bosoms of the families which it kept up. . . . Even the mother who might survive her husband, after following him to his tomb, . . . returned no more to the ancestral mansion, but vacated it for the heir; and the dowager must be content with her jointure, which might often be paid grudgingly as to one, "Long wintering on a young man's revenue."

—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 3.

4522. PROPHECIES, Sustained. England 1753.

[In 1753 there was great opposition to a bill, which was passed, permitting Jews to hold real estate. One said it] was to give the lie to all the prophecies of the New Testament: they are to remain without any fixed habitation until they acknowledge Christ to be the Messiah.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 12, p. 193.

4523. PROPHECY, False. Empires fall. [When the Spanish Armada was expected to visit the coasts of England] many ancient and strange prophecies, in divers languages, and many excellent astronomers of sundry nations, had in very plain terms foretold that the year 1588 should be most fatal and ominous unto all estates, concluding in these words: "And if in that year the world do not perish and utterly decay, yet empires all, and kingdoms after, shall; and no man to raise himself shall know no way, and that forever after it shall be called the year of wonder." [Englishmen interpreted the prophecy against their enemies as a prediction of their overthrow, the God of the Bible, which Englishmen had learned to read, being their defender.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 14, p. 218.

4524. PROPHECY, Unconscious. Virgil. Constantine, in a very long discourse, which is still extant, . . . expatiates on the various proofs of religion; but he dwells with peculiar complacency on the Sibylline verses, and the fourth eclogue of Virgil. Forty years before the birth of Christ, the Mantuan bard, as if inspired by the celestial muse of Isaiah, had celebrated, with all the pomp of Oriental metaphor, the return of the Virgin, the fall of the serpent, the approaching birth of a godlike child, the offspring of the great Jupiter, who should expiate the guilt of human kind, and govern the peaceful universe with the virtues of his father; the rise and appearance of a heavenly race, a primitive nation throughout the world, and the gradual restoration of the innocence and felicity of the golden age. The poet was perhaps unconscious of the secret sense and object of these sublime predictions, which have been so unworthily applied to the infant son of a consul, or a triumvir; but if a more splendid, and indeed specious, interpretation of the fourth eclogue contributed to the conversion of the first Christian emperor, Virgil may deserve to be ranked among the most successful missionaries of the gospel. . . . He chiefly depends on a mysterious acrostic, composed in the sixth age after the Deluge, by the Erythræan Sibyl, and translated by Cicero into Latin. The initial letters of the thirty-four Greek verses form this prophetic sentence: JESUS CHRIST, SON OF GOD, SAVIOUR OF THE WORLD.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20, p. 269.

4525. PROPHETS, The Great. Four. Mahomet taught that God Almighty had engraven these laws [of Mahomet. See Religion, Mahometan] in the hearts of the first race of men, but that vice and iniquity gradually prevailing, and wearing out their impression, He had sent, from time to time, His prophets upon earth, to revive His holy precepts by their doctrines and example. The most eminent of these prophets, he affirmed, were Abraham, Moses, Jesus Christ—and Mahomet, the last, the greatest of all—who was destined to extend the knowledge of the true religion over all the earth.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 1, p. 52.

4526. PROPRIETORS, Nominal. George I.

[When the Hanoverian prince George came to the British throne as George I., the foreigner penned his first impressions.] He said: "This is a strange country. The first morning after my arrival at St. James' I looked out of the window, and saw a park, with canals, etc., which they told me were mine. The next day Lord Chetwynd, the ranger of my park, sent me a fine brace of carp out of my canal; and I was told I must give five guineas to Lord Chetwynd's servant for bringing me my carp out of my canal in my own park."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 1, p. 4.

4527. PROPRIETORS, Bondage of. Peruvians.

The mines of Potosi were discovered, with which the Peruvians themselves had been unacquainted—a source of riches which to this day is not exhausted. The Peruvians were made to work at these mines for the Spaniards, as the real proprietors. Those slaves who, from constitutional weakness of body, were soon worn out by the dreadful fatigues, . . . without the smallest remission of their labors, were replaced by negroes from the coast of Africa.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 21.

4528. PROSPERITY, Children bring. Arab.

The nurses of the desert, who came usually to compete for the new-born children to the doors of the wealthy, did not present themselves at the door of Amina [the mother of Mahomet], because she was a widow, and that widows, commonly poor, did not remunerate so liberally as the fathers the nurses of their children. At length Halima, one of those women of the desert who sold their milk, not having been able to find another nursing in the city, returned to Amina toward the evening, and took her infant. The credulity of the Arabs remarked, that from the day when this child was introduced into the tent of Halima all the prosperities and fecundities of nomad life made it their centre. The nurse refused to give him back to his mother, for fear of losing, with his departure, the benedictions of her tent.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 55.

4529. PROSPERITY, Dangers of. Philip of Macedon.

Olympias bare him Alexander, surnamed the Great. . . . Philip, who at that time was absent from his kingdom, had three very agreeable pieces of news brought him at one and the same time: that he had carried the prize at the Olympic games; that Parmenio, one of his generals, had gained a great victory over the Illyrians, and that his wife was delivered of a son. This prince, terrified at so signal a happiness, which the heathens thought frequently the omen of some mournful catastrophe, cried out, "Great Jupiter! in return for so many blessings, send me as soon as possible some slight misfortune."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 14, § 1.

4530. PROSPERITY, Destructive. Christianity.

The corruption of manners and principles, sa forcibly lamented by Eusebius, may be considered, not only as a consequence, but as a proof, of the liberty which the Christians enjoyed and abused under the reign of Diocletian. Prosperity had relaxed the nerves of discipline. Fraud, envy, and malice prevailed in every congregation. The presbyters aspired to the episcopal office, which every day became an object more worthy of their ambition. The bishops, who contended with each other for ecclesiastical pre-eminence, appeared by their conduct to claim a secular and tyrannical power in the church; and the lively faith which still distinguished the Christians from the Gentiles was shown much less in their lives than in their controversial writings.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16, p. 57.

4531. PROSPERITY by Government. By Rienzi. [The Roman tribune and patriot.] Justice was appeased by the tardy execution of Martin Ursini, who, among his various acts of violence and rapine, had pillaged a shipwrecked vessel at the mouth of the Tiber. His name, the purple of two cardinals, his uncles, a recent marriage, and a mortal disease were disregarded by the inflexible tribune, who had chosen his victim. The public officers dragged him from his palace and nuptial bed; his trial was short and satisfactory; the bell of the Capitol convened the people; stripped of his mantle, on his knees, with his hands bound behind his back, he heard the sentence of death; and after a brief confession Ursini was led away to the gallows. After such an example, none who were conscious of guilt could hope for impunity, and the flight of the wicked, the licentious, and the idle soon purified the city and territory of Rome. In this time (says the historian) the woods began to rejoice that they were no longer infested with robbers; the oxen began to plough; the pilgrims visited the sanctuaries; the roads and inns were replenished with travellers; trade, plenty, and good faith were restored in the markets; and a purse of gold might be exposed without danger in the midst of the highway. As soon as the life and property of the subject are secure, the labors and rewards of industry spontaneously revive; Rome was still the metropolis of the Christian world.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 70, p. 477.

4532. PROSPERITY, Springs of. Improvement. In every experimental science there is a tendency toward perfection. In every human being there is a wish to ameliorate his own condition. These two principles have often sufficed, even when counteracted by great public calamities and by bad institutions, to carry civilization rapidly forward. No ordinary misfortune, no ordinary misgovernment, will do so much to make a nation wretched as the constant progress of physical knowledge and the constant effort of every man to better himself will do to make a nation prosperous.—MACAULAY'S HIST., ch. 3, p. 261.

4533. PROSTITUTE, A distinguished. Theodora. The beauty of Theodora was the subject of more flattering praise and the source of more exquisite delight. Her features were delicate and regular; her complexion, though somewhat pale, was tinged with a natural color; every sensation was instantly expressed by the vivacity of her eyes; her easy motions displayed the graces of a small but elegant figure; and either love or adulation might proclaim that painting and poetry were incapable of delineating the matchless excellence of her form. But this form was degraded by the facility with which it was exposed to the public eye and prostituted to licentious desire. Her venal charms were abandoned to a promiscuous crowd of citizens and strangers, of every rank and of every profession; the fortunate lover who had been promised a night of enjoyment was often driven from her bed by a stronger or more wealthy favorite; and when she passed through the streets, her presence was avoided by all who wished to escape either the scandal or the temptation. The satirical historian has not blushed to describe the naked scenes which Theodora was not ashamed to exhibit in the theatre. After exhausting the arts of sensual pleasure, she most ungratefully murmured against the parsimony of nature. [She became the wife of the Roman Emperor Justinian.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40, p. 50.

4534. PROTECTION of Industry. Clashing. When the cultivator wanted to obtain the best price for his wool, that legislation that was always protecting one class against another class, to the injury of both classes, ordained the exportation of wool should be hampered with restrictions; "because that sufficient plenty of the said wools may continually abide and remain within the said realm, as may competently and reasonably serve for the occupation of cloth-makers." Of necessity much of the sufficient plenty became superabundant stock; and the price of wool was beaten down by the limitation of the market. [A.D. 1450-1485.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 7, p. 108.

4535. PROTECTION of Manufactures. English. The rural interests of England had (in 1698) prohibited the importation of Irish cattle. The Irish farmers took to breeding sheep, and wool being abundant, woollen manufactures sprang up. The Commons implored the king "to enjoin all those he employed in Ireland to use their utmost diligence to hinder the exportation of wool from Ireland, except imported hither, and for discouraging the woollen and encouraging the linen manufacture in Ireland."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 14, p. 214.

4536. PROTECTION by Secrecy. Athanasius. [During the persecution by the Arian party.] He was once secreted in a dry cistern, which he had scarcely left before he was betrayed by the treachery of a female slave; and he was once concealed in a still more extraordinary asylum, the house of a virgin, only twenty years of age, and who was celebrated in the whole city for her exquisite beauty. At the hour of midnight, as she related the story many years afterward, she was surprised by the appearance of the archbishop in a loose undress, who, advancing with hasty steps, conjured her to afford him the protection which he had been directed by a celestial vision to seek under her hospitable roof. The pious maid accepted and preserved the sacred pledge which was intrusted to her prudence and courage. Without imparting the secret to any one, she instantly conducted Athanasius into her most secret chamber, and watched over his safety with the tenderness of a friend and the assiduity of a servant. As long as the danger continued, she regularly supplied him with books and provisions, washed his feet, managed his correspondence, and dexterously concealed from the eye of suspicion this familiar and solitary intercourse between a saint whose character required the most unblemished chastity, and a female whose charms might excite the most dangerous emotions.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 21, p. 352.

4537. PROTECTION for the Weak. James Oglethorpe. He selected as the site of his settlement the high bluff on which now stands the city of Savannah. Here, on the first day of February, were laid the foundations of the oldest English town south of the Savannah River. Broad streets were laid out; a public square was reserved in each quarter; a beautiful village of tents and board houses built among the pine trees appeared as the capital of a new commonwealth, where men were not imprisoned for debt. Tomochichi, chief of the Yamacrans, came from his cabin half a mile distant to see his brother Oglethorpe. There was a pleasant conference. "Here is a present for you," said the red man to the white man. The present was a buffalo robe painted on the inside with the head and feathers of an eagle. "The feathers are soft, and signify love; the buffalo skin is the emblem of protection. Therefore love us and protect us," said the old chieftain. Such a plea could not be lost on a man like Oglethorpe.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 29, p. 239.

4538. PROTECTOR needed. Protestants. Had Cromwell been on the throne of England when Louis XIV. dared to revoke what had been called the Irrevocable Edict of Nantes, and by this act to inaugurate a protracted and horrible reign of terror, the revocation would never have taken place, or that apparition, which Mazarin always dreaded lest he should see, would have been beheld—namely, Cromwell at the gates of Paris.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 214.

4539. PROTECTION, A strong. Oliver Cromwell. It was at the very period of the massacre of the Piedmontese that a treaty with France had been matured, after long and tedious negotiation. One demand after another had been conceded to Cromwell by Louis and his crafty adviser, the Cardinal Mazarin. John Milton, Oliver's private and foreign secretary, had conducted the negotiation to a successful issue, and the French ambassador waited with the treaty ready for signature, when Cromwell learned of the sufferings of the Vaudois. He forthwith despatched an ambassador, on their behalf, to the Court of Turin, and refused to sign the treaty with France until their wrongs were redressed. The French ambassador was astonished and indignant. He remonstrated with Cromwell, and urged that the question bore no connection with the terms of the treaty; nor could his sovereign interfere, on any plea, with the subjects of an independent State. Mazarin took even bolder ground. He did not conceal his sympathy with the efforts of the Duke of Savoy to coerce these Protestant rebels—declared his conviction that in truth "the Vaudois had inflicted a hundred times worse cruelties on the Catholics than they had suffered from them," and altogether took up a very high and haughty position. Cromwell remained unmoved. New protestations met with no better reception. He told his Majesty of France, in reply to his assurances of the impossibility of interfering, that he had already allowed his own troops to be employed as the tools of the persecutors; which, though very much like giving his Christian Majesty the lie, was not without its effect. Cromwell would not move from the sacred duty he had assumed to himself, as the defender of the persecuted Protestants of Europe. The French ambassador applied for an audience to take his leave, and was made welcome to go. Louis and Mazarin had both to yield to his wishes at last, and became the unwilling advocates of the heretics of the valleys.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 215.

4540. PROTESTANTISM, Advance of. France. [A.D. 1561-1567. The Protestant opinions] were popular among the merchant class. The noblesse was fast becoming Huguenot. At the court itself the nobles feasted ostentatiously on the fast-days of the church, and flocked to the Protestant preachings. The clergy themselves seemed shaken. Bishops openly abjured the older faith. Coligny's brother, the Cardinal of Chatillon, celebrated the communion instead of mass in his own episcopal church at Beauvais, and married a wife. So irresistible was the movement, that Catharine saw no way of preserving France to Catholicism but by the largest concessions; and in the summer of 1561 she called on the pope to allow the removal of images, the administration of the sacrament in both kinds, and the abolition of private masses. Her demands were outstripped by those of an assembly of deputies from the states which met at Pontoise. These called for the confiscation of church property, for freedom of conscience and of worship, and, above all, for a national council in which every question should be decided by "the word of God." France seemed on the verge of becoming Protestant; and at a moment when Protestantism had won England and Scotland, and appeared to be fast winning southern as well as northern Germany, the accession of France would have determined the triumph of the Reformation. [Persecution of Protestants followed.]—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 726.

4541. PROTESTANTISM, Overthrow of. Persecution. At Rome the news of this great blow [given by the massacre on St. Bartholomew's Day] was hailed with extravagant manifestations of joy; the Pope [Gregory XII.] and cardinals went in state to return thanks to Heaven for this signal mercy, and medals were struck in its honor. Philip II. extolled it as one of the most memorable triumphs of Christianity, compared it to the splendid victory of Lepanto, and boasted that the total ruin of Protestantism was now finally assured. Nevertheless, this great wickedness, like all state crimes, was quite ineffectual for the purpose toward which it was directed. The Huguenots had lost their ablest leaders; they were stunned, confounded, scattered, weakened, but they were by no means wholly crushed. As soon as they recovered from their consternation they once more rushed to arms. . . . The persecuted party once more raised their heads, and within a year from the date of the great massacre were in a position to address the king in bolder and more importunate language than at any former period of the contest. . . . The full and public exercise of the reformed religion was authorized throughout the kingdom; the Parliaments were to consist of an equal number of Protestant and Catholic judges; all sentences passed against the Huguenots were annulled, and the insurgents were pronounced to have acted for the good of the king and kingdom; eight towns were placed in their hands for an unlimited period; and the States-General were to be convoked within six months. Such were the conditions of the "Peace of Monsieur," as it was termed, which was signed on the 6th of May, 1576—less than four years after that frightful massacre by which it was hoped that the Huguenot faction would be finally extirpated from France.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 16, § 12, and ch. 17, § 2.

4542. PROTESTANTISM, Protectors of. *English—Swede. The prince who bears the closest resemblance to Cromwell is Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden. He, too, was the lion of the Protestant cause, and his camp, like that of the great British farmer, was the scene of piety and extraordinary bravery. Like Cromwell, he was rapid and irresistible as a mountain torrent on the field. Like Cromwell, he alarmed the councils of the Roman Pontiff and struck terror into the Imperialist cabinet. Far inferior to Cromwell—for who of all generals or statesmen equalled him?—yet both regarded themselves as set apart and consecrated for the defence of Protestantism against the encroachments and cruelties of Popery. This idea largely entered into the mind of the Protector. He saw the state of Europe; he felt for its wrung and lacerated condition. In his age he was the only Protestant prince; the so-called Protestant statesmen were in league with Rome. He raised his banner against the Vatican, declared his side and his convictions, and made the tyrants and diplomatists of Europe quail and shrink before the shadow of his power and the terror of his name. In the history of Protestantism he occupies the distinguished place, in the very foreground. That we are entitled to say thus much of him is proved by a reference to his own words, as well as to the better evidence of his deeds.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 217.

4543. PROTESTATION, Absurd. *Timour the Tartar. [To his Syrian captives.] "You see me here," continued Timour, "a poor, lame, decrepit mortal. Yet by my arm has the Almighty been pleased to subdue the kingdoms of Iran, Touran, and the Indies. I am not a man of blood; and God is my witness that in all my wars I have never been the aggressor, and that my enemies have always been the authors of their own calamity." During this peaceful conversation the streets of Aleppo [in Syria] streamed with blood and re-echoed with the cries of mothers and children, with the shrieks of violated virgins.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65, p. 262.

4544. PROTESTATIONS, Characteristic. *Celts. The Celts at all times have been fond of emphatic protestations. The young heroes swore a solemn oath that they would not see wife or children or parents more till they had ridden twice through the Roman army. In this mood they encountered Cæsar in the valley of the Vienne, a river which falls into the Saône, and they met the fate which necessarily befell them when their ungovernable multitudes engaged the legions in the open field. They were defeated with enormous loss; not they riding through the Roman army, but themselves ridden over and hewn down by the German horsemen and sent flying for fifty miles over the hills into Alice St. Reine.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 19.

4545. PROVIDENCE, Deliverance by. *Columbus. [Four richly laden Venetian galleys were attacked by Columbus the younger, near the Portuguese coast.] A desperate engagement took place; the vessels grappled each other, and the crews fought hand to hand, and from ship to ship. The battle lasted from morning until evening, with great carnage on both sides. The vessel commanded by Columbus was engaged with a huge Venetian galley. They threw hand-grenades and other fiery missiles, and the galley was wrapped in flames. The vessels were fastened together by chains and grappling-irons, and could not be separated; both were involved in one conflagration, and soon became a mere blazing mass. The crews threw themselves into the sea; Columbus seized an oar, which was floating within reach, and, being an expert swimmer, attained the shore, though full two leagues distant.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, ch. 2.

4546. PROVIDENCE, Delivering. *National. When a financial panic made it impossible to pay the army of William III., then in the field against Louis XIV., and the danger from mutiny or total desertion was very great, the king was informed of the state of the treasury, and in reply expressed that noble sentiment which every Englishman ought to bear in mind in the day of public calamity and fear: "May God relieve us from our present embarrassment, for I cannot suppose it is His will to suffer a nation to perish which He has so often almost miraculously saved, though we have too well deserved it."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 13, p. 195.

4547. PROVIDENCE, Detention of. *Oliver Cromwell. Notice also that those latest years of James and first years of Charles were the period when the cruel persecution proceeding in England drove the first emigrants away into the American wilderness, there to found the old Massachusetts colony; they left their homes and country, willing to encounter the privations and dangers of the distant wilderness, hoping there to find a rest and refuge for outraged religion and humanity. Those were the days commemorated by the Plymouth Rock—the first settlers in Salem, and the growth of Lynn. We refer to this especially, because tradition says that on the 1st of May, 1638, eight ships, bound for New England, and filled with Puritan families, were arrested and interrupted in the Thames by an order from the king, and that among their passengers in one of those vessels were Pym, Hampden, Cromwell, and Hazelrig. Mr. John Forster doubts this, but cannot disprove it.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 48.

4548. PROVIDENCE, Directing. *The Pilgrims. [They intended to settle near the Hudson.] The spot to which Providence had directed the planters had, a few years before, been rendered entirely a desert by a pestilence, which had likewise swept over the neighboring tribes, and desolated almost the whole seaboard of New England. . . . There were the traces of a previous population, but not one living inhabitant.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 8.

4549. PROVIDENCE, Disposal of. *Pilgrims. The voyage was long and perilous. For sixty-three days the ship was buffeted by storms and driven. It had been the intention of the Pilgrims to found their colony in the beautiful country of the Hudson, but the tempest carried them out of their course, and the first land seen was the desolate Cape Cod. On the 9th of November the vessel was anchored in the bay; then a meeting was held on board, and the colony organized under a solemn compact. In the charter which they there made for themselves the emigrants declared their loyalty to the English crown, and covenanted together to live in peace and harmony, with equal rights to all, obedient to just laws made for the common good. Such was the simple but sublime constitution of the oldest New England State. A nobler document is not to be found among the records of the world. To this instrument all the heads of families, forty-one in number, solemnly set their names. An election was held in which all had an equal voice, and John Carver was unanimously chosen governor of the colony.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 7, p. 91.

4550. PROVIDENCE, Gifts of. *Socrates. "Did you never reflect within yourself," says Socrates to Euthydemus, "how much care the gods have taken to bestow upon man all that is necessary for him?" "Never, I assure you," replied he. "You see," continued Socrates, "how necessary light is, and how precious that gift of the gods ought to appear to us." "Without it," added Euthydemus, "we should be like the blind, and all nature as if it were dead; but because we have occasion for intervals of relaxation, they have also given us the night for our repose." "You are in the right; and for this we ought to render them continued praises and thanksgiving. They have ordained that the sun, that bright and luminous star, should preside over the day to distinguish its different parts, and that its light should serve not only to discover the wonders of nature, but to dispense over every part life and heat; and at the same time they have commanded the moon and stars to illumine the night, which of itself is dark and obscure. Is there anything more worthy of admiration than this variety and vicissitude of day and night, of light and darkness, of labor and rest; and all this for the convenience and good of man?" Socrates enumerates in like manner the infinite advantages we receive from fire and water for the necessities of life. . . . "All these things," said Euthydemus, "make me doubt whether the gods have any other employment than to shower down their gifts and benefits upon mankind."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 9, ch. 4, § 4.

4551. PROVIDENCE in History. *Reign of James II. [See No. 4558.] The task [of invading England] would indeed have been too arduous even for such a statesman as the Prince of Orange, had not his chief adversaries been at this time smitten with an infatuation such as by many men not prone to superstition was ascribed to the special judgment of God. Not only was the King of England, as he had ever been, stupid and perverse, but even the counsel of the politic King of France was turned into foolishness. Whatever wisdom and energy could do, William did. Those obstacles which no wisdom or energy could have overcome, his enemies themselves studiously removed. . . . Louis, by two opposite errors, raised against himself at once the resentment of both the religious parties between which Western Europe was divided. Having alienated one great section of Christendom by persecuting the Huguenots, he alienated another by insulting the Holy See. These faults he committed at a conjuncture at which no fault could be committed with impunity, and under the eye of an opponent second in vigilance, sagacity, and energy to no statesman whose memory history has preserved. William saw with stern delight his adversaries toiling to clear away obstacle after obstacle from his path. While they raised against themselves the enmity of all sects, he labored to conciliate all. The great design which he meditated he with exquisite skill presented to different governments in different lights; and it must be added that, though these lights were different, none of them was false.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 384, 404.

4552. ———. *Plymouth Colony. Had New England been colonized immediately on the discovery of the American continent, the old English institutions would have been planted under the powerful influence of the Roman Catholic religion; had the settlement been made under Elizabeth, it would have been before activity of the popular mind in religion had conducted to a corresponding activity of mind in politics.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 8.

4553. PROVIDENCE, National. *Great Britain. No man of English extraction would have risen to eminence, except by becoming in speech and habits a Frenchman. England owes her escape from such calamities to an event which her historians have generally represented as disastrous. Her interest was so directly opposed to the interest of her rulers, that she had no hope but in their errors and misfortunes. The talents and even the virtues of her six first French kings were a curse to her. The follies and vices of the seventh were her salvation. Had John inherited the great qualities of his father, . . . and had the King of France at the same time been as incapable as all the other successors of Hugh Capet had been, the house of Plantagenet must have risen to unrivalled ascendancy in Europe. But just at this conjuncture France, for the first time since the death of Charlemagne, was governed by a prince of great firmness and ability. On the other hand, England, which, since the battle of Hastings, had been ruled generally by wise statesmen, always by brave soldiers, fell under the dominion of a trifler and a coward. From that moment her prospects brightened. John was driven from Normandy. The Norman nobles were compelled to make their election between the island and the continent. . . . The great-grandsons of those who had fought under William and the great-grandsons of those who had fought under Harold began to draw near to each other in friendship, and the first pledge of their reconciliation was the Great Charter, won by their united exertions, and framed for their common benefit.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 14.

4554. PROVIDENCE, Overruling. *Missions. In 1815 the Rev. Barnabas Shaw went from England as a missionary to the Africans. Arriving at Cape Town, the government prohibited his laboring there, and with his devoted wife he started for the heathen tribes in the interior. A wagon and oxen were their outfit, and not knowing whither they went they continued their weary journey, until on the evening of the twenty-seventh day they met a party of Hottentots, accompanied by a chief, who encamped near them. Shaw communicated with them, and to his surprise learned that, having heard of the "Great Word," the chief was going to Cape Town to seek a Christian missionary for his people. He had already travelled two hundred miles, and there were yet nearly three hundred before he could reach Cape Town, where it was certain he could obtain no preacher. . . . Had either party started but half an hour earlier on its journey they must have missed each other. —STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 3, p. 363.

4555. PROVIDENCE, Protecting. William of Orange. [By solicitation of Protestants he invaded England.] The disembarkation had hardly been effected when the wind rose again, and swelled into a fierce gale from the west. The enemy [under James II.], coming in pursuit down the Channel, had been stopped by the same change of weather which enabled William to land. During two days the king's fleet lay on an unruffled sea in sight of Beachy Head. At length [Admiral] Dartmouth was able to proceed. He passed the Isle of Wight, and one of his ships came in sight of the Dutch topmasts in Torbay. Just at this moment he was encountered by the tempest, and compelled to take shelter in the harbor of Portsmouth. . . . The weather had indeed served the Protestant cause so well that some men of more piety than judgment fully believed the ordinary laws of nature to have been suspended for the preservation of the liberty and religion of England. Exactly a hundred years before, they said, the Armada, invincible by man, had been scattered by the wrath of God. Civil freedom and divine truth were again in jeopardy; and again the obedient elements had fought for the good cause. The wind had blown strong from the east while the prince wished to sail down the Channel, had turned to the south when he wished to enter Torbay, had sunk to a calm during the disembarkation, and, as soon as the disembarkation was completed, had risen to a storm, and had met the pursuers in the face. [See No. 1862.] —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 447.

4556. PROVIDENCE, Special. Preservation. Richard Rodda, a Cornish miner, was saved from sudden death while on his knees in prayer. He had knelt but about two minutes when the earth gave way above him; a large stone fell before him and reached above his head; another fell at his right hand, and a third on his left, each, like the first, being higher than himself; a fourth fell upon these about four inches above him, and sheltered him. Had he been in any other posture he would have been crushed. —STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 148.

4557. PROVIDENCE, Submission to. Socrates. He cites an excellent prayer, from a poet whose name has not come down to us: "Great God, give us, we beseech thee, those good things of which we stand in need, whether we crave them or not; and remove from us all those which may be hurtful to us, even though we implore them of Thee." —ROLLIN'S HIST., vol. 1, Book 9, ch. 4, p. 386.

4558. PROVIDENCE, Trust in. William, Prince of Orange. As the time of striking the great blow drew near, the anxiety of William became intense. From common eyes his feelings were concealed by the icy tranquillity of his demeanor; but his whole heart was open to Bentinck. The preparations were not quite complete. The design was already suspected, and could not long be concealed. The King of France or the city of Amsterdam might still frustrate the whole plan. If Louis were to send a great force into Brabant, if the faction which hated the stadtholder were to raise its head, all was over. "My sufferings, my disquiet," the prince wrote, "are dreadful. I hardly see my way. Never in any life did I so much feel the need of God's guidance." —[See No. 4555.] MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 412.

4559. — — —. Abraham Lincoln. [Farewell address to his neighbors at Springfield, Ill., February 11, 1860. He was soon to be inaugurated over a broken Union.] My Friends: No one not in my position can appreciate the sadness I feel at this parting. To this people I owe all that I am. Here I have lived more than a quarter of a century; here my children were born, and here one of them lies buried. I know not how soon I shall see you again. A duty devolves upon me which is, perhaps, greater than that which has devolved upon any other man since the days of Washington. He never could have succeeded except for the aid of divine Providence, upon which he at all times relied. I feel that I cannot succeed without the same Divine aid which sustained him, and on the same Almighty Being I place my reliance for support, and I hope you, my friends, will all pray that I may receive that Divine assistance, without which I cannot succeed, but with which success is certain. Again I bid you all an affectionate farewell. —RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 5, p. 131.

4560. PROVIDENCE, Vindication of. Persecution. The gardens and circus of Nero on the Vatican, which were polluted with the blood of the first Christians, have been rendered still more famous by the triumph and by the abuse of the persecuted religion. On the same spot, a temple, which far surpasses the ancient glories of the Capitol, has been since erected by the Christian pontiffs, who, deriving their claim of universal dominion from an humble fisherman of Galilee, have succeeded to the throne of the Cæsars, given laws to the barbarian conquerors of Rome, and extended their spiritual jurisdiction from the coast of the Baltic to the shores of the Pacific Ocean. —GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 18.

4561. PROWESS, Military. Roman General Belisarius. At the head of one thousand horse, the Roman general sallied from the Flaminian gate to mark the ground of an advantageous position, and to survey the camp of the barbarians; but while he still believed them on the other side of the Tiber, he was suddenly encompassed and assaulted by their numerous squadrons. The fate of Italy depended on his life; and the deserters pointed to the conspicuous horse, a bay, with a white face, which he rode on that memorable day. "Aim at the bay horse," was the universal cry. Every bow was bent, every javelin was directed against that fatal object, and the command was repeated and obeyed by thousands who were ignorant of its real motive. The bolder barbarians advanced to the more honorable combat of swords and spears; and the praise of an enemy has graced the fall of Visandus, the standard-bearer, who maintained his foremost station, till he was pierced with thirteen wounds, perhaps by the hand of Belisarius himself. The Roman general was strong, active, and dexterous; on every side he discharged his weighty and mortal strokes; his faithful guards imitated his valor, and defended his person; and the Goths, after the loss of a thousand men, fled before the arms of a hero. They were rashly pursued to their camp; and the Romans, oppressed by multitudes, made a gradual, and at length a precipitate retreat to the gates of the city; the gates were shut against the fugitives; and the public terror was increased by the report that Belisarius was slain. His countenance was indeed disfigured by sweat, dust, and blood; his voice was hoarse, his strength was almost exhausted; but his unconquerable spirit still remained; he imparted that spirit to his desponding companions; and their last desperate charge was felt by the flying barbarians, as if a new army, vigorous and entire, had been poured from the city. The Flaminian gate was thrown open to a real triumph. . . . The example of Belisarius may be added to the rare examples of Henry IV., of Pyrrhus, and of Alexander.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 161.

4562. PULPIT, Conservatism of the. *Politics. [In 1626, in the great contests between Parliament and Charles I.,] the pretensions of the crown were advocated from the pulpit, and the disobedient were threatened with more than temporal penalties.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 25, p. 392.

4563. PULPIT controlled. *James II. [In 1686] the king, as the head of the Church, had issued, as directions to the clergy, not to introduce into their pulpits any discussion upon doctrinal points which were matters of controversy.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 26, p. 408.

4564. PUNISHMENT, Capital. *England, A.D. 1763. The game laws, parcelling out among the large proprietors the exclusive right of hunting, . . . were maintained with relentless severity; and to steal or even to hamstring a sheep was as much punished by death as murder or treason. During the reign of George III. sixty-three new capital offences had been added to the criminal laws, and five new ones on the average continued to be discovered annually; so that the code of England, formed under the influence of the rural gentry, seemed written in blood.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 3.

4565. PUNISHMENT deserved. *Titus Oates. [Author of the infamous fiction of the popery plot. See No. 4213.] His offence, though, in a moral light, murder of the most aggravated kind, was, in the eye of the law, merely a misdemeanor. The tribunal, however, was desirous to make his punishment more severe than that of felons or traitors, and not merely to put him to death, but to put him to death by frightful torments. He was sentenced to be stripped of his clerical habit, to be pilloried in Palace Yard, to be led round Westminster Hall with an inscription declaring his infamy over his head, to be pilloried again in front of the Royal Exchange, to be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate, and, after an interval of two days, to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. If, against all probability, he should happen to survive this horrible infliction, he was to be kept a close prisoner during life. Five times every year he was to be brought forth from his dungeon and exposed on the pillory in different parts of the capital. [He barely survived.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 449.

4566. ——. *Mourzouffe. Mourzouffe [a tyrant of Constantinople] was received with smiles and honors in the camp of his father Alexius; but the wicked can never love, and should rarely trust, their fellow-criminals; he was seized in the bath, deprived of his eyes, stripped of his troops and treasures, and turned out to wander an object of horror and contempt to those who with more propriety could hate, and with more justice could punish, the assassin of the emperor Isaac and his son. As the tyrant, pursued by fear or remorse, was stealing over to Asia, he was seized by the Latins of Constantinople, and condemned, after an open trial, to an ignominious death. His judges debated the mode of his execution—the axe, the wheel, or the stake; and it was resolved that Mourzouffe should ascend the Theodosian column, a pillar of white marble of one hundred and forty-seven feet in height. From the summit he was cast down headlong, and dashed in pieces on the pavement, in the presence of innumerable spectators, who filled the forum of Taurus.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 61, p. 103.

4567. PUNISHMENT, Effective. *Prompt. [In 1647 the "Levellers" and "Agitators" were numerous in Cromwell's army. Some of the regiments appear with papers in their hats of "Liberty for England, their rights for the soldiers." General Fairfax commands them to tear them out, and they shout in derision.] Cromwell exclaims, "Take that paper out of your hats." They refuse. He rushes into the ranks, orders fourteen of the mutineers to be seized; a drum-head court-martial is assembled, and three are condemned to death. The council of officers order that they shall draw lots which shall determine the fate of one. The immediate execution of that one restored the army to its wonted discipline.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 6, p. 87.

4568. PUNISHMENT, Excessive. *Edward Floyd. [In 1621 Edward Floyd, a Roman Catholic barrister, expressed his joy that "goodman Palsgrave and goodwife Palsgrave" had been driven from Prague; when it was known] there was no punishment too terrible to be inflicted upon the delinquent—whipping, the pillory, boring of his tongue, nailing of his ears, were small justice for such an offence. The House went beyond its powers in passing a heavy sentence upon Floyd without hearing him. He appealed to the king, denying the accusation against him. . . . The Lords confirmed the sentence, with additional severities. Whipping, which was a part of this sentence, was remitted on the motion of Prince Charles. The unhappy man underwent the other unjust punishment—to pay a fine of £5000, and to be imprisoned for life. “There is surely no instance,” says Mr. Hallam, “in the annals of our own, and hardly any civilized country, where a trifling offence, if it were one, has been visited with such outrageous cruelty.”—KNIGHT’S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 24, p. 381.

4569. PUNISHMENT ineffective, Capital. Hanging. [In 1509 theft was punished by hanging; thieves were often hung twenty together upon one gallows; nevertheless thieves were in every place. A traveller has recorded that people are taken up every day by dozens, like birds in a covey, and especially in London; yet for all this they never cease to rob and murder in the streets.—KNIGHT’S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 253.]

4570. PUNISHMENT of the Innocent. China. There is nothing more barbarous in the prosecution of crimes in China than that custom, borrowed from the Scythians, by which all the relations of a criminal, to the ninth degree, are subjected to the same punishment as the offender himself. The husband suffers for the guilt of his wife, the father for that of his children. Where the father is dead, the eldest son is responsible for all the younger, and each for each.—TYTLER’S HIST., Book 6, ch. 24, p. 347.

4571. — — — Children. The influence of the eunuch Eutropius was unbounded with [Arcadius] his sovereign; but though courted, as we may suppose, like all other ministers, by the parasites of the court, he was deservedly detested by the people. A striking monument of his fears from the popular odium, and the apprehension of undergoing that fate which he merited, appears in that most sanguinary of the Roman statutes, the law of Arcadius and Honorius, for the punishment of those who should conspire the death of the emperor’s ministers. A capital punishment was inflicted on the offender himself; it is declared that his children shall be perpetually infamous, incapable of all inheritance, of all office or employment; that they shall languish in want and misery, so that life itself shall be a punishment to them, and death a consolation.—TYTLER’S HIST., Book 5, ch. 5, p. 14.

4572. PUNISHMENT in Kind. Theseus. [Theseus, the founder of Attica,] put a period to the cruelties of Damastes, surnamed Procrustes, making his body fit the size of his own beds, as he had served strangers. These things he did in imitation of Hercules, who always returned upon the aggressors the same sort of treatment which they intended for him; for that hero sacrificed Busiris, killed Antæus in wrestling, Cygnus in single combat, and broke the skull of Termerus, whence this is called the Termerian mischief; for Termerus, it seems, destroyed the passengers he met, by dashing his head against theirs. Thus Theseus pursued his travels to punish abandoned wretches, who suffered the same kind of death from him that they inflicted on others.—PLUTARCH’S THESEUS.

4573. PUNISHMENT, Parental. Luther. The parents reared their son Martin in the fear of God and in the love of good works. But their discipline was strict and severe, as they themselves endured hard toil in gaining a livelihood. “My father,” relates Luther, “on one occasion flogged me so severely that I ran away, and was embittered against him until he gradually regained my affections. On another occasion my mother, because of a mere nut, whipped me so hard that the blood flowed. Her severe and earnest treatment of me led me to enter a cloister and become a monk. But in their hearts they meant it well with me, and made but one mistake, in that they did not discern the different dispositions according to which all punishments should be administered. For we ought to punish so that the apple go hand in hand with the rod.”—REIN’S LUTHER, ch. 2, p. 19.

4574. PUNISHMENT, Partiality in. Romans. The malefactors who replenish our jails are the outcasts of society, and the crimes for which they suffer may be commonly ascribed to ignorance, poverty, and brutal appetite. For the perpetration of similar enormities, a vile plebeian might claim and abuse the sacred character of a member of the republic; but, on the proof or suspicion of guilt, the slave or the stranger was nailed to a cross; and this strict and summary justice might be exercised without restraint over the greatest part of the populace of Rome.—GIBBON’S ROME, ch. 44, p. 373.

4575. PUNISHMENT, Retaliation in. Visigoths. The Visigoth code provides that for every offence for which there is not a special statutory punishment the pœna talionis should take place. It was a very ample extension of this retaliation, that he who wilfully set fire to a house was burnt himself. If a judge, corrupted by bribery, condemned an innocent man to punishment, he suffered the like punishment himself.—TYTLER’S HIST., Book 5, ch. 7, p. 45.

4576. PUNISHMENT, Rule of. Roman Law. A sin, a vice, a crime, are the objects of theology, ethics, and jurisprudence. Whenever their judgments agree, they corroborate each other; but as often as they differ a prudent legislator appreciates the guilt and punishment according to the measure of social injury. On this principle the most daring attack on the life and property of a private citizen is judged less atrocious than the crime of treason or rebellion which invades the majesty of the republic.—GIBBON’S ROME, ch. 44, p. 377.

4577. PUNISHMENT necessary, Severe. Cromwell. [Cromwell justified the terrible and wholesale slaughter of the royalists at Drogheda and Wexford by stating that it would prevent the effusion of blood in the future. An enlightened and truly pious minister writes of this Irish campaign:] “For nine years a most insane war has been raging. Cromwell, by merciful severity, concludes it in nine months.”—KNIGHT’S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 8, p. 123.

4578. PUNISHMENT, Severity in. Roman Emperor Aurelian. A single instance will serve to display the rigor and even cruelty of Aurelian. One of the soldiers had seduced the wife of his host. The guilty wretch was fastened to two trees forcibly drawn toward each other, and his limbs were torn asunder by their sudden separation. A few such examples impressed a salutary consternation. The punishments of Aurelian were terrible, but he had seldom occasion to punish more than once the same offence.—GIBBON’S ROME, ch. 11, p. 340.

4579. PUNISHMENT, Terrible. By Vipers. [In punishment for sedition, the Romans shut up] one Caius Billius in a cask with vipers and other serpents, and left him to perish in that cruel manner.—PLUTARCH'S TIBERIUS GRACCHUS.

4580. PURGATORY, Compensations in. Mahometan. The good and evil of each Mussulman will be accurately weighed in a real or allegorical balance; and a singular mode of compensation will be allowed for the payment of injuries: the aggressor will refund an equivalent of his own good actions, for the benefit of the person whom he has wronged; and if he should be destitute of any moral property, the weight of his sins will be loaded with an adequate share of the demerits of the sufferer. According as the shares of guilt or virtue shall preponderate, the sentence will be pronounced, and all, without distinction, will pass over the sharp and perilous bridge of the abyss; but the innocent, treading in the footsteps of Mahomet, will gloriously enter the gates of paradise, while the guilty will fall into the first and mildest of the seven hells. The term of expiation will vary from nine hundred to seven thousand years; but the prophet has judiciously promised that all his disciples, whatever may be their sins, shall be saved, by their own faith and his intercession, from eternal damnation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 119.

4581. PURGATORY, Mahometan. Punishment in. In the Mahometan theology al araf signifies the wall of separation between heaven and hell, and corresponds somewhat to the purgatory of the Latin church. Sitting astride of this wall are those whose good and evil deeds so exactly balance each other, that they deserve neither heaven nor hell, and those others who go to war without their parents' consent and fall in battle. These last are martyrs, and are therefore preserved from hell; but inasmuch as they have disobeyed their parents' commands, are not deemed worthy of heaven.—AM. CYCLOPEDIA, "AL ARAF."

4582. PURITAN, Description of. English. The extreme Puritan was at once known from other men by his gait, his garb, his lank hair, the sour solemnity of his face, the upturned white of his eyes, the nasal twang with which he spoke, and, above all, by his peculiar dialect. He employed on every occasion the imagery and style of Scripture. Hebraisms violently introduced into the English language, . . . and applied to the common concerns of English life, were the most striking peculiarities of this cant, which moved, not without cause, the derision both of prelatists and libertines.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 76.

4583. PURITANISM vs. Chivalry. New Englanders. If it had the sectarian crime of intolerance, chivalry had the vices of dissoluteness. The Knights were brave from gallantry of spirit; the Puritans from the fear of God. The Knights were proud of loyalty; the Puritans of liberty. The Knights did homage to monarchs, in whose smile they beheld honor, whose rebuke was the wound of disgrace; the Puritans, disdainful ceremony, would not bow at the name of Jesus, nor bend the knee to the King of kings. Chivalry delighted in outward show, favored pleasure, multiplied amusements, and degraded the human race by an exclusive respect for the privileged classes; Puritanism bridled the passions, commanded the virtues of self-denial, and rescued the name of man from dishonor. The former valued courtesy; the latter justice. The former adorned society by graceful refinements; the latter founded national grandeur on universal education.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

4584. PURITANISM, Peculiarities of. English. The extreme Puritans, therefore, began to feel for the Old Testament a preference which, perhaps, they did not distinctly avow even to themselves, but which showed itself in all their sentiments and habits. They baptized their children by the names, not of Christian saints, but of Hebrew patriarchs and warriors. In defiance of the express and reiterated declarations of Luther and Calvin, they turned the weekly festival by which the Church had, from the primitive times, commemorated the resurrection of her Lord, into a Jewish Sabbath. They sought for principles of jurisprudence in the Mosaic law, and for precedents to guide their ordinary conduct in the books of Judges and Kings. Their thoughts and discourses ran much on acts which were assuredly not recorded as examples for our imitation. The prophet who hewed in pieces a captive king; the rebel general who gave the blood of a queen to the dogs; the matron who, in defiance of plighted faith, and of the laws of Eastern hospitality, drove the nail into the brain of the fugitive ally who had just fed at her board, and who was sleeping under the shadow of her tent, were proposed as models to Christians suffering under the tyranny of princes and prelates.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 74.

4585. PURITANS despised. Peter Cooper. It has been too common to sneer at the Puritans, but says Macaulay, "No man ever did it who had occasion to meet them in the halls of debate, or cross swords with them on the field of battle." If there ever was a man of this type—if there ever was a man who carried a lion-hearted courage and believing soul in his bosom—if there ever was a man who never quailed, or never could quail, in the presence of earthly or infernal powers, that man was Peter Cooper.—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 30.

4586. PURITY, Sentimental. Edward III. [Among men the betrayal of women is now] "held a game;" . . . nowhere was the deterioration of sentiment on this head more strongly typified than in Edward III. himself. The king, who (if the pleasing tale be true which gave rise to some beautiful scenes in an old English drama) had in his early days royally renounced an unlawful passion for the fair Countess of Salisbury, came to be accused of at once violating his conjugal duty and neglecting his military glory for the sake of strange women's charms. The founder of the Order of the Garter—the device of which enjoined purity even of thought as a principle of conduct—died in the hands of a rapacious courtesan.—WARD'S CHAUCER, ch. 1.

4587. QUACKERY, Experiment in. Cato. [He advised his son to beware of all physicians.] He added that he himself had written a little treatise, in which he had set down his method of cure, and the regimen he prescribed when any of his family fell sick; that he never recommended fasting, but allowed them herbs, with duck, pigeon, or hare, such kind of diet being light and suitable for sick people, having no other inconvenience but its making them dream; and that with these remedies and this regimen he preserved himself and his family. But his self-sufficiency in this respect went not unpunished, for he lost both his wife and son.—PLUTARCH'S CATO.

4588. QUACKERY, Superstitious. King's Touch. [Edward the Confessor] was a healer of the sick and a restorer to sight of the blind. It was he who first used "the healing benediction," which he left to the "succeeding royalty," so that even the pious Charles II. "touched" eight thousand five hundred of his afflicted subjects in one year, and one hundred thousand in the course of his reign.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 12, p. 164.

4589. QUALIFICATION, Deficient. Philip. Demosthenes was perfectly acquainted with the disposition of Philip, and was very far from praising him, like the generality of orators. Two colleagues, with whom he had been associated in an embassy to that great prince, were continually praising the King of Macedonia at their return, and saying that he was a very eloquent and handsome prince, and a most extraordinary drinker. "What strange commendations are these!" replied Demosthenes. "The first is the accomplishment of a rhetorician; the second of a woman; and the third of a sponge; but none of them the qualification of a king."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 16, § 2.

4590. QUALITY more than Quantity. War. Hannibal having ordered his troops to arm, himself, with a few others, rode up to an eminence, to take a view of the enemy now drawn up for battle. One Gisco that accompanied him, a man of his own rank, happening to say the numbers of the enemy appeared to him surprising, Hannibal replied, with a serious countenance: "There is another thing which has escaped your observation, much more surprising than that." Upon his asking what it was: "It is," said he, "that among such numbers not one of them is named Gisco." [He defeated the Romans with terrible carnage.]—PLUTARCH'S FABIVS MAXIMUS.

4591. — —. Soldiers. [Oliver Cromwell expressed his opinion concerning the importance of good quality in soldiers.] A few honest men are better than numbers. . . . I had rather have a plain, russet-coated captain, who knows what he fights for, and loves what he knows, than that which you call "a gentleman," and is nothing else. I honor a gentleman that is so indeed. [He insisted that his soldiers should be religious men, but left the particular form to their own choice.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 2, p. 29.

4592. QUALITY, Tested by. Swords. [The Romans were compelled to pay tribute to the Mahometans.] When the unnatural mother of Constantine was deposed and banished, her successor, Nicephorus, resolved to obliterate this badge of servitude and disgrace. The epistle of the emperor to the caliph was pointed with an allusion to the game of chess, which had already spread from Persia to Greece. "The queen (he spoke of Irene) considered you as a rook, and herself as a pawn. That pusillanimous female submitted to pay a tribute, the double of which she ought to have exacted from the barbarians. Restore therefore the fruits of your injustice, or abide the determination of the sword." At these words the ambassadors cast a bundle of swords before the foot of the throne. The caliph smiled at the menace, and drawing his cimeter, samsamah, a weapon of historic or fabulous renown, he cut asunder the feeble arms of the Greeks, without turning the edge or endangering the temper of his blade. He then dictated an epistle of tremendous brevity: "In the name of the most merciful God, Harun al Rashid, commander of the faithful, to Nicephorus, the Roman dog. I have read thy letter, O thou son of an unbelieving mother. Thou shalt not hear, thou shalt behold, my reply." It was written in characters of blood and fire on the plains of Phrygia; and the warlike celerity of the Arabs could only be checked by the arts of deceit and the show of repentance.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 52, p. 309.

4593. QUARREL, Conjugal. Benjamin Thompson. [He is better known as Rumford, the Yankee count, who became distinguished for his efforts in behalf of the poor.] He contracted an unfortunate marriage with a brilliant wealthy French widow, which embittered his closing years. She was wholly a woman of the drawing-room. He was an inventor, a philosopher, and a lover of order even to fanaticism. An infuriate "incompatibility" was rapidly developed. One of their quarrels he has himself recorded: "A large party had been invited I neither liked nor approved of, and invited for the sole purpose of vexing me. Our house (near Paris) was in the centre of the garden, walled around, with iron gates. I put on my hat, walked down to the porter's lodge, and gave him orders, on his peril, not to let any one in. Besides, I took away the keys. Madame went down, and when the company arrived she talked with them—she on one side, they on the other, of the high brick wall. After that she goes and pours boiling water on some of my beautiful flowers."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 650.

4594. QUARREL, Degraded. Milton's. Poets and artists, more susceptible than practical men, seem to live a life of perpetual wrangle. . . . Ben Jonson, Dryden, Pope, Voltaire, Rousseau, belabor their enemies, and we see nothing incongruous in their doing so. It is not so when the awful majesty of Milton descends from the empyrean throne of contemplation to use the language of the gutter or the fish market. The pathos is unthinkable. The universal intellect of Bacon shrank to the paltry pursuit of place. The disproportion between the intellectual capaciousness and the moral aim jars upon the sense of fitness, and the name of Bacon, wisest, meanest, has passed into a proverb. Milton's fall is far worse. It is not here a union of grasp of mind with an ignoble ambition, but the plunge of the moral nature itself from the highest heights to that despicable region of vulgar scurrility and libel which is below the level of average gentility and education. The name of Milton is a synonym for sublimity. He has endowed our language with the loftiest and noblest poetry it possesses, and the same man is found employing speech for the most unworthy purpose to which it can be put, that of defaming and vilifying a personal enemy, and an enemy so mean that barely to have been mentioned by Milton had been an honor to him. [He defamed Morus, a pamphleteer.] —MILTON, BY M. PATTISON, ch. 10.

4595. QUARREL, A needless. Duel. [Between Commodores Decatur and Barron.] The word being given, they fired so exactly together that it sounded like the report of one pistol. Barron fell, badly wounded. Decatur was about to fall, but was caught, and staggered forward a few steps, and sank down close to Barron; and, as they lay on the ground, both expecting to die, they conversed together as follows, as near as could be collected: "Let us," said Barron, "make friends before we meet in heaven. Everything has been conducted in the most honorable manner, and I forgive you from the bottom of my heart." "I have never been your enemy," Decatur replied, "and I freely forgive you my death, though I cannot forgive those who stimulated you to seek my life." "Would to God," said Barron, "that you had said as much yesterday!" According to one witness, Decatur added: "God bless you, Barron." To which Barron replied, "God bless you, Decatur." [Decatur died and Barron survived.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 93.

4596. QUARREL provoked. Samuel Johnson. When my mother lived in London, there were two sets of people, those who gave the wall, and those who took it—the peaceable and the quarrelsome. When I returned to Lichfield, after having been in London, my mother asked me whether I was one of those who gave the wall, or those who took it. Now, it is fixed that every man keeps to the right; or, if one is taking the wall, another yields it; and it is never a dispute.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 25.

4597. QUARREL, Shameful. Frederick the Great. [Voltaire was greedy. Frederick was parsimonious. Voltaire was his chosen friend and guest.] It is humiliating to relate that the great warrior and statesman gave orders that his guest's allowance of sugar and chocolate should be curtailed. It is, if possible, a still more humiliating fact that Voltaire indemnified himself by pocketing the wax candles in the royal antechamber.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT.

4598. QUESTIONS, Test. Alexander's. In the course of [one of his Persian] expeditions he took ten of the Gymnosophists, who had been principally concerned in instigating Sabbas to revolt. . . . As these ten were reckoned the most acute and concise in their answers, he put the most difficult questions to them that could be thought of, and at the same time declared he would put the first person that answered wrong to death, and after him all the rest. The oldest man among them was to be the judge. He demanded of the first which were most numerous, the living or the dead. He answered, "The living, for the dead no longer exist." The second was asked whether the earth or the sea produced the largest animals. He answered, "The earth, for the sea is part of it." The third, which is the craftiest of all animals. "That," said he, "with which man is not yet acquainted." The fourth, what was his reason for persuading Sabbas to revolt. "Because," said he, "I wished him either to live with honor or to die as a coward deserves." The fifth had this question put to him, "Which do you think oldest, the day or the night?" He answered, "The day, by one day." As the king appeared surprised at this solution, the philosopher told him abstruse questions must have abstruse answers. Then addressing himself to the sixth, he demanded, "What are the best means for a man to make himself loved?" He answered, "If possessed of great power, do not make yourself feared." The seventh was asked how a man might become a god. He answered, "By doing what is impossible for man to do." The eighth, "Which is strongest, life or death?" "Life," said he, "because it bears so many evils." The last question that he put was, "How long is it good for a man to live?" "As long," said the philosopher, "as he does not prefer death to life." Then turning to the judge, he ordered him to give sentence. The old man said, "In my opinion they have all answered one worse than another." "If this is thy judgment," said Alexander, "thou shalt die first." "No," replied the philosopher, "not except you choose to break your word; for you declared the man that answered worst should first suffer."—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

4599. QUESTION, Unanswered. Simonides. The answer he gave a prince who asked him what God was is much celebrated. That prince was Hiero, King of Syracuse. The poet desired a day to consider the question proposed to him. On the morrow he asked two days; and whenever he was called upon for his answer, he still doubled the time. The king, surprised at this behavior, demanded his reason for it. "It is," replied Simonides, "because the more I consider the question, the more obscure it seems, Quia quanto divitiis considero, tanto mihi res videtur obscurior."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 5, art. 9.

4600. RACE, Antipathy of. Reign of James II. [Roman Catholic troops from Ireland were brought into England to aid the king in the overthrow of the Protestant faith.] Neither [English] officers nor soldiers were disposed to bear patiently the preference shown by their master to a foreign and a subject race. The Duke of Berwick, who was colonel of the Eighth Regiment of the Line, then quartered at Portsmouth, gave orders that thirty men, just arrived from Ireland, should be enlisted. The English soldiers declared that they would not serve with these intruders. John Beaumont, the lieutenant-colonel, in his own name and in the name of five of the captains, protested to the duke's face against this insult to the English army and nation. "We raised the regiment," he said, "at our own charges, to defend his Majesty's crown in time of danger. We had then no difficulty in procuring hundreds of English recruits. We can easily keep every company full without admitting Irishmen. We therefore do not think it consistent with our honor to have these strangers forced on us; and we beg that we may either be permitted to command men of our own nation, or to lay down our commissions." Berwick sent to Windsor for directions. The king, greatly exasperated, instantly despatched a troop of horse to Portsmouth with orders to bring the six refractory officers before him. They refused to make any submission, and they were sentenced to be cashiered, the highest punishment that a court-martial was then competent to inflict. The whole nation applauded the disgraced officers.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 397.

4601. RACE, Dislike of. Samuel Johnson. [He was fond of ridiculing Scotchmen.] He would not allow Scotland to derive any credit from Lord Mansfield, for he was educated in England. "Much," said he, "may be made of a Scotchman, if he be caught young."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 198.

4602. RACE for Life, A. Prisoner. [After the battle of Sedgemoor, between the rebel Duke of Monmouth and James II.] Feversham [James' commander] passed for a good-natured man; but he was a foreigner, ignorant of the laws, and careless of the feelings of the English. He was accustomed to the military license of France. . . . A considerable number of prisoners were immediately selected for execution. Among them was a youth famous for his speed. Hopes were held out to him that his life would be spared if he could run a race with one of the colts of the marsh. The space through which the man kept up with the horse is still marked by well-known bounds in the moor, and is about three quarters of a mile. Feversham was not ashamed, after seeing the performance, to send the wretched performer to the gallows.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 596.

4603. RACE, Pride in. Samuel Johnson. [He had undertaken to complete his dictionary in three years.] ADAMS: "But, sir, how can you do this in three years?" JOHNSON: "Sir, I have no doubt that I can do it in three years." ADAMS: "But the French Academy, which consists of forty members, took forty years to compile their dictionary." JOHNSON: "Sir, thus it is. This is the proportion. Let me see; forty times forty is sixteen hundred. As three to sixteen hundred, so is the proportion of an Englishman to a Frenchman."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 47.

4604. RACE ridiculed. Samuel Johnson. Mr. Arthur Lee mentioned some Scotch who had taken possession of a barren part of America, and wondered why they should choose it. JOHNSON: "Why, sir, all barrenness is comparative. The Scotch would not know it to be barren." BOSWELL: "Come, come, he is flattering the English. You have now been in Scotland, sir, and say if you did not see meat and drink enough there." JOHNSON: "Why yes, sir; meat and drink enough to give the inhabitants sufficient strength to run away from home." All these quick and lively sallies were said sportively, quite in jest.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 311.

4605. RACES, Amalgamation of. Great Britain. Early in the fourteenth century the amalgamation of the races was all but complete; and it was soon made manifest by signs not to be mistaken, that a people inferior to none existing in the world had been formed by the mixture of three branches of the great Teutonic family with each other and with the aboriginal Britons. There was indeed scarcely anything in common between the England to which John had been chased by Philip Augustus and the England from which the armies of Edward III. went forth to conquer France.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 17.

4606. RACES, Inequality of. Celts—Saxons. There could not be equality between men who lived in houses and men who lived in sties, between men who were fed on bread and men who were fed on potatoes, between men who spoke the noble tongue of great philosophers and poets and men who, with a perverted pride, boasted that they could not writhe their mouths into chattering such a jargon as that in which the "Advancement of Learning" and the "Paradise Lost" were written.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 125.

4607. RAID, Successful. General Stoneman. While these great and decisive events were taking place in the Carolinas, the famous cavalry raid of General Stoneman was in progress. About the middle of March he set out from Knoxville with a force of six thousand men, crossed the mountains, captured Wilkesboro, and forced his way across the Yadkin at Janesville, . . . the general object being the destruction of public property, the capture of Confederate stores, and the tearing up of railroads. Turning to the north, the troopers traversed the western end of North Carolina, and entered Carroll County, Virginia. At Wytheville the railroad was torn up, and then the whole line was destroyed from the bridge over New River to within four miles of Lynchburg. Christiansburg was captured, and the track of the railway obliterated for ninety miles. Turning first to Jacksonville and then southward, the expedition next struck and destroyed the North Carolina Railroad between Danville and Greensboro. . . . After a fight with Ferguson's Confederate cavalry, the Federals turned back to Dallas, where all the divisions were concentrated, and the raid was at an end. During the progress of the expedition six thousand prisoners, forty-six pieces of artillery, and immense quantities of small arms had fallen into the hands of Stoneman's men; the amount of property destroyed and the damage otherwise done to the tottering Confederacy could not be estimated.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 66, p. 530.

4608. RAILWAY, The first. In England. On the 15th of September [1825] the first railway for the conveyance of passengers was opened, the carriages being drawn by a locomotive engine, at the speed of a race-horse.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 14, p. 258.

4609. RAILWAYS, Slow. Slower than Canals. [In 1825 it was stated in the House of Commons that] the experiment of conveying goods on a railway had been tried, and had completely failed. The best locomotive engine that could be found had been selected; and the average rate on a plane surface was not three miles and three quarters per hour, which was slower than canal conveyance.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 14, p. 258.

4610. RAILWAYS underestimated. England. [Before a committee of the House of Commons] Telford and others expressed an opinion that with the improvement of the locomotive the speed upon a railway might be fifteen miles, and even twenty miles an hour. These opinions were called "the gross exaggerations of the powers of the locomotive steam-engine;" and it was contended that even if such a speed could be attained, the dangers of bursting boilers and broken wheels would be so great that we should as soon expect that "people would as soon suffer themselves to be fired off upon one of Congreve's ricochet rockets as to trust themselves to the mercy of such a machine going at such a rate." . . . "As to those persons who speculate on making railways general throughout the kingdom, and superseding all the canals, all the wagons, mail and stage-coaches, post-chaises, and, in short, every other mode of conveyance by land and by water, we deem them and their visionary schemes unworthy of notice."—[Taken from the Quarterly Review in] KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 14, p. 259.

4611. RAIMENT restricted. By Zaleucus. [The Locrian lawgiver.] To banish luxury from his republic, which he looked upon as the certain destruction of a government, he did not follow the practice established in some nations, where it is thought sufficient, for the restraining it, to punish, by pecuniary mulcts, such as infringe the laws; but he acted . . . in a more artful and ingenious, and at the same time more effectual, manner. He prohibited women from wearing rich and costly stuffs, embroidered robes, jewels, ear-rings, necklaces, bracelets, gold rings, and such like ornaments, excepting none from this law but common prostitutes. He enacted a similar law with regard to the men, excepting in the same manner, from the observance of it, such only as were willing to pass for debauchees and infamous wretches.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 7, ch. 2, § 2.

4612. RANK, Plea for. Samuel Johnson. I mentioned a certain author who disgusted me . . . by showing no deference to noblemen into whose company he was admitted. JOHNSON: "Suppose a shoemaker should claim an equality with him, as he does with a lord; how he would stare! 'Why, sir, do you stare?' says the shoemaker; 'I do great service to society.' 'Tis true, I am paid for doing it; but so are you, sir; and I am sorry to say it, better paid than I am, for doing something not so necessary. For mankind could do better without your books than without my shoes.' Thus, sir, there would be a perpetual struggle for precedence, were there no fixed invariable rules for the distinction of rank, which creates no jealousy, as it is allowed to be accidental."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 124.

4613. RANSOM, Paternal. Reign of James II. Sir John Cochrane had held among the Scotch rebels the same rank which had been held by Grey in the west of England. That Cochrane should be forgiven by a prince vindictive beyond all example seemed incredible; but Cochrane was the younger son of a rich family; it was therefore only by sparing him that money could be made out of him. His father, Lord Dundonald, offered a bribe of £5000 to the priests of the royal household, and a pardon was granted.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 608.

4614. RANSOM, A willing. Richard Cœur de Lion. [After the failure of the crusade, near Jerusalem.] Richard [I.] now thought of returning to his dominions, but, unwilling to put himself in the power of his rival, Philip [II.], by traversing the kingdom of France, he sailed with a single ship to Italy, and was wrecked near Aquileia. Thence, . . . putting on a pilgrim's disguise, he resolved to make his way, on foot, through Germany. He was discovered, however, at Vienna, by Leopold, Duke of Austria, and thrown into prison by the command of the emperor, Henry VI. No sooner was Richard's situation known to his subjects, than they vied with each other in contributions for his ransom, which was fixed at an exorbitant sum by the emperor, and opposed with every artifice of the meanest policy by the king of France. His brother John, likewise, who in his absence had endeavored to usurp the government of England, is said to have had a conference with Philip, in which the perpetual captivity of Richard was agreed upon, while he himself was to be secured upon the English throne. These cabals, however, were unsuccessful. Richard obtained his liberty on payment of a ransom equal to about £300,000 sterling, which his subjects levied by the cheerful contributions of all ranks of the State. On his return to his dominions he was received with the utmost transports of delight and satisfaction. Richard had given his subjects no real cause of affection toward him; during a reign of ten years he was but four months in the kingdom; but it is the disposition of the English to revere heroism and to commiserate misfortune. His traitorous brother, after some submission, was received into favor.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 8, p. 145.

4615. RAPACITY, Royal. Henry III. He sent forth inquisitors of the forests, who not only ruined all those who had encroached upon the forest borders, but also impoverished many, even those of noble birth, "for a single small beast, a fawn or hare, although straying in an out-of-the-way place." The Jews, according to the custom of the age, were lawful plunder, and Henry, as regarded them, did not depart from the pious usage of his father. But he did more than any of his predecessors in the spoil of the Israelites. He sold them as he would a farm to his brother Richard.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 24, p. 363.

4616. RAPE attempted. Joan of Arc. [Soon to be burned by the British.] The unfortunate prisoner, despoiled of her man's dress, had much to fear. Brutality, furious hatred, vengeance, might severally incite the cowards to degrade her before she perished, to sully what they were about to burn. . . . Besides, they might be tempted to varnish their infamy by a reason of state, according to the notions of the day—by depriving her of her virginity, they would undoubtedly destroy that secret power of which the English entertained such great dread, who, perhaps, might recover their courage when they knew that, after all, she was but a woman. According to her confessor, to whom she divulged the fact, an Englishman, not a common soldier, but a gentleman, a lord, patriotically devoted himself to this execution, bravely undertook to violate a girl laden with fetters, and, being unable to effect his wishes, rained blows upon her.—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 53.

4617. REACTION from Excess. Guises. [Twelve hundred Protestants had been butchered at Amboise.] The atrocious cruelties perpetrated by the Guises in their hour of triumph produced a speedy reaction in favor of the persecuted sectaries. The nation regarded the massacre with disgust; and the Calvinists, instead of being intimidated and crushed, continued to gain ground, and loudly demanded vengeance for the blood of their martyred brethren.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 16, § 3.

4618. REACTION, Moral. Restoration of Charles II. The Restoration was a moral catastrophe. It was not that there wanted good men among the churchmen—men as pious and virtuous as the Puritans whom they displaced; but the Royalists came back as the party of reaction—reaction of the spirit of the world against asceticism, of self-indulgence against duty, of materialism against idealism. For a time virtue was a public laughing-stock, and the word "saint," the highest expression in the language for moral perfection, connoted everything that was ridiculous. I do not speak of the gallantries of Whitehall. . . . The style of court manners was a mere incident on the surface of social life. The national life was far more profoundly tainted by the discouragement of all good men, which penetrated every shire and every parish, than by the distant reports of the loose behavior of Charles II. Servility, meanness, venality, time-serving, and a disbelief in virtue diffused themselves over the nation like a pestilential miasma, the depressing influence of which was heavy, even upon those souls which individually resisted the poison. The heroic age of England had passed away, not by gradual decay, by imperceptible degeneration, but in a year, in a single day, like the winter's snow in Greece.—PATTISON'S MILTON, ch. 12.

4619. ———. Reign of Charles II. The theatres were closed [by the Puritans]. The players were flogged. The press was put under the guardianship of austere licensors. The Muses were banished from their favorite haunts. . . . The Restoration emancipated thousands of minds from a yoke which had become insupportable. The old fight recommenced, but with an animosity altogether new. . . . The war between wit and Puritanism soon became a war between wit and morality. The hostility excited by a grotesque caricature of virtue did not spare virtue herself.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 371.

4620. READING, Effects of. Abraham Lincoln. [The books read by the youthful Lincoln were Ramsay's Life of Washington, Weems' Life of Washington, Æsop's Fables, and Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. It is quite probable that the quaint phraseology of these last two volumes, and their direct and forcible illustrations, may have impressed upon the productions of Mr. Lincoln's pen that style which is one of their most peculiar and favorite characteristics.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 1, p. 22.

4621. READING-ROOMS necessary. Napoleon I. He had, when a young man, passed months in Paris without a home, with an empty purse, and almost without a friend. He was then in the habit of visiting a small reading-room in the Palais Royal, where for a few sous he could, in the chilly days of winter, read the daily journals, and enjoy the warmth of a fire. . . . [He became First Consul.] He was afterward urged, as a matter of State policy, to shut up these reading-rooms.

To this he replied: "No; I will never do that; I know too well the comfort of having such a place to go to ever to deprive others of the same resource."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 16.

4622. REALITY, Power in. Cromwell. It is something striking to contrast the two men going down to the same House. Charles was a king, and he went to arrest the members and to assert that there was no law in England save his will; but he went as king Nominal. Cromwell went with no royalty about him, yet he went as king Real; and he, too, went for the still more amazing purpose of daring that whole House, and turning it out into the streets. [By dissolving Parliament at the head of his soldiers.]—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 177.

4623. REALIZATION, Joys of. Columbus. The land was now clearly seen about two leagues distant, whereupon they took in sail and lay to, waiting impatiently for the dawn. The thoughts and feelings of Columbus in this little space of time must have been tumultuous and intense. At length, in spite of every difficulty and danger, he had accomplished his object. The great mystery of the ocean was revealed; his theory, which had been the scoff of sages; was triumphantly established; he had secured to himself a glory durable as the world itself. It is difficult to conceive the feelings of such a man, at such a moment; or the conjectures which must have thronged upon his mind, as to the land before him, covered with darkness.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 3, ch. 4.

4624. REASON, Worship of. French Revolution. During the revolution a beautiful opera girl of licentious habits was conveyed, in most imposing ceremonial, to the church of Notre Dame. There she was elevated upon an altar, and presented to the thronged assemblage as the Goddess of Reason. "Mortals," said Chauvette, "cease to tremble before the powerless thunders of a god whom your fears have created! There is no God. Henceforth worship none but Reason. Here I offer you its noblest and purest image, Worship only such divinities as this." The whole assemblage bowed in adoration, and then retired to indulge in scenes which the pen refuses to record.—[Foot-note in] ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 16.

4625. REBELLION, Constructive. Emperor Maximilian. Maximilian, after the death of his father, was elected emperor in the year 1493. This prince, who was an able politician, laid the foundation of the permanent greatness of the German empire, by procuring the enactment of that celebrated constitutional law, which establishes a perpetual peace between the whole of the States composing the Germanic body, which States, before that time, had been at constant variance upon every trivial opposition of interests. Thenceforth every such contest was to be treated as an act of rebellion against the empire. It is easy to see of what vast importance this law was to the solid interests of the Germanic body.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 19, p. 276.

4626. REBELLION prevented. Scotland. The Earl of Douglas, an ambitious and high-spirited nobleman, had openly aimed at rendering himself independent of his sovereign: he forbade his vassals to acknowledge any authority but his own. He created knights, appointed a privy council, and, in short, assumed every ensign of royalty except the title of king. The chancellor, determined to suppress these aspiring pretensions, decoyed Douglas to an interview in the castle of Edinburgh, and there, while separated from his followers, he was seized and instantly beheaded. This example of barbarous rigor did not deter his successor, William, Earl of Douglas, from prosecuting the same ambitious plans; and his fate was equally severe, and yet more unjustifiable. In a conference with the young monarch he was reproached by him with forming connections with the factious nobility which were dangerous to the public peace and government of the kingdom; the king requesting him to dissolve these associations, Douglas peremptorily refused. "If you will not," said the young James [II.], "this shall;" and drawing his dagger, he instantly stabbed him to the heart. This action, unworthy of a prince, was universally condemned by his subjects.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 15, p. 234.

4627. REBELLION, Small. Rhode Island. A proposition was made to change the constitution of the State, [under which] the right of suffrage was restricted to those who held a certain amount of property. On that issue the people of Rhode Island were nearly unanimous; but in respect to the manner of abrogating the old charter there was a serious division. One faction, called the "Law and Order party," proceeding in accordance with the former constitution, chose Samuel W. King as governor. The other faction, called the "Suffrage party," acting in an irregular way, elected Thomas W. Dorr. In May of 1842 both parties met and organized their rival governments. The "Law and Order party" now undertook to suppress the faction of Dorr. The latter resisted, and made an attempt to capture the State arsenal. But the militia, under the direction of King's officers, drove the assailants away. A month later the adherents of Dorr again appeared in arms, but were dispersed by the troops of the United States; Dorr fled from Rhode Island; returned soon afterward; was caught, tried for treason, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment for life. He was then offered pardon on condition of taking an oath of allegiance. This he stubbornly refused to do, and in June of 1845 obtained his liberty without conditions.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 56, p. 442.

4628. REBELLION, A Soap. Reign of Charles I. Charles was determined to govern by prerogative, and not by Parliament. He sold privileges for every unjust exaction. A patent for the manufacture of soap was sold—a very sad affliction indeed, for in addition to the costly price from the existence of the monopoly, for which £10,000 had been paid, the linen had been burned, and the flesh as well, in the washing, so that the city of London was visited by an insurrection of women, and the Lord Mayor was reprimanded by the king because he gave them his sympathy.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 4, p. 84.

4629. REBELLION, The Whiskey. Pennsylvania. During the summer and autumn of 1794 the country was much disturbed by a difficulty in western Pennsylvania, known as the whiskey insurrection. Hoping to improve the revenues of the government, Congress had, three years previously, imposed a tax on all ardent spirits distilled in the United States. While [citizen] Genet [from France] was at Philadelphia, he and his partisans incited the people of the distilling regions to resist the tax-collectors. The disaffected rose in arms. Washington issued two proclamations warning the insurgents to disperse; but instead of obeying, they fired upon and captured the officers of the government. The President then ordered General Henry Lee to enter the rebellious district with a sufficient force to restore order and enforce the law. When the troops reached the scene of the disturbance, the rioters had already scattered. The insurrection was a political rather than a social outbreak; the anti-Federalists were in a majority in the distilling region, and the whiskey-tax was a measure of the Federal party.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 46, p. 368.

4630. REBELS punished. Duke of Monmouth's. Somersetshire, the chief seat of the rebellion, had been reserved for the last and most fearful vengeance. In this county two hundred and thirty-three prisoners were in a few days hanged, drawn, and quartered. At every spot where two roads met, on every market-place, on the green of every large village which had furnished Monmouth with soldiers, ironed corpses clattering in the wind, or heads and quarters stuck on poles, poisoned the air, and made the traveller sick with horror. In many parishes the peasantry could not assemble in the house of God without seeing the ghastly face of a neighbor grinning at them over the porch.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 596.

4631. ———. Temugin the Tartar. Temugin fought a battle against his rebellious subjects. . . . After his first victory he placed seventy caldrons on the fire, and seventy of the most guilty rebels were cast headlong into the boiling water.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 64, p. 204.

4632. REBUKE, Gentle. Julius Cæsar. In battle he sometimes rode; but he was more often on foot, bareheaded, and in a conspicuous dress, that he might be seen and recognized. Again and again by his own efforts he recovered a day that was half lost. He once seized a panic-stricken standard-bearer, turned him round, and told him that he had mistaken the direction of the enemy.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 28.

4633. RECANTATION impossible. Martin Luther. "The more they rage and meditate upon the use of force, the less do I fear, and the more freely will I attack the Roman serpents. I am prepared for the worst that may happen, and await the counsel of God." "This I know, indeed; that I would be treated as the dearest and most agreeable person, did I but speak one word, revoca—that is, I recall. But I will not make myself a heretic by the recall of that opinion by which I became a Christian. I would rather die, be burnt, exiled, and accursed."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 5, p. 58.

4634. RECOGNITION required. Washington. The whole British force, now gathered in the vicinity of New York, amounted to fully 30,000 men. . . . Washington's army was inferior in numbers, poorly equipped, and imperfectly disciplined. [Admiral Howe, brother of General

Howe, had arrived from England with instructions] to try conciliatory measures with the Americans. First he sent to the American camp an officer with a despatch directed to George Washington, Esquire. Of course Washington refused to receive a communication which did not recognize his official position. In a short time Howe sent another message, addressed to George Washington, etc., etc., etc., and the bearer, who was Howe's adjutant-general, insisted that and-so-forth might be translated General of the American Army. Washington was the last man in the world to be caught by a subterfuge; and the adjutant was sent away. It was already well known that Howe's authority extended only to granting pardon and to unessential matters about which the Americans were no longer concerned. Washington therefore replied that since no offence had been committed no pardon was required; that the colonies were now independent, and would defend themselves against all aggressions.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 39, p. 310.

4635. RECOMPENSE, Honorable. Abraham Lincoln. [When a boy he borrowed a Life of Washington.] During a severe storm he improved his leisure by reading his book. One night he laid it down carefully, as he thought, and the next morning he found it soaked through! The wind had changed, the storm had beaten in through a crack in the logs, and the appearance of the book was ruined. How could he face the owner under such circumstances? He had no money to offer as a return, but he took the book, went directly to Mr. Crawford [the owner], showed him the irreparable injury, and frankly and honestly offered to work for him till he should be satisfied. [Mr. Crawford gave him the book] in return for three days' steady labor in "pulling fodder."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 1, p. 22.

4636. RECORD, Mutilated. James I. It was through Sir John Eliot, very eminently, that the Commons and the Stuarts came at last to their great rupture. . . . Then came the contest with the stubborn old king upon the privilege of debate in Parliament. The king said the Parliament held their liberties by toleration, not by right; and when the House recorded its very different conviction in a resolution on its journals, the imbecile old king came up from Theobald's in a passion, got together a privy council and six of the judges, sent for the Commons' journal, and even dared to tear out the registry. He then instantly dissolved the House by proclamation.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 3, p. 54.

4637. RECREATION, Excessive. "Gentlemen." Sir John Harrington . . . draws a picture . . . that illustrates the prevailing madness. [About A.D. 1600.] "In the morning perhaps at chess, and after his belly is full then at cards; and when his spirits wax dull at that, then for some exercise of his arms at dice; and being weary thereof, to cool himself a little play at tables [backgammon]; and, being disquieted in his patience for overseeing cinque and quartre, or missing two or three foul blots, then to an interlude; and so . . . be ever as far from a worthy and wise man as the circle is from the centre."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 256.

4638. RECREATION, Extravagant. Bajazet I. The French princes admired the magnificence of the Ottoman, whose hunting and hawking equipage was composed of seven thousand huntsmen and seven thousand falconers.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 64, p. 241.

4639. REDEMPTION, Price of. Calais. [In 1347, during a siege of nearly twelve months' duration, in which the garrison had eaten their horses and dogs. They were then willing to surrender town, castle, and goods, if the people were permitted to depart from the city.] The king [Edward III.] resolved that all the grace he would award was, that six chief burgesses of the town should come out bareheaded, and barefooted, and barelegged, and in their shirts, with halters about their necks, and with the keys of the town and castle in their hands, and thus yield themselves purely to his will, and the rest he would take to mercy. . . . Sir John of Vienne sounded the common bell, and told his sad report, and the people wept, and he himself wept piteously. Then stood forth the richest burgess of all the town, Eustace de St. Pierre, and said that, to save the residue of the people, he would be the first to put his life in jeopardy. When he had thus spoken, every man worshipped him, and divers kneeled down at his feet with sore weeping. Then another honest burgess, John Dayre, rose and said, "I will keep company with my gossip, Eustace." And James of Wyssant, and Peter his brother, and two others, declared the same. Then they went out of the gate, apparelled as the king desired, and stood between the gate and the barriers. . . . The six burgesses knelt before the king, and held up their hands and said, "We submit ourselves clearly unto your will and pleasure, to save the residue of the people of Calais." . . . The earls and barons, and others who were there, wept for pity, but the king looked felly upon them, . . . and he commanded their heads to be struck off, and would hear no man in their behalf for mercy. Then the queen [Philippa], being great with child, kneeled down and said, "Gentle Sir, since I passed the sea in much peril, I have desired nothing of you; therefore, I now require of you, in the honor of the Son of the Virgin Mary, and for the love of me, that you will take mercy of these six burgesses." The king beheld the queen, and stood still awhile in a study, and then said, "Ah, dame, I would you had been now in some other place; but I cannot deny you. I give these men to you to do your pleasure with them." And the six burgesses were brought into the queen's chamber, newly clothed; and she gave them to eat at their leisure, and bestowed upon each six nobles, and caused them to be taken through the host in safety, and set at liberty.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 80, p. 465.

Such was certainly the natural character of the Athenians—generous, decent, humane, and polished.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 10, p. 107.

4641. REFINEMENT, Misjudged. American Indians. The inhabitants of this immense continent—if we except those of Mexico and Peru, which were comparatively refined and luxurious nations—were tribes of wandering savages, and utterly unacquainted with almost every art of civilized life. They were naked, except a small covering round the middle; their sole occupation was the chase, and when the season of hunting was at an end, the American, if not engaged in war, spent his time in perfect indolence; half the day was consumed in sleep, and the other half in immoderate eating and drinking. The Indians of America were in their disposition grave even to sadness; they held in contempt the levity of manners of the Europeans, and, observing great taciturnity themselves, imputed to childishness all idle talk or conversation. Their behavior was modest and respectful, and in their solemn councils their deliberations were carried on with the greatest order and decorum.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 21, p. 306.

4642. REFINEMENT recommended. Bridal. [Lord Malmesbury was sent by George III., in 1795, to the Duke of Brunswick, to demand his daughter for the Prince of Wales, the heir apparent to the British throne.] The sagacious ambassador did his duty in offering her advice, and sometimes remonstrance, especially "on the toilette, on cleanliness, and on delicacy of speaking"—strange subjects of discussion with a lady who might be queen of England.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 18, p. 319.

4643. REFLECTION, Corrected by. Samuel Johnson. Mr. Morgann and he had a dispute pretty late at night, in which Johnson would not give up, though he had the wrong side; and, in short, both kept the field. Next morning, when they met in the breakfast room, Dr. Johnson accosted Mr. Morgann thus: "Sir, I have been thinking on our dispute last night—you were in the right."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 489.

4644. REFLECTION, Death-bed. Cardinal Wolsey. [Cardinal Wolsey, who for eight years had been, with Henry VIII., the autocrat of England, and for about twenty years the head of the government, was on his dying-bed, in 1531, when he uttered these memorable words]: If I had served God as diligently as I have done the king, he would not have given me over in my gray hairs. [Henry had taken away his honors and his wealth, and permitted his arrest on the false charge of high treason.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 20, p. 334.

4645. REFLECTION, Delicate. Irish Americans. A.D. 1775. [General Howe, brother of the lamented general who fell in the war with France at Ticonderoga, was commander of the British army.] Howe was of an Irish family; to the Irish, therefore, they expressed their amazement at finding his name in the catalogue of their enemies; and they fletched their complaint by adding, "America loved his brother."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 43.

4646. REFLECTIONS, Melancholy. Antony. [After his defeat by Cæsar, which was occasioned chiefly by his infatuation, he fled to Cleopatra's fleet.] Antony having entered the admiral-galley, in which Cleopatra was, went and sat down at the head of it; where, leaning his elbows on his knees, and supporting his head with his two hands, he remained like a man overwhelmed with shame and rage, reflecting with profound melancholy upon his ill conduct, and the misfortunes it had brought upon him. He kept in that posture, and in those gloomy thoughts, during the three days they were going to Ténarus, without seeing or speaking to Cleopatra. At the end of that time they saw each other again, and lived together as usual.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 24, § 3.

4647. REFORM, Civil-Service. Alfred the Great. An appeal lay from all these courts to the king himself, in council; and Alfred, in whom his subjects deservedly placed the highest confidence, was overwhelmed with appeals from all parts of the kingdom. The only remedy for this was to reform the ignorance and restrain the corruption of the inferior magistrates from whence it arose. Alfred, therefore, was solicitous to appoint the ablest and most upright of his nobility to exercise the office of sheriffs and carls. He punished many for malversation, and he took care to enforce the study of letters, and particularly of the laws, as indispensable to their continuing in office.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 5, p. 111.

4648. REFORM needed. Cæsar the Dictator. All his efforts were directed to the regeneration of Roman society. Cicero paints the habits of fashionable life in colors which were possibly exaggerated; but enough remains of authentic fact to justify the general truth of the picture. Women had forgotten their honor, children their respect for parents. Husbands had murdered wives, and wives husbands. Parricide and incest formed common incidents of domestic Italian history; and, as justice had been ordered in the last years of the Republic, the most abandoned villain who came into court with a handful of gold was assured of impunity. "Rich men," says Suetonius, "were never deterred from crime by a fear of forfeiting their estates; they had but to leave Italy, and their property was secured to them."—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 25.

4649. REFORMATION, Political. Romans. [After the death of the infamous emperor Commodus] the expense of the household was immediately reduced to one half. All the instruments of luxury Pertinax exposed to public auction—gold and silver plate, chariots of a singular construction, a superfluous wardrobe of silk and embroidery, and a great number of beautiful slaves of both sexes; excepting only, with attentive humanity, those who were born in a state of freedom, and had been ravished from the arms of their weeping parents. At the same time that he obliged the worthless favorites of the tyrant to resign a part of their ill-gotten wealth, he satisfied the just creditors of the state, and unexpectedly discharged the long arrears of honest services. He removed the oppressive restrictions which had been laid upon commerce, and granted all the uncultivated lands in Italy and the provinces to those who would improve them, with an exemption from tribute during ten years.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4, p. 121.

4650. REFORMATION, Silent. Social. It is remarkable that the two greatest and most salutary social revolutions which have taken place in England—that revolution which, in the thirteenth century, put an end to the tyranny of nation over nation, and that revolution which, a few generations later, put an end to the property of man in man—were silently and imperceptibly effected. They struck contemporary observers with no surprise, and have received from historians a very scanty measure of attention. They were brought about neither by legislative regulation nor by physical force. Moral causes noiselessly effaced, first the distinction between Norman and Saxon, and then the distinction between master and slave. None can venture to fix the precise moment at which either distinction ceased. . . . It would be most unjust not to acknowledge that the chief agent in these two great deliverances was religion.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 21.

4651. REFORMATION, Violent. Religious. In the year 727, the emperor Leo, the Isaurian, was desirous of extirpating this [image-worship] idolatry, which he very justly considered as disgraceful to Christianity; but his measures were too violent. He burnt and destroyed all the paintings in the churches, and broke to pieces the statues. The people were highly exasperated, and he attempted to enforce his reformation by punishment and persecution, which had no beneficial effect.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 3, p. 82.

4652. REFORMER by Accident. Thomas Clarkson. Thomas Clarkson, when twenty-four years of age, wrote an essay on slavery, to obtain a prize, which he won; but the facts which he discovered made such a deep impression on his mind, that he devoted himself to its abolition.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 26, p. 466.

4653. REFORMER, Impetuous. John Knox. The celebrated John Knox arrived . . . from Geneva, where he had imbibed the doctrines of Calvin, of which his natural disposition fitted him to be a most zealous and intrepid promoter. This reformer was possessed of a very considerable share of learning, and of uncommon acuteness of understanding. He was a man of rigid virtue, and of a very disinterested spirit; but his maxims (as Dr. Robertson remarks) were too severe, and the impetuosity of his temper was excessive. His eloquence was fitted to rouse and to inflame. His first public appearance was at Perth, where, in a very animated sermon, he wrought up the minds of his audience to such a pitch of fury, that they broke down the walls of the church, overturned the altars, destroyed the images, and almost tore the priests to pieces. The example was contagious, and the same scenes were exhibited in different quarters of the kingdom. The Protestant party soon after took up arms.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 28, p. 383.

4654. REFORMER, Impracticable. Thomas Carlyle. His religion consists in longings, his socialism in phrases without plan; his politics are altogether negative. He clearly enough sees what is wrong, but he fails to point out what is right, or what we ought to substitute in place of the wrong which he would do away with. He is baffled when he sits down to propose remedies. He has none to offer, but goes on assailing, scourging, and pulling down. . . . He is a seer, a prophet, a poet.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 273.

4655. REFORMERS corrupted. Earl of Hertford. When [in 1547] it was alleged that Henry VIII. had promised the Earl of Hertford the revenues of six good prebends, the disinterested sincerity of the Protector in seeking a further reformation of religion might well be doubted.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 1, p. 3.

4656. REFORMERS, English. Eighteenth Century. [John Howard in 1777 published his book "On Prisons," and sowed the seed which revolutionized prison discipline. In 1739, Captain Thomas Coram obtained a charter for the first foundling hospital, having seen infants exposed in the streets and left to perish by their unnatural mothers. About the middle of the eighteenth century, Jonas Hanway, by personal effort, secured the establishment of the Magdalene Asylum, and also the Marine Society; the latter of which proposed to take distressed boys out of the streets, and educate them for the seaman's life. Robert Raikes in 1781 was struck by the degraded condition of the children in the suburbs of the city of Gloucester.] No benefit to society was greater than that produced by the partial extension of education to the humblest classes of the community [through his endeavors. He first introduced Sunday-schools in 1781. Much was done by Whitefield and Wesley.] The light literature of forty years overflows with ridicule of Methodism. The preachers were pelted by the mob; the converts were held up to execration as fanatics or hypocrites. Yet Methodism held the ground it had gained. It had gone forth to utter the words of truth to men little above the beasts that perish, and it had brought them to regard themselves as akin to humanity. The time would come when its earnestness would awaken the Church itself from its somnolency, and the educated classes would not be ashamed to be religious. There was wild enthusiasm enough in some of the followers of Whitefield and Wesley; much self-seeking; zeal verging upon profaneness; moral conduct strangely opposed to pious profession. But these earnest men left a mark upon their time which can never be effaced. The obscure young students at Oxford, in 1736, who were first called "Sacramentarians," then "Bible Moths," and finally "Methodists," produced a moral revolution in England which probably saved us from the fate of nations wholly abandoned to their own devices.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 119.

4657. REFORMERS, False. Seneca. The philosopher Seneca could write of the duty of conferring benefits, but was practically a griping usurer.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 3, p. 46.

4658. REFORMERS, Self-condemned. Polygamy. While the tenets of Luther were rapidly gaining ground in the North, the following fact will convince us that he arrogated to himself an authority very little short of that of the pope in Germany. Philip, the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, had taken a disgust at his wife, a princess of the house of Saxony, who he alleged was intolerably ugly, and addicted to drunkenness. The secret was, that he had fallen in love with a young lady of the name of Saal, whom he wanted to marry. Luther at this time, with five of his followers, was holding a kind of synod at Wittenberg, for the regulation of all matters regarding the church. The landgrave presented to him a petition, setting forth his case, in which he at the same time insinuated, that in case Luther and his doctors should refuse him a dispensation of polygamy, he would, perhaps, be obliged to ask it of the pope. The synod were under considerable difficulty. The interest of the landgrave was too formidable to be disregarded, and at the same time, to favor him, they must assume to themselves a power of breaking a law of Scripture. The temporal consideration was more powerful than the spiritual one. They agreed to give Philip a dispensation for polygamy, and he accordingly married his favorite, even with the consent of his former wife.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 20, p. 296.

4659. REFUGE, Sanctuary for. Fifteenth Century. The clergy are they who have the supreme sway over the country. . . . They have provided that a number of sacred places in the kingdom should serve for the refuge and escape of all delinquents; and no one, were he a traitor to the crown, or had he practised against the king's own person, can be taken out of these by force. And a villain of this kind, who, for some great excess that he has committed, has been obliged to take refuge in one of these sacred places, often goes out of it to brawl in the public streets, and then, returning to it, escapes with impunity for every fresh offence he may have been guilty of. This is no detriment to the purses of the priests, nor to the other perpetual sanctuaries. But every church is a sanctuary for forty days; and if a thief, or murderer, who has taken refuge in one, cannot leave it in safety during those forty days he gives notice that he wishes to leave England. In which case, being stripped to the shirt by the chief magistrate of the place, and a crucifix placed in his hand, he is conducted along the road to the sea, where, if he finds a passage, he may go, with a "God speed you." But if he should not find one, he walks into the sea up to the throat, and three times asks for passage; and this is repeated till a ship appears, which comes for him, and so he departs in safety.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 244.

4660. REFUGE secured. In America. Cromwell was dead. The Commonwealth tottered and fell. Charles II. was restored to the throne of his ancestors. Tidings of the Restoration reached Boston on the 27th of July, 1660. In the same vessel that bore the news came Edward Whalley and William Goffe, two of the judges who had passed sentence of death on Charles I. It was now their turn to save their lives by flight. Governor Endicott received them with courtesy; the agents from the British Government came in hot pursuit, with orders to arrest them. For a while the fugitives, aided by the people of Boston, baffled the officers, and then escaped to New Haven. Here for many weeks they lay in concealment; not even the Indians would accept the reward which was offered for their apprehension. At last the exiles reached the valley of the Connecticut, and found refuge at the village of Hadley, where they passed the remainder of their lives.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 14, p. 137.

4661. REFUSAL, Contemptuous. Emperor Claudius. [He was one of the rival emperors of Rome.] The siege of Milan was continued, and Aureolus soon discovered that the success of his artifices had only raised up a more determined adversary. He attempted to negotiate with Claudius a treaty of alliance and partition. "Tell him," replied the intrepid emperor, "that such proposals should have been made to Gallienus; he, perhaps, might have listened to them with patience, and accepted a colleague as despicable as himself." This stern refusal, and a last unsuccessful effort, obliged Aureolus to yield the city and himself to the discretion of the conqueror.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 11, p. 333.

4662. REFUSAL, Disdainful. Caled the Saracen. [He invaded Syria, and was opposed by a Roman army.] In the presence of both armies, a venerable Greek advanced from the ranks with a liberal offer of peace; and the departure of the Saracens would have been purchased by a gift to each soldier of a turban, a robe, and a piece of gold; ten robes and one hundred pieces to their leader; one hundred robes and one thousand pieces to the caliph. A smile of indignation expressed the refusal of Caled. "Ye Christian dogs, you know your option—the Koran, the tribute, or the sword. We are a people whose delight is in war rather than in peace, and we despise your pitiful alms, since we shall be speedily masters of your wealth, your families, and your persons."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 195.

4663. REFUSAL, Happy. Alexander's. When he came within a short distance of the city of Lampsacus, which he had determined to destroy, in order to punish the rebellion of its inhabitants, he saw Anaximenes, a native of that place, coming to him. This man, who was a famous historian, had been very intimate with Philip, his father; and Alexander himself had a great esteem for him, having been his pupil. The king, suspecting the business he was come upon, to be beforehand with him, swore, in express terms, that he would never grant his request. "The favor I have to desire of you," says Anaximenes, "is, that you would destroy Lampsacus." By this witty evasion, the historian saved his country.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 3.

4664. REGARD, Insincere. Themistocles. This prudent general used to say the Athenians paid him no honor or sincere respect; but when a storm arose, or danger appeared, they sheltered themselves under him, as under a plane-tree, which, when the weather was fair again, they would rob of its leaves and branches.—PLUTARCH'S THEMISTOCLES.

4665. REIGN, The longest. Louis XIV. Louis was crowned in 1643, when four years old, and he reigned until his death in 1715. His reign, the longest on record, had occupied seventy-two years.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 22, § 13.

4666. REINFORCEMENTS, Dangerous. Virginia. In the midst of these dark days, Captain [Christopher] Newport arrived from England. He brought a full store of supplies, and one hundred and twenty emigrants. Great was the joy throughout the little plantation; only the president was at heart as much grieved as gladdened, for he saw in the character of the new-comers no promise of anything but vexation and disaster. Here were thirty-four gentlemen at the head of the list, to begin with ; then came gold-hunters, jewellers, engravers, adventurers, strollers, and vagabonds : many of them had more business in jail than in Jamestown. To add to Smith's chagrin, this company of worthless creatures had been sent out contrary to his previous protest and injunction. He had urged Newport to bring over only a few industrious mechanics and laborers ; but the love of gold among the members of the London Company had prevailed over common-sense to send to Virginia another crowd of profligates.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 9, p. 102.

4667. RELIC, An auspicious. "The Holy Lance." [The Crusaders were reduced to great distress when besieged by the Turks in Antioch.] Of the diocese of Marseilles, there was a priest of low cunning and loose manners, and his name was Peter Bartholemy. He presented himself at the door of the council-chamber, to disclose an apparition of St. Andrew, which had been thrice reiterated in his sleep, with a dreadful menace if he presumed to suppress the commands of Heaven. "At Antioch," said the apostle, "in the church of my brother, St. Peter, near the high altar, is concealed the steel head of the lance that pierced the side of our Redeemer. In three days that instrument of eternal, and now of temporal, salvation will be manifested to his disciples. Search, and ye shall find ; bear it aloft in battle, and that mystic weapon shall penetrate the souls of the miscreants." The pope's legate, the bishop of Puy, affected to listen with coldness and distrust ; but the revelation was eagerly accepted by Count Raymond, whom his faithful subject, in the name of the apostle, had chosen for the guardian of the holy lance. The experiment was resolved ; and on the third day, after a due preparation of prayer and fasting, the priest of Marseilles introduced twelve trusty spectators, among whom were the count and his chaplain ; and the church-doors were barred against the impetuous multitude. The ground was opened in the appointed place ; but the workmen, who relieved each other, dug to the depth of twelve feet without discovering the object of their search. In the evening, when Count Raymond had withdrawn to his post, and the weary assistants began to murmur, Bartholemy, in his shirt, and without his shoes, boldly descended into the pit. The darkness of the hour and of the place enabled him to secrete and deposit the head of a Saracen lance, and the first sound, the first gleam of the steel was saluted with a devout rapture. The holy lance was drawn from its recess, wrapped in a veil of silk and gold, and exposed to the veneration of the Crusaders.—GIBSON'S ROME, ch. 58, p. 586.

4668. RELICS, Bogus. Religious. Luther . . . directed a vigorous attack upon the Archbishop Albert of Mayence, brother of the Elector of Brandenburg. This church dignitary, in need of money, had again set up the traffic with indulgences in the city of Halle, establishing a great shrine of relics, and inviting all to visit the same. He had collected a multitude of glorious relics, about nine thousand in number. Among these were remains of saints, a portion of the body of the patriarch Isaac, remnants of manna, pieces of Moses' burning bush, jugs from the marriage feast at Cana, some of the wine which Christ made of water on that occasion, thorns from Jesus' martyr crown, one of the stones with which Stephen was killed, and many other glorious relics. Against all this abomination Luther wrote a treatise entitled, "Against the Idol in Halle," and sent it to Wittenberg for publication.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 10, p. 97.

4669. RELICS, Fictitious. Girdle. [Mary Magdalen's girdle was found in a monastery, and sent to Lord Cromwell in 1535.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 23, p. 366.

4670. — — — Profitable. [Erasmus describes, in his Colloquies, the exhibition of relics in 1509.] The joint of a man's finger is exhibited to us, the largest of three. I kiss it ; and then I ask, "Whose relics were these ?" He says, "St. Peter's." "The Apostle ?" He said, "Yes." Then, observing the size of the joint, which might have been that of a giant, I remarked Peter must have been a man of very large size. [What looked like ground chalk mixed with the white of an egg was shown to him as the milk of the Blessed Virgin. At the shrine of St. Thomas at Canterbury he saw in the sacristy a box of black leather which contained some torn fragments of linen which were once worn by St. Thomas. He was also shown the upper part of a shoe which was bound with a brass rim, and in it was a piece of glass resembling a jewel, which might be kissed for a small coin. It was the shoe of St. Thomas.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 246.

4671. — — — Religious. In the reign of the younger Theodosius, Lucian, a presbyter of Jerusalem, . . . related a very singular dream, which, to remove his doubts, had been repeated on three successive Saturdays. A venerable figure stood before him, in the silence of the night, with a long beard, a white robe, and a gold rod ; announced himself by the name of Gamaliel, and revealed to the astonished presbyter that his own corpse, with the bodies of his son Abibas, his friend Nicodemus, and the illustrious Stephen, the first martyr of the Christian faith, were secretly buried in the adjacent field. He added, with some impatience, that it was time to release himself and his companions from their obscure prison ; that their appearance would be salutary to a distressed world, and that they had made choice of Lucian to inform the bishop of Jerusalem of their situation and their wishes. The doubts and difficulties which still retarded this important discovery were successively removed by new visions, and the ground was opened by the bishop, in the presence of an innumerable multitude. The coffins of Gamaliel, of his son, and of his friend were found in regular order ; but when the fourth coffin, which contained the remains of Stephen, was shown to the light, the earth trembled, and an odor, such as that of Paradise, was smelt, which instantly cured the various diseases of seventy-three of the assistants. The companions of Stephen were left in their peaceful residence of Caphargamala ; but the relics of the first martyr were transported, in solemn procession, to a church constructed in their honor on Mount Sion, and the minute particles of those relics, a drop of blood, or the scrapings of a bone, were acknowledged, in almost every province of the Roman world, to possess a divine and miraculous virtue.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 28, p. 158.

4672. — — — Religious. The zeal, perhaps the avarice, of the clergy of Jerusalem, . . . fixed, by unquestionable tradition, the scene of each memorable event. They exhibited the instruments which had been used in the passion of Christ; the nails and the lance that had pierced His hands, His feet, and His side; the crown of thorns that was planted on His head; the pillar at which He was scourged; and, above all, they showed the cross on which He suffered, and which was dug out of the earth in the reign of those princes who inserted the symbol of Christianity in the banners of the Roman legions. Such miracles as seemed necessary to account for its extraordinary preservation and seasonable discovery were gradually propagated without opposition. The custody of the true cross, which on Easter Sunday was solemnly exposed to the people, was intrusted to the bishop of Jerusalem; and he alone might gratify the curious devotion of the pilgrims by the gift of small pieces, which they encased in gold or gems, and carried away in triumph to their respective countries. But as this gainful branch of commerce must soon have been annihilated, it was found convenient to suppose that the marvellous wood possessed a secret power of vegetation, and that its substance, though continually diminished, still remained entire and unimpaired.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 22, p. 434.

4673. — — — Crown of Thorns. [Baldwin II., emperor at Constantinople, claimed to possess the crown which had been placed on the head of Christ.] It had formerly been the practice of the Egyptian debtors to deposit, as a security, the mummies of their parents; and both their honor and religion were bound for the redemption of the pledge. In the same manner, and in the absence of the emperor, the barons of Romania borrowed the sum of thirteen thousand one hundred and thirty-four pieces of gold on the credit of the holy crown.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 61, p. 122.

4674. — — — Religious. The ambassadors of Recared, the first Catholic king of Spain, respectfully offered, on the threshold of the Vatican, his rich presents of gold and gems; they accepted, as a lucrative exchange, the hairs of St. John the Baptist, a cross which enclosed a small piece of the true wood, and a key that contained some particles of iron which had been scraped from the chains of St. Peter.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 37, p. 562.

4676. RELICS, Honored. Religious. [In the thirteenth century the Venetians received the crown of thorns from Constantinople. It was borne in a silver shrine, enclosed in a golden vase. It was afterward conveyed to France.] The court of France advanced as far as Troyes, in Champagne, to meet with devotion this inestimable relic; it was borne in triumph through Paris by the king himself, barefoot, and in his shirt. The success of this transaction tempted the Latin emperor to offer, with the same generosity, the remaining furniture of his chapel; a large and authentic portion of the true cross; the baby-linen of the Son of God, the lance, the sponge and the chain of His passion; the rod of Moses, and part of the skull of St. John the Baptist. For the reception of these spiritual treasures, twenty thousand marks were expended by St. Louis on a stately foundation, the holy chapel of Paris.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 61, p. 123.

4677. RELICS, Sacred. Reign of Theodosius. In the age which followed the conversion of Constantine, the emperors, the consuls, and the generals of armies devoutly visited the sepulchres of a tentmaker and a fisherman, and their venerable bones were deposited under the altars of Christ, on which the bishops of the royal city continually offered the unbloody sacrifice. . . . The bodies of St. Andrew, St. Luke, and St. Timothy had reposed near three hundred years in the obscure graves, from whence they were transported, in solemn pomp, to the church of the apostles, which the magnificence of Constantine had founded on the banks of the Thracian Bosphorus. About fifty years afterward, the same banks were honored by the presence of Samuel, the judge and prophet of the people of Israel. His ashes, deposited in a golden vase, and covered with a silken veil, were delivered by the bishops into each other's hands. The relics of Samuel were received by the people with the same joy and reverence which they would have shown to the living prophet; the highways, from Palestine to the gates of Constantinople, were filled with an uninterrupted procession; and the emperor Arcadius himself, at the head of the most illustrious members of the clergy and senate, advanced to meet his extraordinary guest, who had always deserved and claimed the homage of kings.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 28, p. 156.

4678. RELICS, Superstitious regard for. Bones. [In 1065, Harold II., King of the Anglo-Saxons, swore to support William the Norman in his contest for the crown of England; but he swore with a mental reservation. He stands] between two ornamental pedestals, upon the top of which he places the ends of his fingers. He is swearing upon common reliquaries, as he thought; such as parish priests in England kept upon their altars, to command the faith of ignorant boors. He swears. But under the reliquaries are hidden, by a cloth of gold, the bones of saints and holy martyrs. William then commands the cloth to be removed, and Harold turns pale when he knows the supersanctity of the oath which he has taken.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 13, p. 174.

4679. RELICS, Virtue of. Christian. A.D. 643. The shrines of the apostles were guarded by miracles and invisible terrors; and it was not without fear that the pious Catholic approached the object of his worship. It was fatal to touch, it was dangerous to behold, the bodies of the saints; and those who, from the purest motives, presumed to disturb the repose of the sanctuary were affrighted by visions, or punished with sudden death. The unreasonable request of an empress, who wished to deprive the Romans of their sacred treasure, the head of St. Paul, was rejected with the deepest abhorrence; and the pope asserted, most probably with truth, that a linen which had been sanctified in the neighborhood of his body, or the filings of his chain, which it was sometimes easy and sometimes impossible to obtain, possessed an equal degree of miraculous virtue. But the power as well as virtue of the apostles resided with living energy in the breast of their successors.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 45, p. 419.

4680. RELIGION, False Ambition in. Roman Emperor Julian. He resolved to erect, without delay, on the commanding eminence of Moriah, a stately temple, which might eclipse the splendor of the church of the resurrection on the adjacent hill of Calvary; to establish an order of priests, whose interested zeal would detect the arts, and resist the ambition, of their Christian rivals; and to invite a numerous colony of Jews, whose stern fanaticism would be always prepared to second, and even to anticipate, the hostile measures of the Pagan government.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 23, p. 437.

4681. RELIGION, Austerity in. Blaise Pascal. He removed from his room all superfluous or luxurious articles, refused the assistance of servants, brought his own dinner from the kitchen, fasted frequently, partook only of the plainest fare, passed hours every day in prayer, and gave all the money he could spare to the poor. Around his waist, next his skin, he wore a girdle of iron, with points directed inward, and when he caught himself taking pleasure in anything not spiritual, or when any trifling or pleasant thought arose in his mind, he would press the points into his flesh with his elbow, to recall himself to what he called his "duty." His two great rules were to indulge in nothing he could do without, and to enjoy no worldly pleasure. He considered it a sin to take pleasure in his food, and purposely avoided the viands in which he had formerly delighted. He took great pains not to taste what he ate.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 101.

4682. RELIGION, Benefits of. Civilization. [See No. 909.] The great engine of the civilization of the Greeks was the introduction of a national religion by those eastern colonies; and, inspired with the enthusiasm of all new converts, it is no wonder that superstition was at this time their predominant characteristic. To this age, therefore, and to this character of the people, we must refer the origin of the Grecian oracles and the institution of the public games in honor of the gods.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 7, p. 64.

4683. RELIGION, Bond of. Scotch Covenant. James [I.] had, with some success, established in that country [Scotland] a hierarchy on the pattern of the English church, and Charles wanted to complete the work of his father by resting discipline upon a regular system of canons, and modelling the public worship by the forms of a liturgy. These designs were extremely odious to the Scots, and they met with the reception which might have been expected. The Bishop of Edinburgh, beginning to read the service in the cathedral-church, was assaulted with the most furious rage, and narrowly escaped being torn in pieces by the populace. The tumult spread through the whole kingdom, and the heads of the Presbyterian party, assembling themselves in the capital, subscribed the famous bond called the National Covenant, by which, after a formal renunciation of the abominations of popery, they bound themselves by a solemn oath to resist all religious innovations, and to defend to the utmost the glory of God and the honor of their king and country. The consequences of this association, which was eagerly subscribed by all ranks and conditions of the people, were extremely alarming; and Charles, perceiving he had gone too far, offered to suspend the use of the liturgy, provided matters were put on the same footing as before, and the Scots would retract their covenant. But they replied that they would sooner renounce their baptism; and summoning a general assembly at Glasgow, they, with great deliberation, not only annulled the liturgy and canons, but utterly abolished the episcopal hierarchy, which, for above thirty years, had quietly subsisted in the kingdom.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 29, p. 401.

4684. RELIGION, Burdened by. In Ireland. [Reign of James II.] The Protestant Nonconformists, on their side, endured with more patience than could have been expected the sight of the most absurd ecclesiastical establishment that the world has ever seen. Four archbishops and eighteen bishops were employed in looking after about a fifth part of the number of Churchmen who inhabited the single diocese of London. Of the parochial clergy a large proportion were pluralists, and resided at a distance from their cures. There were some who drew from their benefices incomes of little less than a thousand a year, without ever performing any spiritual function.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 122.

4685. RELIGION, Burdensome, Trifles. Two priests of the best families of Rome, Cornelius Cethegus and Quintus Sulpicius, were degraded from the priesthood; the former because he did not present the entrails of the victim according to rule; and the latter because, as he was sacrificing, the tuft of his cap, which was such an one as the Flamines wear, fell off. And because the squeaking of a rat happened to be heard at the moment that Minucius the Dictator appointed Caius Flaminius his general of horse, the people obliged them to quit their posts, and appointed others in their stead.—PLUTARCH'S MARCELLUS.

4686. RELIGION, Champion for. John Milton. Milton was resolute in his religion at Rome, so much so that many were deterred from showing him the civilities they were prepared to offer. His rule, he says, was "not of my own accord to introduce in those places conversation about religion, but, if interrogated respecting the faith, then, whatsoever I should suffer, to dissemble nothing. What I was, if any one asked, I concealed from no one; if any one in the very city of the pope attacked the orthodox religion, I defended it most freely." Beyond the statement that the English Jesuits were indignant, we hear of no evil consequences of this imprudence.—MILTON, by M. PATTISON, ch. 3.

4687. RELIGION, Irreligious Champion of. St. John Lord Bolingbroke. A.D. 1711. Indifferent not to the forms of religion only, but to religion itself, he was the unscrupulous champion of the High Church, and supported the worst acts of its most intolerant policy [while secretary of state].—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

4688. RELIGION changed. *For Money. After some previous negotiation, the amiable and fascinating Henrietta of Orleans, Charles' sister, who possessed much influence over him, arrived at Dover on a secret mission in May, 1670, and a treaty was shortly afterward concluded, the provisions of which, discreditable to both sovereigns, must cover the memory of Charles [II.] with peculiar and eternal infamy. He engaged to abandon his late allies, and join Louis in invading Holland, furnishing a contingent of six thousand men and a fleet of fifty sail; he was also to make a public profession of the Roman Catholic religion, and propagate it to the utmost of his power in his dominions. As the price of these disgraceful acts of treachery, Charles was to receive from Louis an annual subsidy of three millions (£120,000) during the war, together with the island of Walcheren, and two fortresses on the Scheldt, as his share of the spoil.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 21, § 5.

4689. RELIGION and Commerce. *Codfish. Gold lured the Spaniards to South America and Mexico; but the humbler bait which attracted the French to Northern America was codfish. In Catholic countries there are so many days on which meat may not, and fish may be, eaten, that fish is an article of very great importance; and this was perhaps the reason why the French, as early as 1525, only thirty-three years after the discovery of America, had a considerable fleet of fishing vessels on the banks of Newfoundland.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 368.

4690. RELIGION a Conflict. *Duality of Man. The religious history of man is essentially the same in all ages. It takes its rise in the duality of his nature. He is an animal, and as an animal he desires bodily pleasure, and shrinks from bodily pain. As a being capable of morality, he is conscious that for him there exists a right and wrong. Something, whatever that something may be, binds him to choose one and avoid the other. This is his religion, his religio, his obligation, in the sense in which the Romans, from whom we take it, used the word; and obligation implies some superior power to which man owes obedience. The conflict between his two dispositions agitates his heart and perplexes his intellect. To do what the superior power requires of him, he must thwart his inclinations. He dreads punishment, if he neglects to do it. He invents methods by which he can indulge his appetites, and finds a substitute by which he can propitiate his invisible ruler or rulers. He offers sacrifices; he institutes ceremonies and observances.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 2.

4691. RELIGION, Confusion in. *James II. The king early put the loyalty of his Protestant friends to the proof. While he was a subject he had been in the habit of hearing mass with closed doors in a small oratory which had been fitted up for his wife. He now ordered the doors to be thrown open, in order that all who came to pay their duty to him might see the ceremony. When the host was elevated there was a strange confusion in the antechamber. The Roman Catholics fell on their knees; the Protestants hurried out of the room. Soon a new pulpit was erected in the palace; and during Lent a series of sermons was preached there by popish divines, to the great discomposure of zealous churchmen.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 438.

4692. RELIGION, Consolation of. *Charles I. Bishop Juxon, who attended him to the last moment, as he approached the block, said to him, "Sire, there is but one step more, a sharp and short one! Remember that in another second you will ascend from earth to heaven, and that there you will find in an infinite and inexhaustible joy the reward of your sacrifice, and a crown that shall never pass away." "My friend," replied Charles, interrupting him with perfect composure, "I go from a corruptible crown to an incorruptible one, and which, as you say, I feel convinced I shall possess forever without trouble or anxiety."—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 48.

4693. RELIGION, Contradicted. *Abraham Lincoln. Two ladies from Tennessee came before the President, asking the release of their husbands, held as prisoners of war at Johnson's Island. . . . At each of these interviews one of the ladies urged that her husband was a religious man. . . . When the President ordered the release, he said to this lady: "You say your husband is a religious man; tell him when you meet him that I say I am not much of a judge of religion, but that in my opinion the religion which sets men to rebel against the government, because, as they think, that government does not sufficiently help some men to eat their bread in the sweat of other men's faces, is not the sort of religion upon which people can get to heaven."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 735.

4694. RELIGION, Courage by. *Reign of James II. [Protestant rebels under the Duke of Monmouth.] The number of the rebels whom Jeffreys hanged on this circuit was three hundred and twenty. . . . They were, for the most part, men of blameless life and of high religious profession. They were regarded by themselves, and by a large proportion of their neighbors, not as wrong-doers, but as martyrs who sealed with blood the truth of the Protestant religion. Very few of the convicts professed any repentance for what they had done. Many, animated by the old Puritan spirit, met death, not merely with fortitude, but with exultation. . . . Some of them composed hymns in the dungeon and chanted them on the fatal sledge. Christ, they sang, while they were undressing for the butchery, would soon come to rescue Zion and to make war on Babylon, would set up His standard, would blow His trumpet, and would requite His foes tenfold for all the evil which had been inflicted on His servants.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 598.

4696. RELIGION, Devotion to. *Columbus. Throughout his life he was noted for strict attention to the offices of religion, observing rigorously the fasts and ceremonies of the church; nor did his piety consist in mere forms, but partook of that lofty and solemn enthusiasm with which his whole character was strongly tinged.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, ch. 4.

4697. RELIGION, Discord in. Egyptians. [A natural cause of] discords among themselves was the variety and difference of the objects of religious worship in the different provinces of the kingdom. The same animals that were regarded in one province with the most superstitious reverence were in another the objects of detestation and abhorrence. In one quarter they tamed the crocodiles, adorned them with gold and jewels, and worshipped them; in another they killed those animals without mercy. In one province the most sacred animal was a dog; in another they reckoned dog's flesh the most delicate food. Cats were adored in one district, and rats in another. From these differences arose perpetual and violent animosities; for there are no contentions so rancorous as those which spring from the most trifling differences in religious worship or opinion. "The multitude," says Diodorus, "have been often inflamed into the highest pitch of fury on account of the sacrilegious murder of a divine cat."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4, p. 46.

4698. RELIGION disguised. Pagans. The temples of the Roman Empire were deserted, or destroyed; but the ingenious superstition of the Pagans still attempted to elude the laws of Theodosius, by which all sacrifices had been severely prohibited. The inhabitants of the country, whose conduct was less opposed to the eye of malicious curiosity, disguised their religious, under the appearance of convivial, meetings. On the days of solemn festivals they assembled in great numbers under the spreading shade of some consecrated trees; sheep and oxen were slaughtered and roasted; and this rural entertainment was sanctified by the use of incense, and by the hymns which were sung in honor of the gods. But it was alleged that, as no part of the animal was made a burnt-offering, as no altar was provided to receive the blood, and as the previous oblation of salt cakes and the concluding ceremony of libations were carefully omitted, these festal meetings did not involve the guests in the guilt or penalty of an illegal sacrifice.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 28, p. 148.

4699. RELIGION, Diverse Views of. Romans. The various modes of worship which prevailed in the Roman world were all considered by the people as equally true; by the philosopher, as equally false; and by the magistrate, as equally useful. And thus toleration produced not only mutual indulgence, but even religious concord.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 34.

4700. RELIGION, Duplicity in. Reign of James II. The dispensing power was . . . employed for the purpose of enabling Roman Catholics to hold ecclesiastical preferment. The new solicitor readily drew the warrants in which Sawyer had refused to be concerned. One of these warrants was in favor of a wretch named Edward Selater, who had two livings, which he was determined to keep at all costs and through all changes. He administered the sacrament to his parishioners according to the rites of the Church of England on Palm Sunday, 1686. On Easter Sunday, only seven days later, he was at mass.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 79.

4701. RELIGION, Effects of. Puritanism vs. Ecclesiasticism. Ecclesiastical tyranny is of all kinds the worst; its fruits are cowardice, idleness, ignorance, and poverty. Puritanism was a life-giving spirit; activity, thrift, intelligence, followed in its train; and as for courage, a coward and a Puritan never went together. "He that prays best and preaches best will fight best"—such was the judgment of Cromwell, the greatest soldier of his age.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

4702. RELIGION, Effort in. Martin Luther. Filled with awe and reverence, he had come to Rome, and had hoped to find peace for his soul. "I was one of those frantic saints in Rome; I ran about all the churches and crypts, and believed all their shameless, impudent lies. I also read mass, perhaps ten times, and I very much regretted that my father and mother were still alive, for I should have been delighted to deliver them from purgatory with my masses, and with other precious works and many prayers." On his knees he crept up Pilate's staircase, the Scala Sancta, or holy stairway, which was said to have been brought from the judgment hall to Rome and placed in the chapel of St. John's Church of the Lateran. Luther did this in order to receive indulgence. And yet he felt, in doing such a work, as if a voice in thunder tones were crying out to him: "The just shall live by faith" (Rom. 1: 17).—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 4, p. 38.

4703. RELIGION, Excitement in. Early Methodists. [Great excitement, with extraordinary physical effects, frequently attended the preaching of Wesley and Whitefield.] The most singular fact about them is, that for a considerable time the superior ardor and eloquence of Whitefield did not produce them, while under the calmer and more logical preaching of Wesley people dropped on every side as if thunderstruck. It is also noteworthy . . . that at this time not one of his texts, as recorded in his journals, was of a serious or terrific character, but they were, as in most of his life, selected from the great and precious promises. . . . [Wesley made a special investigation of the remarkable physical effects occurring at Newcastle.] He found, first, that all persons who had been thus affected were in perfect health, and had not been subject to convulsions of any kind. Second, that these new affections had come upon them in a moment, without any previous notice, while they were either hearing the preaching, or thinking on what they had heard. Third, that they usually dropped down, lost their strength, and were seized with violent pain. Their feelings were described differently. Some said they felt as if a sword was running through them; others thought a great weight lay upon them. . . . "I can no more," said he, "attribute them to a natural cause than to the Spirit of God."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, pp. 126, 188.

4704. RELIGION, Extremes in. Puritanism [In 1653 the Puritans fasted on Christmas and feasted on Ash Wednesday.] They took this course upon the old principle, that the greater was the remove from Roman Catholicism, the nearer was the approach to true religion. — KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 11, p. 172.

4705. — Second Crusade. At length they appeared before Jerusalem; and though famine, sickness, and great losses, even by their victories, had reduced their immense army to twenty thousand men, they resolutely attacked a garrison of forty thousand, and after a siege of five weeks took the city by storm. The whole inhabitants, soldiers and citizens, men, women, and children, who were either Mahometans or Jews, were put to the sword. It is affirmed by all the historians that, after this inhuman massacre, the Christians went in solemn procession to the place where they were told was the sepulchre of our Saviour, and there burst into a flood of tears. This mixture of barbarity and cruelty with the tender feelings is derided by some authors, and especially Voltaire, as something out of nature, and scarcely possible; but when it is considered what was the motive of many of these men, the enthusiasm which animated them in a cause which they were persuaded was to conduct them to heaven, the contending feelings with which they were agitated, detestation for those infidels who, as they imagined, had polluted, by their impious worship, the most sacred monuments of their religion, and joy and gratitude for the recovery and vindication of those venerable remains, we shall find nothing in the deportment of these Crusaders but what is natural and consistent with their situation. — TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 9, p. 157.

4706. RELIGION, Folly in. *Pillar Saints. As the affectation of superior sanctity and the pride of being singular gave rise to many of the austerities of the monastic life, the same motive led some men to seclude themselves from social life in a still more extraordinary manner than that practised by any of the religious orders. These men were termed Stylites, or Pillar Saints. They mounted themselves on the tops of stone pillars, and stood there immovable for many years. One Simeon, a native of Syria, gave the first example of this most amazing folly, and passed thirty-seven years of his life upon pillars of various heights, beginning with one of nine feet, and increasing from year to year, till he died on a pillar of forty cubits. Another saint of the same name lived sixty-eight years in the same manner. The veneration which these holy men acquired excited a number of imitators, and their degrees of sanctity were always estimated according to the height of their pillars, and the number of years they had passed upon them. For above six centuries this superstitious frenzy prevailed in the East, nor was the practice altogether abolished till the twelfth century. — TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 3, p. 85.

4707. RELIGION, Generosity in. *False. As the Alcmaeonidae were very rich and powerful, they got themselves appointed by the Amphictyons, who constituted the general council of Greece, to superintend the rebuilding of the temple of Delphi, for the sum of 300 talents or 300,000 crowns. As they were naturally generous, and had besides their reasons for being so on this occasion, they added to this sum a great deal of their own money, and made the whole front of the temple all of Parian marble, at their particular expense; whereas by the contract made with the Amphictyons, it was only to have been made of common stone. The liberality of the Alcmaeonidae was not altogether a free bounty; neither was their magnificence toward the god of Delphi a pure effect of religion: policy was the chief motive. They hoped by this means to acquire great influence in the temple, and it happened according to their expectation. The money, which they plentifully poured into the hands of the priestess, rendered them absolute masters of the oracle, and of the pretended god who presided over it, and who for the future became their echo. . . . As often therefore as any Spartan came to consult the priestess, whether upon his own affairs or upon those of the State, no promise was ever made him of the god's assistance, but upon condition that the Lacedaemonians should deliver Athens from the yoke of tyranny. This order was so often repeated to them by the oracle, that they resolved at last to make war against the Pisistratidae, though they were under the strongest engagements of friendship and hospitality with them: herein preferring the will of God, says Herodotus, to all human considerations. — ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 5, § 8.

4708. RELIGION and Gold. *Heathen. [In the besieged city of Tyre there was a brazen statue of Apollo of enormous size.] During the siege, in consequence of a dream which one of the citizens had, the Tyrians imagined that Apollo was determined to leave them and go over to Alexander. Immediately they fastened with a gold chain his statue to Hercules' altar, to prevent the deity from leaving them. For these people were silly enough to believe that after his statue was thus fastened down, it would not be possible for him to make his escape, and that he would be prevented from doing so by Hercules, the tutelar god of the city. — ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 6.

4709. RELIGION graded. *Pythagoras. In imitation of the Egyptian priests, Pythagoras professed two different kinds of doctrine, the one accommodated to vulgar use, and the other reserved for the private ear of his favorite disciples. The object of the former was morality; the latter consisted of many mysteries which we are probably at no loss for being very little acquainted with. Five years of silence were requisite for preparing his scholars for the participation of these secrets. These disciples formed among themselves a sort of community; they lived all in the same house together with their wives and children; they had their goods in common, and their time was parcelled out and appropriated to various exercises of mind and body. Music was in high esteem with them, as a corrective of the passions; and they had one kind of music for the morning, to awaken and excite the faculties, and another for the evening, to relax and compose them. The notion which Pythagoras inculcated of the soul's transmigration through different bodies made his disciples strictly abstain from animal food. — TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 263.

4710. RELIGION, Husbandman's. *Cato's Prayer. It is in a ceremony called Solitaurlia, and according to some Suovetaurlia, in which the country people made a procession round their lands, and offered libations and sacrifices to certain gods. . . "Father Mars," said the suppliant, "I humbly implore and conjure you to be propitious and favorable to me, my family, and all my domestics, in regard to the occasion of the present procession in my fields, lands, and estate; to prevent, avert, and remove from us all diseases, known and unknown, desolations, storms, calamities, and pestilential air; to make our plants, corn, vines, and trees grow and come to perfection; to preserve our shepherds and flocks; to grant thy preservation of life and health to me, my family, and all my domestics." What a reproach is it that Christians, and often those who have the greatest share in the goods of this world, should in these days be so little careful to demand them from God, and be ashamed to thank Him for them! Among the Pagans all their meals began and ended with prayers, which are now banished from almost all our tables.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 24, art. 4, § 5.

4711. RELIGION, Hypocrisy in. Charles II. The Duke of York [afterward James II.], too dull to apprehend danger, or too fanatical to care about it, was impatient to see the article touching the Roman Catholic religion carried into immediate execution; but Louis [XIV.] had the wisdom to perceive that, if this course were taken, there would be such an explosion in England as would probably frustrate those parts of the plan which he had most at heart. It was therefore determined that Charles should still call himself a Protestant, and should still, at high festivals, receive the sacrament according to the ritual of the Church of England. His more scrupulous brother ceased to appear in the royal chapel.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 196.

4712. RELIGION, Impediments to. George Müller. [He was sent away from home to school.] But while exemplary in his conduct outwardly, he was totally unconcerned about the salvation of his soul, and utterly reckless regarding the eternal realities of the world to come. He had three hundred books of his own, but no Bible; and as he was surrounded by unconverted persons, and never heard the Gospel preached, he had no opportunity whatever of receiving religious instruction, nor of conversing with any one who would take an interest in his spiritual welfare.—LIFE OF GEORGE MÜLLER, p. 11.

4713. RELIGION insulted. Pope Gregory VII. [He summoned Emperor Henry IV., while at war with the Saxons,] to come in person to Rome and answer the charge of having granted the investiture of benefices. He treated this insolent message with proper contempt. Gregory [VII.] had, at the same time, denounced a sentence of excommunication against Philip I. of France. . . . What gave weight to sentences of this kind, which would otherwise have been held in derision, was that policy of the popes by which they took care to level their ecclesiastical thunder against those who had enemies powerful enough to avail themselves of the advantages which such sentences gave them against the party excommunicated. Henry, it must be owned, thought of rather a mean revenge against the pontiff. By his orders, a ruffian seized the pope while he was performing divine service, and after bruising and maltreating him, confined him to prison. The pontiff, however, soon recovered his liberty, and assembling a council at Rome, pronounced a formal sentence of deposition against the emperor.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 7, p. 127.

4714. ——. Louis XV. "The most Christian king" of France . . . caused an attractive woman to be taken from public licentiousness, consecrated by the sacrament of marriage as the wife of a French nobleman, and then installed in his own palace as his mistress. In return she adored royalty and sided against the philosophers. . . . An abandoned female who pleased the fancies of a corrupt old man became the symbol and the support of absolute power.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 48.

4715. RELIGION by Legislation. Romans. [The Emperor Gratian was celebrated for his piety.] The conscience of the credulous prince was directed by saints and bishops, who procured an imperial edict to punish, as a capital offence, the violation, the neglect, or even the ignorance of the divine law.—GIBBON, vol. 3.

4716. RELIGION, Legislation against. Jesuits. As the influence of the Jesuits gave to France its only power over the Five Nations, the legislature of New York, in 1700, made a law for hanging every Popish priest that should come voluntarily into the province. "The law ought forever to continue," is the commentary of the historian, wholly unconscious of the true nature of his remark.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

4717. RELIGION, Licensed. By King John. [There is a warrant of King John's, dated from Normandy, in the early part of his reign, in which he says:] Know ye, that we have given license to Peter Bullo to enter into any religion that he pleases.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 23, p. 340.

4718. RELIGION, Melancholy. Cromwell. This passion [of the times] in the ardent and gloomy disposition of Cromwell almost produced a disease of the imagination. He trembled for his eternal salvation, and dreaded lest he should not sacrifice enough for his faith. He reproached himself for an act of cowardly toleration in permitting Catholic symbols, such as the cross on the summit, and other religious ornaments, left by recent Protestantism, to remain upon the church at Huntingdon. He was impressed with the idea of an early death, and lived under the terror of eternal punishment. Warwick, one of his contemporaries, relates that Cromwell, seized on a particular occasion with a fit of religious melancholy, sent frequently during the night for the physician of the neighboring village, that he might talk to him of his doubts and terrors. He assisted assiduously at the preachings of those itinerant Puritan ministers who came to stir up polemical ardor and antipathies.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 6.

4719. ——. Anabaptists. [Hooker said of the Anabaptists:] Every word otherwise than severely and sadly uttered seemed to pierce like a sword through them. If any man were pleasant, their manner was fervently, with sighs, to repeat those words of our Saviour Christ, "Woe be to you which now laugh, for ye shall lament."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 16, p. 245.

4720. RELIGION, Misplaced. Military Crusaders. The power of Constantine was distract ed by a Turkish war; the mind of Henry was feeble and irresolute; and the pope, instead of repassing the Alps with a German army, was accompanied only by a guard of seven hundred Swabians and some volunteers of Lorraine. In his long progress from Mantua to Beneventum, a vile and promiscuous multitude of Italians was enlisted under the holy standard: the priest and the robber slept in the same tent; the pikes and crosses were intermingled in the front; and the martial saint repeated the lessons of his youth in the order of march, of encampment, and of combat.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 56, p. 455.

4721. RELIGION, Misunderstood. Pope's Legate. The legate addressed Luther in a gracious and fatherly manner, and in the name of the pope plainly demanded of him that he recant his errors and promise to abstain thereafter from the promulgation of all views that might distract the Church. Two articles he should recall and withdraw: First, the denial that the "indulgence-treasure" of the Church is the merit of our Lord Jesus Christ; secondly, his maintenance that a person who wishes to receive the Lord's Supper must above all things possess the faith and the inner conviction that his sins will be forgiven him. Hereupon a discussion ensued between Luther and [Cardinal] Cajetan. The attendants of the latter audibly tittered when they heard the explanations of the Augustinian monk, so strange and curious did they seem to the Italians. In vain did Luther appeal to the Bible and its declarations concerning faith.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 5, p. 53.

4722. — — — Puritans Criticised. If, from the outside peculiarities which so easily excite the sneer of the superficial observer [see No. 4731], we look to the genius of the sect itself, Puritanism was religion struggling for the people. "Its absurdities," says its enemy, "were the shelter for the noble principles of liberty." It was its office to engraft the new institutions of popular energy upon the old European system of feudal aristocracy and popular servitude; the good was permanent; the outward emblems, which were the signs of party, were of transient duration.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

4723. RELIGION, Mockery of. Roman Emperor Michael. But the most extraordinary feature in the character of Michael is the profane mockery of the religion of his country. . . . A buffoon of the court was invested in the robes of the patriarch; his twelve metropolitans, among whom the emperor was ranked, assumed their ecclesiastical garments; they used or abused the sacred vessels of the altar; and, in their bacchanalian feasts, the holy communion was administered in a nauseous compound of vinegar and mustard. Nor were these impious spectacles concealed from the eyes of the city. On the day of a solemn festival, the emperor, with his bishops or buffoons, rode on asses through the streets, encountered the true patriarch at the head of his clergy; and by their licentious shouts and obscene gestures disordered the gravity of the Christian procession.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 48, p. 596.

4724. RELIGION without Morality. Armenian. [Archbishop Isaac was earnestly solicited by the Armenian nobles to sanction the removal of their unworthy king.] He deplored the manifest and inexcusable vices of Artasires, and declared that he should not hesitate to accuse him before the tribunal of a Christian emperor, who would punish, without destroying, the sinner. "Our king," continued Isaac, "is too much addicted to licentious pleasures, but he has been purified in the holy waters of baptism. He is a lover of women, but he does not adore the fire or the elements. He may deserve the reproach of lewdness, but he is an undoubted Catholic; and his faith is pure, though his manners are flagitious. I will never consent to abandon my sheep to the rage of devouring wolves; and you would soon repent your rash exchange of the infirmities of a believer for the specious virtues of a heathen."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 33, p. 360.

4725. RELIGION, Motives in. Heathen. The devout polytheist, though fondly attached to his national rites, admitted with implicit faith the different religions of the earth. Fear, gratitude, and curiosity, a dream or an omen, a singular disorder, or a distant journey, perpetually disposed him to multiply the articles of his belief, and to enlarge the list of his protectors.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 34.

4726. RELIGION needful to the State. Morality. [Seven years after the abolition of the Commonwealth and the restoration of the profligate Charles II., the historian writes:] The infamous corruption of the higher classes was eating into the foundation of England's greatness. Her people were losing that masculine simplicity, that hearty devotion to public and private duties, that religious earnestness—intolerant, no doubt—but rarely stimulated by the followers of Calvin or the followers of Arminius in the greatest heat of their conflicts; the English were losing that nationality whose excess may be ludicrous, but whose utter want is despicable.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 17, p. 295.

4727. — — — Patriotism. [Their] motive [for favoring the Reformation] was their [the people's] avowed hatred of the religion which Austria protected, and their enthusiastic attachment to a doctrine which that House was endeavoring to extirpate by fire and sword. Their attachment was ardent, their hatred invincible. Religious fanaticism anticipates even the remotest dangers. Enthusiasm never calculates its sacrifices. What the most pressing danger of the State could not effect with the citizens was effected by religious zeal. For the State or for the prince few would have drawn the sword; but for religion, the merchant, the artist, the peasant—all cheerfully flew to arms. For that State or for the prince even the smallest additional impost would have been avoided; but for religion the people readily staked at once life, fortune, and all earthly hopes. It trebled the contributions which flowed into the exchequer of the princes, and the armies which marched to the field; and, in the ardent excitement produced in all minds by the peril to which their faith was exposed, the subject felt not the pressure of those burdens and privations under which, in cooler moments, he would have sunk exhausted. The terrors of the Spanish Inquisition and the massacre of St. Bartholomew's procured for the Prince of Orange, the Admiral Coligny, the British Queen Elizabeth, and the Protestant princes of Germany supplies of men and money from their subjects, to a degree which at present is inconceivable.—THIRTY YEARS' WAR, § 11.

4728. RELIGION, Occasion of. *Mystery. Even scepticism is made to supply an apology for superstition. The great and incomprehensible secret of the universe eludes the inquiry of man. Where reason cannot instruct, custom may be permitted to guide; and every nation seems to consult the dictates of prudence by a faithful attachment to those rites and opinions which have received the sanction of ages. If those ages have been crowned with glory and prosperity, if the devout people have frequently obtained the blessings which they have solicited at the altars of the gods, it must appear still more advisable to persist in the same salutary practice, and not to risk the unknown perils that may attend any rash innovations.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 28, p. 135.

4729. RELIGION, Oppressive. *Colony of Maryland. The clause for liberty in Maryland extended only to Christians, and was introduced by the proviso that, "Whatsoever person shall blaspheme God, or shall reproach or deny the Holy Trinity, or any of the Three Persons, thereof, shall be punished with death."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 7.

4730. RELIGION, Natural. *Pagans. A famous legislator, Zaleucus by name . . . requires above all things, of the citizens, to believe and be firmly persuaded that there are gods; and adds, that the bare casting up our eyes to the heavens and contemplating their order and beauty are sufficient to convince us that it is impossible so wonderful a fabric could have been formed by mere chance or human power. As the natural consequence of this belief, he exhorts men to honor and revere the gods as the authors of whatever is good and just among mortals; and to honor them, not merely by sacrifices and splendid gifts, but by a circumspect conduct, and by purity and innocence of manners, these being infinitely more grateful to the deities than all the sacrifices that can be offered. After this exordium, so pregnant with religion and piety, in which he describes the Supreme Being as the primary source whence all laws flow, as the chief authority which commands obedience to them, as the most powerful motive for our faithful observance of them, and as the perfect model to which mankind ought to conform, he descends to the particulars of those duties which men owe to one another, and lays down a precept which is very well adapted to preserve peace and unity in society by enjoining the individuals who compose it not to make their hatred and dissensions perpetual, which would evince an unsociable and savage disposition, but to treat their enemies as men who would soon be their friends. This is carrying morality to as great a perfection as could be expected from heathens.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 7, ch. 3, § 1.

4731. RELIGION paradoxical. *Puritans. This was the Puritan belief in England in the seventeenth century. The reason starts at it, but all religion is paradoxical to reason. God hates sin, yet sin exists. He is omnipotent, yet evil is not overcome. The will of man is free, or there can be no guilt; yet the action of the will, so far as experience can throw light on its operation, is as much determined by antecedent causes as every other natural force. Prayer is addressed to a Being assumed to be omniscient, who knows better what is good for us than we can know; who sees our thoughts without requiring to hear them in words; whose will is fixed and cannot be changed. Prayer, therefore, in the eye of reason, is an impertinence. The Puritan theology is not more open to objection on the ground of unreasonableness than the Catholic theology, or any other which regards man as answerable to God for his conduct. We must judge of a creed by its effects on character, as we judge of the wholesomeness of food as it conduces to bodily health. And the creed which swept like a wave through England at that time, and recommended itself to the noblest and most powerful intellects, produced also in those who accepted it a horror of sin, and enthusiasm for justice, purity, and manliness, which can be paralleled only in the first age of Christianity.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 2.

4732. RELIGION, Peculiarities in. *Puritans in New England. They were opposed to wigs; they could preach against veils; they denounced long hair; they disliked the cross in the banner, as much as the people of Paris disliked the lilies of the Bourbons, and for analogous reasons. They would not allow Christmas day to be kept sacred; they called neither months, nor days, nor seasons, nor churches, nor inns by the names common in England; they revived Scripture names at christenings; . . . prohibited frivolous fashions in their own dress; and . . . checking extravagance even in woman, frowned on her hoods of silk and her scarfs of tiffany, extended the length of her sleeve to the wrist, and limited its greatest width to half an ell. . . . They married without a minister, and buried the dead without a prayer.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

4733. RELIGION, Persecution of. *Reign of James II. Many Dissenters were cited before the ecclesiastical courts. Others found it necessary to purchase the connivance of the agents of the government by presents of hogsheds of wine, and of gloves stuffed with guineas. It was impossible for the sectaries to pray together without precautions such as are employed by coiners and receivers of stolen goods. The places of meeting were frequently changed. Worship was performed sometimes just before break of day and sometimes at dead of night. Round the building where the little flock was gathered together sentinels were posted to give the alarm if a stranger drew near. The minister in disguise was introduced through the garden and the back yard. In some houses there were trap-doors through which, in case of danger, he might descend. Where Nonconformists lived next door to each other, the walls were often broken open, and secret passages were made from dwelling to dwelling. No psalm was sung; and many contrivances were used to prevent the voice of the preacher, in his moments of fervor, from being heard beyond the walls. Yet, with all this care, it was often found impossible to elude the vigilance of informers.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 617.

4734. RELIGION of Policy. *Changeful. Michael, the emperor who had raised Photius to the patriarchal chair, was murdered by his rival Basileas, who, immediately on his mounting the imperial throne, deposed the patriarch in the midst of his triumph; and a council of the church being called at this time, at Rome, Photius was unanimously condemned to do penance for his usurpations and heresies. Soon after, however, Photius, who was a man of consummate ability, prevailed on the emperor to reinstate him as patriarch, and he was now declared innocent by four hundred bishops, three hundred of whom were the same men who had before signed his condemnation. This is a disgraceful picture of depravity; but conscience and religion are too weak to combat against State policy.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 4, p. 95.

4735. RELIGION and Politics. Ancient Romans. The Romans showed a spirit of toleration to the religious opinions of other nations, because they found nothing in these which aimed at the subversion of their own religion, nor anything of that zeal of making converts which so remarkably distinguished the votaries of Christianity. The religion of the Romans was inseparably interwoven with their system of government. The Christians, by exposing the absurdities of their system of worship, in effect undermined the fabric of their political constitution; and hence they were not without reason considered by the Romans as a dangerous body of men, whom it became the interest of the empire to suppress and exterminate. Hence those opprobrious epithets with which they have been stigmatized by the Roman writers, and hence those cruel persecutions which they underwent from the emperors and their deputies in the provinces.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 4, p. 3.

4736. RELIGION, Power of. Druids in Britain. Their religion was that of the Druids, the uncertainty regarding whose particular tenets is universally acknowledged. It is, however, generally agreed that they taught the belief of one God, Creator of the universe; of the limited duration of the world, and its destruction by fire; of the immortality of the human soul, and its transmigration through different bodies, in which the just and the wicked met with a retribution for their conduct in the present state; but on these doctrines, as general principles, they seemed to have reared an immense superstructure of fable. Their worship was polluted by the horrid practice of human sacrifice; and the chief office of their priests was to divine future events from the flowing of the blood of the victim, or the posture in which he fell after receiving the fatal blow. The influence of this religion was so great as to extend over every department of the government of the Britons. The Druids were not only the priests, but the judges, civil and criminal; and the bondage in which they held the minds of the people was so strict as to supply the place of laws. The Romans, after the conquest of Gaul, found it impossible to reconcile to their laws and institutions the nations whom they had subdued, while this religion subsisted, and in this instance were obliged to depart from their usual principles of toleration. They abolished the religion of the Druids by the severest penal enactments.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 4, p. 103.

4737. RELIGION, Preparatory. West Indians. Columbus at first indulged in the error that the natives of Hayti were destitute of all notions of religion, and he had consequently flattered himself that it would be the easier to introduce into their minds the doctrines of Christianity; not aware that it is more difficult to light up the fire of devotion in the cold heart of an atheist than to direct the flame to a new object, when it is already enkindled. There are few beings, however, so destitute of reflection as not to be impressed with the conviction of an overruling deity. A nation of atheists never existed.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 6, ch. 10.

4738. RELIGION, Progress in. "More Truth." Now, the English at Leyden, trusting in God and in themselves, made ready for their departure . . . the Speedwell, of sixty tons, the Mayflower, of one hundred and eighty tons. . . . A solemn fast was held; . . . [pastor] Robinson gave them a farewell: "I charge you before God and His blessed angels that you follow me no further than you have seen me follow the Lord Jesus Christ. The Lord has more truth yet to break forth out of His Holy word."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 8.

4739. RELIGION, Progress by. Colonization. Religious enthusiasm colonized New England, and religious enthusiasm founded Montreal, made a conquest of the wilderness on the upper lakes, and explored the Mississippi. Puritanism gave New England its worship and its schools; the Roman church created for Canada its altars, its hospitals, and its seminaries.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 20.

4740. RELIGION, Progressive. Mahomet's. The illiterate character and ignorance of Mahomet, in his younger days, leave no doubt that, in the composition of this work, he must have had able assistants; but as he was possessed of strong natural talents and a brilliant imagination, the chief merit was, in all probability, his own. The production of the work in small and detached parcels was a highly politic measure; for by leaving it in his power to add to it from time to time, according as he was favored with new revelations, he had it in his power to remove or explain any errors or inconsistencies, the detection of which might otherwise have been fatal to his imposture.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 1, p. 52.

4741. RELIGION, Revolution in. Britain. Henry VIII., the Caligula of Britain, in a fit of anger against the Church of Rome, changed the religion of his kingdom. This was the greatest act of absolute authority ever exercised by one man over an entire nation. The caprice of a king became the conscience of the people, and temporal authority subjugated their souls. The old Catholicism, repudiated by the sovereign, was abandoned to indiscriminate pillage and derision, with its dogmas, hierarchy, clergy, monks, monasteries, ecclesiastical possessions, territorial feuds, hoarded riches, and temples of worship. The Roman Catholic faith became a crime in the kingdom, and its name a scandal and reproach to its followers. National apostasy was as sudden and overwhelming as a clap of thunder; the Catholic nation had disappeared beneath the English nation.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 7.

4742. RELIGION ridiculed. England. [Early reign of Queen Mary.] The restoration of the old worship was followed by outbreaks of bold defiance. A tailor of St. Giles in the Fields shaved a dog with the priestly tonsure. A cat was found hanging in the Cheap, "with her head shorn, and the likeness of a vestment cast over her, with her fore-feet tied together and a round piece of paper like a singing cake between them." Yet more galling were the ballads which were circulated in mockery of the mass, the pamphlets which came from the exiles over sea, the seditious broadsides dropped in the streets, the interludes in which the most sacred acts of the old religion were flouted with ribald mockery.—HIST. OF ENGLISH PEOPLE, § 658.

4743. RELIGION, Romance in. Marriage of Pocahontas. A foraging party of the colonists, . . . having stolen the daughter of Powhatan, demanded of her father a ransom. . . . John Rolfe, "an honest and discreet" young Englishman, an amiable enthusiast, . . . daily, hourly, and, as it were, in his very sleep, heard a voice crying in his ears that he should strive to make her a Christian. . . . After a great struggle of mind and believing prayers, . . . winning the favor of Pocahontas, he desired her in marriage. . . . In the little church of Jamestown . . . Opuchisco, her uncle, gave the bride away.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 4.

4744. RELIGION, Ruled by. Darius. [Artaxerxes, his son.] Being near his father's bed when he was dying, he asked him, a few moments before he expired, what had been the rule of his conduct during so long and happy a reign as his, that he might make it his example. "It has been," replied he, "to do always what justice and religion required of me."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 9, ch. 1, § 1.

4745. RELIGION, Sacrifices for. William Penn. Was born on the 14th of October, 1644. He was the oldest son of Vice-Admiral Sir William Penn, of the British navy. At the age of twelve he was sent to the University of Oxford, where he distinguished himself as a student until he was expelled on account of his religious opinions. Afterward he travelled on the Continent; was again a student at Saumur; returned to study law at London; went to Ireland; became a soldier; heard the preaching of Loe, and was converted to the Quaker faith. His disappointed father drove him out of doors, but he was not to be turned from his course. He publicly proclaimed the doctrines of the Friends; was arrested and imprisoned for nine months in the Tower of London. Being released, he repeated the offence, and lay for half a year in a dungeon at Newgate. A second time liberated, but despairing of toleration for his people in England, he cast his gaze across the Atlantic.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 25, p. 210.

4746. RELIGION OF Savages. West Indians. It was soon discovered that these islanders had their creed, though of a vague and simple nature. They believed in one Supreme Being, inhabiting the sky, who was immortal, omnipotent, and invisible; to whom they ascribed an origin, who had a mother, but no father. They never addressed their worship directly to him, but employed inferior deities, called Zemes, as messengers and mediators. . . . They believed their Zemes to be transferable, with all their powers, and often stole them from each other. When the Spaniards came among them they often hid their idols, lest they should be taken away. They believed that these Zemes presided over every object in nature, each having a particular charge or government. They influenced the seasons and the elements, causing sterile or abundant years; exciting hurricanes and whirlwinds, and tempests of rain and thunder, or sending sweet and temperate breezes and fruitful showers.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 6, ch. 10.

4747. RELIGION, Secularized. Henry IV. Henry had now fully made up his mind to the important measure—the "perilous leap," as he expressed it—which he saw to be indispensably necessary to the peaceable recognition of his rights. A conference took place, . . . and after a deliberation of five hours the king declared himself perfectly satisfied of the truth of the Catholic religion. Two days later he proceeded to St. Denis, where he was met at the door of the church by the Archbishop of Bourges, with seven other prelates. Falling on his knees, Henry solemnly abjured his Calvinistic errors, and made profession of the Catholic, Roman, and Apostolic faith, upon which the archbishop absolved him provisionally, and restored him to the communion of the Church.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 18, § 6.

4748. RELIGION, Signs of. Mahomet. The ceremonies of circumcision, ablution, and the pilgrimage to Mecca he recommended as exterior and visible signs, by which God desired that man should signify his belief of the more speculative tenets of his religion.—TITLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 1, p. 52.

4749. RELIGION, Simple. Scandinavians. The religion of the ancient Scandinavians forms a very curious object of inquiry, and is the more worthy of attention that it was most intimately connected with their manners. Three great moral principles were the foundation of their religion, and influenced their whole conduct. These were, "to serve the Supreme Being with prayer and sacrifice; to do no wrong or unjust actions; and to be valiant and intrepid in fight." These were the principles of the ancient religion, which, although accompanied by a most wild and extravagant mythology, yet resting on this pure and simple basis, had a wonderful effect upon the character and manners of the people.—TITLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 6, p. 28.

4750. RELIGION, State. Colony of Virginia. A.D. 1863. The English Episcopal Church became once more the religion of the State; and though there were not ministers in above a fifth part of the parishes, so that the church was scattered . . . in the wilderness, yet the laws demanded strict conformity, and required of every one to contribute to the support of the Established Church. . . . No Nonconformist might teach, even in private, under pain of banishment; no reader might expound the catechism or the Scriptures. . . . Absence from church was for them [the Quakers] an offence, punishable by a monthly fine of £20 sterling.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 14.

4751. RELIGION, A Statesman's. Bismarck. "I can only hope for forgiveness in a confidence upon the blood of Christ! As a statesman, I am not sufficiently disinterested; in my own mind,

I am rather cowardly ; because it is not easy always to get that clearness on the questions coming before me which grows upon the soil of divine confidence. . . . Among the multitude of sinners who are in need of the mercy of God, I hope that His grace will not deprive me of the staff of humble faith, in the midst of the dangers and doubts of my calling." We observe also that he had his children both baptized and confirmed, and that, if he is unable to attend church, he usually has prayers read by some young clergyman at home.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 631.

4752. RELIGION, A successful. Mahometan. The rapid success which attended the propagation of the religion of Mahomet may be accounted for from a few natural and simple causes. The first of these was certainly that signal favor which attended his arms, and, as we shall immediately see, those of his successors. The martial spirit, when inflamed by the enthusiasm of religion, is irresistible ; and while repeated victories persuaded many of a divine interposition in favor of the Prophet and his law, the terror of his arms inclined others submissively to receive that religion which was propagated by the sword. Neither was it surprising that a religion which adapted itself so entirely to the passions of men should find a number of willing votaries among the luxurious nations of the East.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 1, p. 53.

4753. RELIGION, Suppression of. Jews. As soon as he [Antiochus' general] arrived in Jerusalem, he began by putting a stop to the sacrifices which were offered up to the God of Israel, and suppressing all the observances of the Jewish law. They polluted the temple in such a manner that it was no longer fit for the service of God ; profaned the Sabbaths and other festivals ; forbid the circumcision of children ; carried off and burnt all the copies of the law wherever they could find them ; abolished all the ordinances of God in every part of the country, and put to death whoever was found to have acted contrary to the decree of the king.—ROLIN'S HIST., Book 19, ch. 2, § 3.

4754. RELIGION, Thoughtless. Samuel Johnson. [BOSWELL.] I told him that Goldsmith had said to me a few days before, "As I take my shoes from the shoemaker, and my coat from the tailor, so I take my religion from the priest." I regretted this loose way of talking. JOHNSON : "Sir, he knows nothing ; he has made up his mind about nothing."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 204.

4755. RELIGION, Toleration in. Samuel Johnson. Talking on the subject of toleration one day when some friends were with him in his study, he made his usual remark, that the State has a right to regulate the religion of the people, who are the children of the State. A clergyman having readily acquiesced in this, Johnson, who loved discussion, observed, "But, sir, you must go round to other States than our own. You do not know what a Brahmin has to say for himself. In short, sir, I have got no farther than this : every man has a right to utter what he thinks truth, and every other man has a right to knock him down for it. Martyrdom is the test."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 433.

4756. RELIGION, Vacillation in. Dying King Charles II. Many attributed this apathy to contempt for divine things, and many to the stupor which often precedes death ; but there were in the palace a few persons who knew better. Charles had never been a sincere member of the Established Church. His mind had long oscillated between Hobbism and popery. When his health was good and his spirits high, he was a scoffer. In his few serious moments he was a Roman Catholic.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 404.

4757. RELIGION, Value of. To the State. The Romans knew and valued the advantages of religion, as it is connected with civil government. They encouraged the public festivals which humanize the manners of the people. They managed the arts of divination, as a convenient instrument of policy ; and they respected, as the firmest bond of society, the useful persuasion, that, either in this or in a future life, the crime of perjury is most assuredly punished by the avenging gods.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 37.

4758. REMEDY by Fire. Chinese. There is no science more cultivated by the Chinese than that of medicine, yet there is none in which their knowledge is so contemptible. There is not a physician among them who knows anything of the internal structure of the human body. They determine the nature of all diseases by feeling the pulse, and the most usual cure for any topical affection is searing the parts affected with a hot iron. The foolish belief of an elixir vite is predominant in China, and is a great object of the researches of their physicians.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 24, p. 343.

4759. REMEDY, A strange. Wailing. In Abyssinia . . . a favorite régime for fever is to surround the bed of the patient with old ladies of strong lungs, who howl and wail for several days together, lamenting the prospect of the sufferer's death, and at the least sign of torpor the unhappy victim is instantly buried.—ARPLETON'S CYCLOPEDIA, "ABYSSINIA."

4760. REMORSE, Persecutor's. Charles IX. Charles IX. on his death-bed suffered fearfully from the agonies of remorse in looking back on the atrocities which had disgraced his reign, and which, if not their original author, he had at least culpably sanctioned. His couch was frequently bathed in blood, a natural consequence of his disease ; and this was interpreted by many into a sort of judicial retribution on his crimes.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 16, § 12.

4761. REMORSE, Royal. Edward IV. [The last few] years of his life . . . were not years of ease and prosperity. The chroniclers say that his remorse for the death of Clarence was constant and bitter [his brother, against whom he appeared in person, urging on the false charge of treason. He was found guilty and sentenced to be executed, but was found dead in prison, supposed to be murdered by his connivance], and that he was wont to cry out in rage, "O unfortunate brother, for whose life no man in this world once make request !"—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 11, p. 175.

4762. RENOWN for Honesty. Aristides. The greatest honor which the ancients have done to Aristides is the having bestowed on him the glo rious title of the Just. He gained it, not by one particular occurrence of his life, but by the whole tenor of his conduct and actions.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 2, § 18.

4763. RENOWN of Infamy. Erostratus. One Erostratus had set fire to the temple [of Diana at Ephesus] on purpose. Being put to the torture, in order to force him to confess his motive for committing so infamous an action, he owned that it was with the view of making himself known to posterity, and to immortalize his name, by destroying so noble a structure. The states-general of Asia imagined they should prevent the success of his view by publishing a decree prohibiting the mention of his name. However, their prohibition only excited a greater curiosity; for scarce one of the historians of that age has omitted to mention so monstrous an extravagance, and at the same time to tell us the name of the criminal.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 1.

4764. RENOWN, Literary. Samuel Johnson. [On the death of Dr. Samuel Johnson,] in 1784, it has been said "it was not only the end of a reign, but the end of kingship altogether, in our literary system. For King Samuel has had no successor; nobody since his day, and that of his contemporary Voltaire, has sat on a throne of Literature either in England or France."—G. L. CRAIG, IN KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 5, p. 85.

4765. RENOWN, Noble. Pericles. He was infected with the pestilence. Being extremely ill, and ready to breathe his last, the principal citizens, and such of his friends as had not forsaken him, discoursing together in his bed-chamber about his rare merit, they ran over his exploits, and computed the number of his victories; for while he was generalissimo of the Athenians, he had erected for the glory of their city nine trophies, in memory of as many battles gained by him. They did not imagine that Pericles heard what they were saying, because he seemed to have lost his senses; but it was far otherwise, for not a single word of their discourse had escaped him; when, breaking suddenly from his silence, "I am surprised," says he, "that you should treasure up so well in your memories and extol so highly a series of actions in which fortune had so great a share, and which are common to me with so many other generals; and at the same time should forget the most glorious circumstance in my life—I mean my never having caused a single citizen to put on mourning."—Book 7, ch. 3, § 2.

4766. RENT, Refused. Anti-Rent Party. In the latter part of Tyler's administration the State of New York was the scene of a serious social disturbance. Until the year 1840 the descendants of Van Rensselaer, one of the old Dutch patroons of New Netherlands, had held a claim on certain lands in the counties of Rensselaer, Columbia, and Delaware. In liquidation of this claim they had continued to receive from the farmers certain trifling rents. At last the farmers grew tired of the payment and rebelled. From 1840 until 1844 the question was frequently discussed in the New York Legislature; but no satisfactory settlement was reached. In the latter year the anti-rent party became so bold as to coat with tar and feathers those of their fellow-tenants who made the payments. Officers were sent to apprehend the rioters, and them they killed. Time and again the authorities of the State were invoked to quell the disturbers, and the question in dispute has never been permanently settled.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 56, p. 444.

4767. REPARATION for Disloyalty. Annapolis. A.D. 1774. When it appeared that this offer to burn the tea did not wholly satisfy the crowd, the owner of the brig . . . proposed to devote that also to the flames. The offer was accepted. The penitent importers and owner went on board, and in the presence of a large multitude of gazers they themselves set fire to the packages of tea [2320 pounds], all of which, together with the Peggy Stewart, her canvas, cordage, and every appurtenance, was consumed. [This brig brought tea from London, while the colonies refused to import it and pay the tea-tax, and the Continental Congress was in session considering the whole subject.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 12.

4768. REPARTEE, Apt. John Wesley. "Sir," said a blustering, low-lived man, who attempted to push against John Wesley and throw him down—"sir, I never make way for a fool." "I always do," replied Wesley, stepping aside and passing calmly on.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 386.

4769. REPENTANCE, Attractive. Martin Luther. On one occasion, when they were conversing about repentance, Staupitz said, "There is no true repentance other than that which flows from the love of God and His righteousness." This word penetrated Luther's soul as the sharpened arrow of the warrior. He searched in the Scriptures and found to his sweet joy that all the words of the Bible agreed with the above statement; so that, whereas formerly there was no word in Scripture more bitter to him than repentance, there was now no other word that was sweeter and that sounded more agreeable."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 3, p. 34.

4770. REPENTANCE, Ineffective. Conversion of Whitefield. [The celebrated Rev. George Whitefield sought] purification of soul by prayer, watchings, fastings, alms, and Christian labors among the poor. He passed through a fiery ordeal, . . . spent whole days and weeks prostrate on the ground in prayer, using only bread and sage tea during the forty days of Lent, except on Saturdays and Sundays. . . . He selected the coarsest food, wore patched raiment, uncleaned shoes, and coarse gloves. He prayed till the sweat ran down his face, under the trees, far into the winter nights . . . [But he did not escape his ascetic delusions, until] "by laying hold on the cross by a living faith" he received "an abiding sense of the pardoning love of God, and a full assurance of faith."—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 1, p. 31.

4771. REPENTANCE, Public. John Underhill. A.D. 1640. Having the licentiousness . . . of the soldiers of that age, he had been compelled, at Boston, in a great assembly, on lecture-day, during the session of the general court, dressed in the ruthless habit of a penitent, to stand upon a platform, and with sighs and tears and brokenness of heart to beseech the compassion of the congregation.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

4772. REPENTANCE, Sudden. Samuel Johnson. JOHNSON: "Sir, we are not to judge determinately of the state in which a man leaves this life. He may in a moment have repented effectually, and it is possible may have been accepted of God. There is in 'Camden's Remains' an epitaph upon a very wicked man who was killed by a fall from his horse, in which he is supposed to say,

'Between the stirrup and the ground,
I mercy asked, I mercy found.'

—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 495.

4773. REPRESENTATIVE, Punished in. King of England. The king . . . is above the reach of all courts of law; but his ministers, his indispensable instruments, are answerable for all the measures of government. All misapplications of the public money, all ruinous and improper expeditions, all abuses of power are chargeable to their account; and the Commons, the guardians of the Constitution, have a right to impeach them at the bar of the House of Lords. A minister impeached for misconduct cannot plead in excuse the commands of the sovereign, nor will it avail him, pleading guilty to the charge, to produce the royal pardon. He must suffer as the author of those measures of which he was the instrument; a noble and most effectual antidote against the evils of misgovernment!—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 31, p. 487.

4774. REPRIMAND, Fictitious. La Fayette. [He had complicated relations between France and England by joining the American patriots on his return.] He was received in France with great distinction, which he amusingly describes: "When I went to court, which had hitherto only written for me orders for my arrest, I was presented to the ministers. I was interrogated, complimented, and exiled—to the hotel where my wife was residing. Some days after, I wrote to the king to acknowledge my fault. I received in reply a light reprimand and the colonelcy of the Royal Dragoons. Consulted by all the ministers, and, what was much better, embraced by all the women, I had at Versailles the favor of the king, and celebrity at Paris."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 479.

4775. REPRIMAND of Kindness. Samuel Johnson. He much regretted that his first tutor was dead, for whom he seemed to retain the greatest regard. He said, "I once had been a whole morning sliding in Christ-Church meadows, and missed his lecture in logic. After dinner he sent for me to his room. I expected a sharp rebuke for my idleness, and went with a beating heart. When we were seated, he told me he had sent for me to drink a glass of wine with him, and to tell me he was not angry with me for missing his lecture. This was, in fact, a most severe reprimand."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 71.

4776. REPRISAL, An Honest. Cromwell. An English merchantship was taken in the chops of the Channel, carried into St. Malo, and there confiscated [by the French] upon some groundless pretence. [The master of the ship, an honest Quaker, appealed to the Protector, who told his council that he would take that affair upon himself. He examined the master, and then] he asked him if he could go to Paris with a letter.

The man answered he could. "Well, then," says the Protector, "prepare for your journey, and come to me to-morrow morning." Next morning he gave him a letter to Cardinal Mazzarin, and told him he must stay but three days for an answer. "The answer I mean," says he, "is the full value of what you might have made of your ship and cargo; and tell the Cardinal that if it is not paid you in three days you have express orders from me to return home." The honest, blunt Quaker, we may suppose, followed his instructions to a tittle; but the Cardinal, according to the manner of ministers when they are any way pressed, began to shuffle; therefore the Quaker returned, as he was bid. As soon as the Protector saw him, he asked, "Well, friend, have you got your money?" And upon the man's answering he had not, the Protector told him, "Then leave your direction with my secretary, and you shall soon hear from me." Upon this occasion that great man did not stay to negotiate or to explain, by long, tedious memorials, the reasonableness of his demand. No; though there ~~was a~~ French minister residing here, he did not so much as acquaint him with the story, but immediately sent a man-of-war or two to the Channel, with orders to seize every French ship they could meet with. Accordingly, they returned in a few days with two or three French prizes, which the Protector ordered to be immediately sold, and out of the produce he paid the Quaker what he demanded for his ship and cargo. Then he sent for the French Minister, gave him an account of what had happened, and told him there was a balance, which, if he pleased, should be paid in to him, to the end that he might deliver it to those of his countrymen who were the owners of the French ships that had been so taken and sold.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 16, p. 211.

4777. REPROACH, Escape from. Napoleon I. [During his Egyptian campaign he with a party of scientific men visited Suez. The tide rose twenty feet, and, coming suddenly, they were greatly endangered for a time.] "Had I perished in that manner, like Pharaoh," said Napoleon, "it would have furnished all the preachers in Christendom with a magnificent text against me."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 12.

4778. REPROACH, Gentle. Anaxagoras. [Being destitute he resolved to starve.] Pericles conjured him, in the strongest and most moving terms, not to throw his life away; adding, that it was not Anaxagoras but himself that was to be lamented, if he was so unfortunate as to lose so wise and faithful a friend; one who was so capable of giving him wholesome counsels, in the pressing emergencies of the State. Anaxagoras then, uncovering a little his head, spoke thus to him: "Pericles, those who need the light of a lamp take care to feed it with oil." This was a gentle and at the same time a keen and piercing reproach.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 7, ch. 3, § 2.

4779. REPROOF, Meekness in. Dr. Taylor. [The martyr was burning at the stake.] One of the executioners "cruelly cast a fagot at him, which hit upon his head and brake his face that the blood ran down his visage. Then said Dr. Taylor, 'O friend, I have harm enough—what needed that?'" One more act of brutality brought his sufferings to an end. "So stood he still without either crying or moving, with his hands folded together, till Soyce with a halberd struck him on the head that the brains fell out, and the dead corpse fell down into the fire."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 660.

4780. REPROOF, Underserved. Dr. Arnold. Once at Laleham, when teaching a rather dull boy, he spoke rather sharply to him, when the pupil looked up in his face and said, "Why do you speak angrily, sir? indeed I am doing the best that I can." Years afterward he . . . said, "I never felt so much in my life—that look and that speech I have never forgotten."—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 76.

4781. REPROOF, Undisturbed by. Washington. A gentleman once slept at Mount Vernon in the room . . . [near by] he overheard, through the thin partition, the voice of Mrs. Washington. He could but listen, and it was a certain lecture which she was giving her lord . . . The great man listened in silence till she had done, and then, without a remark upon the subject in hand, said: "Now, good sleep to you, my dear."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 10.

4782. REPUBLIC in Decay. Roman. Thus bloodily ended the Civil War, which the Senate of Rome had undertaken against Cæsar, to escape the reforms which were threatened by his second consulship. They had involuntarily rendered their country the best service which they were capable of conferring upon it, for the attempts which Cæsar would have made to amend a system too decayed to benefit by the process had been rendered forever impossible by their persistence. The free constitution of the Republic had issued at last in elections which were a mockery of representation, in courts of law which were an insult to justice, and in the conversion of the Provinces of the Empire into the feeding-grounds of a gluttonous aristocracy. In the army alone the Roman character and the Roman honor survived.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 25.

4783. REPUBLIC Presaged. John Cabot. In April the fleet left Bristol; and on the morning of the 24th of June, at a point about the middle of the eastern coast of Labrador, the gloomy shore was seen. This was the real discovery of the American continent. Fourteen months elapsed before Columbus reached the coast of Guiana, and more than two years before Ojeda and Vespucci came in sight of the mainland of South America. Cabot explored the shore-line of the country which he had discovered, for several hundred miles. He supposed that the land was a part of the dominions of the Cham of Tartary; but finding no inhabitants, he went on shore, according to the terms of his commission, planted the flag of England, and took possession in the name of the English king. No man forgets his native land; by the side of the flag of his adopted country Cabot set up the banner of the Republic of Venice—auspicious emblem of another flag that should one day float from sea to sea.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 6, p. 77.

4784. REPUTATION, Blemished. Napoleon I. The principal charges brought against Napoleon are the massacre of the [2000] prisoners at Jaffa, and the poisoning of the sick in the hospital there, the execution of the Duke d'Enghien, the invasion of Spain, the divorce of Josephine and the war with Russia.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 12.

4785. REPUTATION, Changeful. Robert Burns. Burns first came upon the world as a prodigy; and was, in that character, entertained by it in the usual fashion, with loud, vague, tumultuous wonder, speedily subsiding into censure and neglect; till his early and most mournful death again awakened an enthusiasm for him, which, especially as there was now nothing to be done, and much to be spoken, has prolonged itself even to our own time.—CARLYLE'S BURNS, p. 14.

4786. REPUTATION, A deceptive. Charles XII. Old Dr. Franklin used to say that if a man makes a sheep of himself, the wolves will eat him. Not less true is it, that if a man is generally supposed to be a sheep, wolves will be very likely to try and eat him. Three kings, neighbors and allies of Charles, hearing on all hands that the young king was a fool, and knowing that he was only a boy in years, concluded that it would be an excellent time to satisfy some ancient grudges against Sweden, and to wrest a few provinces from its territory. . . . Sweden was alarmed. Her old generals were dead, her armies were unused to war, and the king was thought to be a boy—self-willed and incapable. [He proved one of the greatest generals of Europe.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 435.

4787. REPUTATION, Evil. England. There was one province of our island in which, as Propertius had been told, the ground was covered with serpents, and the air was such that no man could inhale it and live. To this desolate region the spirits of the departed were ferried over from the land of the Franks at midnight. A strange race of fishermen performed the ghastly office. The speech of the dead was distinctly heard by the boatmen; their weight made the keel sink deep in the water; but their forms were invisible to mortal eye. Such were the marvels which an able historian, the contemporary of Belisarius, of Simplicius, and of Tribonian, gravely related in the rich and polite Constantinople, touching the country in which the founder of Constantinople had assumed the imperial purple.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 5.

4788. REPUTATION, False. Aristides. Callias, who was a near relation of Aristides, and the most wealthy citizen in Athens, was cited to appear before the judges. The accuser, laying very little stress on the cause itself, reproached him especially with permitting Aristides, and his wife and children, to live in poverty, at a time when he himself rolled in riches. Callias, perceiving that these reproaches made a strong impression on the judges, summoned Aristides to declare before them whether he had not often pressed him to accept of large sums of money, and whether he had not obstinately refused to accept of his offer, giving for answer that he had more reason to boast of his poverty than Callias of his riches; that many persons were to be found who made a good use of their wealth, but that there were few who bore their poverty with magnanimity and even with joy; and that none had cause to blush at their condition but such as had reduced themselves to it by their idleness, their intemperance, their profusion or dissolute conduct. Aristides declared that his kinsman had told nothing but the truth; and added, that a man whose frame of mind is such as to suppress every wish for superfluities and who confines the wants of life within the narrowest limits, besides its freeing him from a thousand importunate cares, and leaving him so much master of his time as to devote it entirely to the public, it approximates him, in some measure to the Deity, who is wholly void of cares or wants. There was no man in the assembly but, at his leaving it, would have chosen to be Aristides, though so poor, rather than Callias with all his riches.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 6, § 17.

4789. REPUTATION, Fictitious. General Charles Lee. A.D. 1776. [An English adventurer who pretended to be an experienced soldier, a man of great audacity and an abominable meddler. Congress made him the second in command of its armies, Washington being the first. New York had been evacuated.] The army sighed for the coming of Lee, not knowing that he had advised to give up the forts in Charleston Harbor without firing a gun. [The brave Moultrie drove away the immense British force, in spite of Lee's interference and opposition, but Lee took the glory, and was promoted.] A New York officer wrote: "He is hourly expected as if from heaven." . . . Yet Lee with all his ill-concealed aspirations, had not one talent of a commander. He could never see anything in its whole, or devise a comprehensive plan of action, but by the habit of his mind would fasten upon some detail and always find fault.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 10.

4790. REPUTATION, Field for. Washington. Early in the session [of the Colonial Congress] John Adams made a powerful address, in the course of which he sketched the condition and wants of the country and of the army. The necessity of appointing a commander-in-chief and the qualities requisite in that high officer were dwelt upon; and then the speaker concluded by putting in nomination George Washington, of Virginia. As soon as his name was mentioned, Washington arose and withdrew from the hall. For a moment he was overpowered with a sense of the responsibility which was about to be put upon him, and to his friend Patrick Henry he said, with tears in his eyes: "I fear that this day will mark the downfall of my reputation." On the 15th of June the nomination was unanimously confirmed by Congress; and the man who had saved the wreck of Braddock's army was called to build a nation.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 38, p. 301.

4791. REPUTATION, Mixed. Alexander. It must be confessed, that good and evil, virtues and vices, were never more equally blended in any prince. But this is not all; for Alexander appears very different, according to the times or circumstances in which we consider him, as Livy has very justly observed. In the inquiry he makes concerning the fate of Alexander's arms, supposing he had turned them toward Italy, he discovers in him a kind of double Alexander: the one wise, temperate, judicious, brave, intrepid, but at the same time prudent and circumspect; the other immersed in all the wantonness of a haughty prosperity; vain, proud, arrogant, fiery; softened by voluptuousness, abandoned to intemperance and excesses; in a word, resembling Darius rather than Alexander; and having made the Macedonians degenerate into all the vices of the Persians, by the new turn of mind and the new manners he assumed after his conquests.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 19.

4792. REPUTATION preserved. Abraham Lincoln. In one respect President Lincoln achieved a wonderful success. He maintained, through the terrible trials of his administration, a reputation, with the great body of the people, for unsullied integrity of purpose and of conduct, which even Washington did not surpass, and which no President since Washington has equalled.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 21, p. 716.

4793. REPUTATION for Probity. Cato. [It is said of Cato the Younger,] his reputation came to be so great that a certain orator, in a cause where only one witness was produced, said to the judges, "One man's evidence is not sufficient to go by, not even if it was Cato's." It grew, indeed, into a kind of proverb, when people were speaking of strange and incredible things, to say, "I would not believe such a thing, though it were affirmed by Cato."—PLUTARCH'S CATO THE YOUNGER.

4794. REPUTATION, Stained. William Pitt. [At the close of the war between England and France, it was proposed in the treaty of peace] that each nation should retain its acquisitions; but [Pitt] delayed the settlement of the epochs, till the fleet of one hundred and fifteen vessels, which had sailed on the very day of his answer to the proposition of Choiseul [the French minister] could make the conquest of Belle-Isle. This is the great stain on the fame of William Pitt. Every object of the war had been accomplished; but he insisted on its continuance for the purpose of making more extended acquisitions.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 17.

4795. REPUTATION for Veracity. James II. He was on the throne; and his first act was to declare that he would defend the Church, and would strictly respect the rights of his people. The estimate which all parties had formed of his character added weight to every word that fell from him. . . . Satire itself had never represented him as a man likely to court public favor by professing what he did not feel, and by promising what he had no intention of performing. On the Sunday which followed his accession, his speech was quoted in many pulpits. "We have now for our church," cried one loyal preacher, "the word of a king, and of a king who was never worse than his word." This pointed sentence was fast circulated through town and country, and was soon the watchword of the whole Tory party.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 413.

4796. REQUEST, Waiting for a. Alexander. We are first to acknowledge and admire, in Alexander, a happy disposition, cultivated and improved by an excellent education. He had a great, noble, and generous soul. He delighted in beneficence and liberality—qualities he had acquired in his infant years. A young lad, whose business it was to gather up and throw the balls when he played at tennis, to whom he had given nothing, taught him a good lesson on that subject. As he always threw the ball to the other players, the king, with an angry air, cried to him, "Am I, then, to have no ball?" "No, Sir," replied the lad, "you do not ask me for it." This witty and ready answer gave great satisfaction to the prince, who fell a laughing, and afterward was very liberal to him.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 19.

4797. RESEMBLANCE, Startling. Christ—Cæsar. Strange and startling resemblance between the fate of the founder of the kingdom of this world and of the Founder of the kingdom not of this world, for which the first was a preparation. Each was denounced for making himself a king. Each was maligned as the friend of publicans and sinners; each was betrayed by those whom he had loved and cared for; each was put to death, and Cæsar also was believed to have risen again and ascended into heaven and become a divine being.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 28.

4798. RESENTMENT, Cruel. Alexander. Alexander, incensed at the opposition he had met with [at Tyre], and the losses his army had sustained, forgot his usual clemency. He ordered the city to be burnt to the ground; 8000 of the inhabitants had been put to the sword, in the final assault and entry of the Macedonians, of the prisoners taken with arms in their hands; 2000 were crucified, and the rest, to the amount of 30,000, sold as slaves. The conduct of Alexander was yet more inhuman on the taking of Gaza, which immediately followed the capture and demolition of Tyre.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4, p. 185.

4799. RESENTMENT, Infamous. Benedict Arnold. In Washington's opinion, there was not in the army "a more active, more spirited, and more sensible officer" than Arnold, the oldest brigadier; but in the promotions he was passed over, on the pretext that Connecticut had already two major-generals. . . . The slight rankled in Arnold's breast; to Washington he complained of the wound to his "nice feelings;" to Gates he wrote, "By heavens, I am a villain if I seek not a brave revenge for my injured honor." [He became an infamous traitor.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 19.

4800. RESENTMENT, Passionate. Maximin. [This Roman emperor had demanded of the virtuous and wealthy widow of the late Emperor Galerius the immediate gratification of his passions by marriage.] On this repulse, the love of Maximin was converted into fury; and, as witnesses and judges were always at his disposal, it was easy for him to cover his fury with an appearance of legal proceedings, and to assault the reputation as well as the happiness of Valeria. Her estates were confiscated, her eunuchs and domestics devoted to the most inhuman tortures; and several innocent and respectable matrons, who were honored with her friendship, suffered death, on a false accusation of adultery. The empress herself, together with her mother Prisca, was condemned to exile.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 14, p. 488.

4801. RESENTMENT of Patriots. Lord Chatham. A.D. 1777. [In the House of Lords he said], "If I were an American as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop was landed in my country, I never would lay down my arms; never, never, never."—BANCROFT'S U.S., vol. 9, ch. 28.

4802. RESENTMENT, Public. To British Taxation. [When the news of the Stamp Act arrived at New York] it was not easy to describe the manner in which the people were affected. "I will wear nothing but homespun," exclaimed one citizen; "I will drink no wine," echoed another, angry that wine must pay a new duty. "I propose," cried a third, "that we dress in sheepskins with the wool on." All expressed their resentment in the strongest manner.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 10.

4803. RESENTMENT, Savage. Greek Emperor Theodore Lascaris. The cruelty of the emperor was exasperated by the pangs of sickness, the approach of a premature end, and the suspicion of poison and magic. The lives and fortunes, the eyes and limbs, of his kinsmen and nobles, were sacrificed to each sally of passion; and before he died, the son of Vataces might deserve from the people, or, at least, from the court, the appellation of tyrant. A matron of the family of the Palæologi had provoked his anger by refusing to bestow her beauteous daughter on the vile plebeian who was recommended by his caprice. Without regard to her birth or age, her body, as high as the neck, was inclosed in a sack with several cats, who were pricked with pins to irritate their fury against their unfortunate fellow-captive.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 62, p. 145.

4804. RESENTMENT withheld. Robbery. Anytus was very fond of Alcibiades, and happening to make an entertainment for some strangers, he desired Alcibiades to give him his company. Alcibiades would not accept of the invitation, but having drank deep with some of his acquaintance at his own house, he went thither to play some frolic. The frolic was this: He stood at the door of the room where the guests were entertained, and seeing a great number of gold and silver cups upon the table, he ordered his servants to take half of them and carry them to his own house; and then, not vouchsafing so much as to enter into the room himself, as soon as he had done this he went away. The company resented the affront, and said he had behaved very rudely and insolently to Anytus. "Not at all," said Anytus, "but rather kindly, since he has left us half, when he knew it was in his power to take the whole."—PLUTARCH'S "ALCIBIADES."

4805. RESENTMENT of Wrongs. The Irish Gentleman. [Being despoiled of their lands the old Milesian proprietor] seldom betook himself to any peaceful calling. Trade, indeed, he thought a far more disgraceful resource than marauding. Sometimes he turned freebooter. Sometimes he contrived, in defiance of the law, to live by coshering—that is to say, by quartering himself on the old tenants of his family, who, wretched as was their own condition, could not refuse a portion of their pittance to one whom they still regarded as their rightful lord. The native gentleman who had been so fortunate as to keep or to regain some of his land too often lived like the petty prince of a savage tribe, and indemnified himself for the humiliations which the dominant race made him suffer by governing his vassals despotically, by keeping a rude harem, and by maddening or stupefying himself daily with strong drink. Politically he was insignificant. No statute, indeed, excluded him from the House of Commons; but he had almost as little chance of obtaining a seat there as a man of color has of being chosen a senator of the United States. In fact, only one Papist had been returned to the Irish Parliament since the Restoration.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 120.

4806. RESERVE, Social. Samuel Johnson. Though a stern, true-born Englishman, and fully prejudiced against all other nations, he had discernment enough to see, and candor enough to censure, the cold reserve too common among Englishmen toward strangers: "Sir (said he), two men of any other nation who are shown into a room together, at a house where they are both visitors, will immediately find some conversation. But two Englishmen will probably go each to a different window, and remain in obstinate silence. Sir, we as yet do not enough understand the common rights of humanity."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 489.

4807. RESIDENCE, Intolerable. Reign of Charles II. If the most fashionable parts of the capital could be placed before us, such as they then were, we should be disgusted with their squalid appearance, and poisoned by their noisome atmosphere. In Covent Garden a filthy and noisy market was held close to the dwellings of the great. Fruit-women screamed, carters fought, cabbage-stalks and rotten apples accumulated in heaps at the thresholds of the Countess of Berkshire and of the Bishop of Durham.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 333.

4808. RESIGNATION, Coercion by. Napoleon I. [The Directory at Paris were alarmed when they learned that in one month Napoleon had become the most famous man in Europe.] They determined to check his career. Kellerman . . . they consequently appointed his associate in command. . . . Napoleon promptly but respectfully tendered his resignation, saying, "One bad general is better than two good ones; war, like government, is mainly decided by tact." This decision brought the Directory immediately to terms.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 5.

4809. RESIGNATION, Easy. Abraham Lincoln. Being informed of the death of [the Confederate] John Morgan, he said, "Well, I wouldn't crow over anybody's death; but I can take this as resignedly as any dispensation of Providence."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 750.

4810. RESIGNATION, Serene. Oriental. Abbassa, the sister of the Caliph of Bagdad, first lost her husband, then was driven from her palace to live in extreme destitution. Her reply to an inquirer into her distress is a celebrated example of serene fortitude among Oriental moralists: "Once I owned a palace and slaves, now I have but two sheepskins to cover me. Heaven must have seen cause to afflict me; I bow to its dispensations and am content."—APPLETON'S CYCLOPEDIA, "ABBASSA."

4811. RESIGNATION, Strength for. Be-reavement. At the siege of Barcelona in 1705, Captain Carleton witnessed the following affecting fact, which he tells us in his memoirs: "I saw an old officer, having his only son with him, a fine young man about twenty years of age, going into their tent to dine. While they were at dinner, a shot took off the head of the son. The father immediately rose up, and first looking down upon his headless child, and then lifting up his eyes to Heaven, while the tears ran down his cheeks, only said, 'Thy will be done.'"

4812. RESISTANCE, Popular. James II. He forced a Roman Catholic president upon a Protestant college. [See more at Timothy Hall, No. 2.] The Bishop of Oxford was quietly installed by proxy, but only two members of Magdalene College attended the ceremony. Many signs showed that the spirit of resistance had spread to the common people. The porter of the college threw down his keys. The butler refused to scratch Hough's name out of the buttery book, and was instantly dismissed. No blacksmith could be found in the whole city who would force the lock of the president's lodgings. It was necessary for the commissioners to employ their own servants, who broke open the door with iron bars.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 277.

4813. ——. Bostonians. A.D. 1765. The daybreak of Wednesday, the 14th of August, saw the effigy of Oliver [the king's stamp officer] tricked out with emblems of Bute and [George] Grenville [late king's ministers] swinging on the bough of a stately elm, the pride of the neighborhood, known as the Great Tree, . . . near the entrance of the town. The pageant had been secretly prepared by Boston mechanics . . . after dark . . . images borne on a bier . . . they passed down the main street, marched directly through the old State House, shouting, . . . "Liberty, Property, no Stamps." They . . . made a funeral pyre for his effigy in front of his own house. [Oliver resigned his office.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 16.

4814. RESISTANCE, Provoked. Legislation. In the Assembly which introduced the resolution the ecclesiastical tithes, which, . . . in the first instance, had been declared redeemable, were abolished, a few days later, without compensation. . . . Against this act of spoliation the Abbé Sieyès protested in a vehement and well-reasoned speech, and the debate was protracted to some length; but the measure was eventually carried by an immense majority. "You have unloosed the bull, M. l'Abbé," observed Mirabeau to Sieyès, "and you must not be surprised if he makes use of his horns."—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 26, § 3.

4815. RESISTANCE, Wisdom in. Massachusetts Patriots. A.D. 1774. Everywhere the rural population . . . were anxiously weighing the issues in which they were involved. One spirit moved through them all. From the hills of Berkshire to the Penobscot they debated the great question of resistance, as though God were hearkening; and they took counsel reverently with their ministers, and the aged, and the pious, and the brave in their villages.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 8.

4816. RESOLUTION, Success by. Patriots. [When Dr. Franklin was examined by a Committee of the whole House of Parliament respecting the disposition of the American colonies, he said, Americans] could do without cloth from England. "I am of opinion, that before their old clothes are worn out they will have new ones of their own making." But, "can they possibly find wool enough in North America?" he was asked. The answer showed the mettle of the people that he represented: "They have taken steps to increase the wool. They entered into general combination to eat no more lamb, and very few lambs were killed last year. This course persisted in will make a prodigious difference in the quantity of wool. The establishment of great manufactories is not necessary; the people will all spin and work for themselves in their own houses."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 18.

4817. RESPECT, Beneficial. Samuel Johnson. To a lady who endeavored to vindicate herself from blame for neglecting social attention to the worthy neighbors, by saying, "I would go to them if it would do them any good," he said, "What good, madam, do you expect to have in your power to do them? It is showing them respect, and that is doing them good."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 133.

4818. RESPONSIBILITY accepted. Bishop Bancroft. [After the revolutionary Government by regency had been proposed] his absence [from the House of Lords] drew on him many contumelious censures; nor have even his eulogists been able to find any explanation of it which raises his character. The plan of regency was his own. He had, a few days before, in a paper written with his own hand, pronounced that plan to be clearly the best that could be adopted. The deliberations of the Lords who supported that plan had been carried on under his roof. His situation made it his clear duty to declare publicly what he thought. Nobody can suspect him of personal cowardice or of vulgar cupidity. It was probably from a nervous fear of doing wrong that, at this great conjuncture, he did nothing; but he should have known that, situated as he was, to do nothing was to do wrong. A man who is too scrupulous to take on himself a grave responsibility at an important crisis ought to be too scrupulous to accept the place of first minister of the Church and first peer of the realm.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 582.

4819. RESPONSIBILITY assumed. Statesmanship. On the 30th of April [1803] the treaty ceding Louisiana to the United States was formally concluded [by Napoleon Bonaparte]. Mr. Monroe and Mr. [Chancellor] Livingston had no authority to negotiate for so vast an extent of territory; but the former was fully possessed of President Jefferson's views, and felt assured that his instructions would have been ample if the condition of France had been foreseen when he sailed from America. Communication with Washington was impossible. Under the most favorable circumstances, an answer could not be expected in less than three months. By that time the British ships would probably hold the mouths of the Mississippi, and the flag of St. George be waving over New Orleans. Monroe and Livingston both realized that hesitation would be fatal; and they boldly took the responsibility of purchasing a territory of unknown but prodigious extent, and of pledging the credit of the Government for a sum which, rated by the ability to pay, was larger than a similar pledge to-day for five hundred millions of dollars. . . . The total cost of Louisiana was, . . . in round numbers, $15,000,000. [See more at No. 2929.] —BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, vol. 1, p. 7.

4820. RESPONSIBILITY, Awed by. Continental Congress, July 1, 1776. The order of the day came next, and Congress resolved itself "into a committee of the whole to take into consideration the resolution respecting independence." For a few moments perfect silence prevailed; every one felt the responsibility of acting finally on the most important question ever agitated in the assembly.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 69.

4821. RESPONSIBILITY evaded. John Wildman. His hatred of monarchy had induced him to engage in a long series of conspiracies, first against the Protector, and then against the Stuarts. But with Wildman's fanaticism was joined a tender care for his own safety. He had a wonderful skill in grazing the edge of treason. No man understood better how to instigate others to desperate enterprises by words which, when repeated to a jury, might seem innocent, or, at worst, ambiguous. Such was his cunning, that, though always plotting, though always known to be plotting, and though long malignantly watched by a vindictive government, he eluded every danger, and died in his bed, after having seen two generations of his accomplices die on the gallows.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 487.

4822. RESPONSIBILITY, Impressed by. Pericles. Whenever he was to appear in the assembly, before he came out of his house he used to say to himself, "Remember, Pericles, that thou art going to speak to men born in the arms of liberty; to Greeks, to Athenians."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 7, ch. 7, § 7.

4823. RESPONSIBILITY, Individual. Frederick the Great. [With base perfidy he captured Silesia in a time of general peace.] The selfish rapacity of the King of Prussia gave the signal to his neighbors. His example quieted their sense of shame. His success led them to underrate the difficulty of dismembering the Austrian monarchy. The whole world sprang to arms. On the head of Frederick is all the blood which was shed in a war which raged during many years and in every quarter of the globe—the blood of the column of Fontenoy, the blood of the brave mountaineers who were slaughtered at Culloden. The evils produced by this wickedness were felt in lands where the name of Prussia was unknown; and, in order that he might rob a neighbor whom he had promised to defend, black men fought on the coast of Coromandel, and red men scalped each other by the great lakes of North America.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 32.

4824. RESPONSIBILITY by Indulgence. William Prince of Orange. The French invasion produced a complete change. The suffering and terrified people raged fiercely against the government. In their madness they attacked the bravest captains and the ablest statesmen of the distressed Commonwealth. De Ruyter was insulted by the rabble. De Witt was torn in pieces before the gate of the palace of the States-General at the Hague. The Prince of Orange, who had no share in the guilt of the murder, but who, on this occasion, as on another lamentable occasion twenty years later, extended to crimes perpetrated in his cause an indulgence which has left a stain on his glory, became chief of the Government without a rival.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 204.

4825. RESPONSIBILITY, Knowledge gives. Alabama Claims. The claim of the United States against the British Government for damages done to American commerce by Confederate cruisers during the Civil War still remained unsettled. These cruisers had been built and equipped in English ports, and with the knowledge of the English Government. Such a proceeding was in plain violation of the law of nations, even if the independence of the Confederate States had been recognized. Time and again Mr. Seward remonstrated with the British authorities, but without effect. After the war Great Britain became alarmed at her own conduct, and grew anxious for a settlement of the difficulty. On the 27th of February, 1871, a joint high commission, composed of five British and five American statesmen, assembled at Washington City. From the fact that the cruiser Alabama had done most of the injury complained of, the claims of the United States were called THE ALABAMA CLAIMS. After much discussion, the commissioners framed a treaty, known as the Treaty of Washington, by which it was agreed that all claims of either nation against the other should be submitted to a board of arbitration to be appointed by friendly nations. Such a court was formed, and in the summer of 1872 convened at Geneva, Switzerland. The cause of the two nations was impartially heard, and on the 14th of September decided in favor of the United States; Great Britain was obliged, for the wrongs that she had done, to pay into the Federal treasury $15,500,000.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 67, p. 556.

4826. RESPONSIBILITY, Official. Emperor Julian. The Cæsar had rejected, with abhorrence, a mandate for the levy of an extraordinary tax; a new superindiction, which the præfect had offered for his signature; and the faithful picture of the public misery, by which he had been obliged to justify his refusal, offended the court of Constantius. . . . After stating his own conduct, he proceeds in the following terms: "Was it possible for the disciple of Plato and Aristotle to act otherwise than I have done? Could I abandon the unhappy subjects intrusted to my care? Was I not called upon to defend them from the repeated injuries of these unfeeling robbers? A tribune who deserts his post is punished with death, and deprived of the honors of burial. With what justice could I pronounce his sentence, if, in the hour of danger, I myself neglected a duty far more sacred and far more important? God has placed me in this elevated post, His providence will guard and support me. Should I be condemned to suffer, I shall derive comfort from the testimony of a pure and upright conscience. Would to Heaven that I still possessed a counsellor like Sallust! If they think proper to send me a successor, I shall submit without reluctance; and had much rather improve the short opportunity of doing good than enjoy a long and lasting impunity of evil."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 19, p. 245.

4827. RESPONSIBILITY of Power. Against Slavery. The slavery agitation was a necessity of the Northern theory of government. Duty is the correlative of power; and if the Government at Washington, in Yankee estimation, was a consolidated organization, with power to promote the general welfare by any means it might deem expedient, it was proper that it should overthrow the hated institution of slavery at the South. The central Government was responsible for its continuance or existence, in proportion to its power over it. Under these circumstances, the duty of acting on the subject of slavery was imperative, and amounted to a moral necessity.—POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 13, p. 294.

4828. RESTITUTION, Conscientious. Cromwell. Notice, also, that when he was at Cambridge he won some money at gambling: £20, £50, £100. All these sums now were returned as moneys upon no principle his own.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 47.

4829. RESTRAINT, Difficult. Luther. [He was denounced as worthy of excommunication.] Concerning himself Luther says: "I cannot deny that I am more violent than I ought to be; they know that, and for that very reason ought not to have excited the dog! How hard it is to temper the heat and restrain the pen, thou knowest from personal experience. This is the reason why I have always been unwilling publicly to proclaim my cause. And the more I am disposed not to do so, the more I am compelled against my will; and this happens because of the severest accusations which are heaped upon God's Word and myself. And so shameful has this been, that even if my pen and my impetuosity had not carried me away, a heart of stone would have been moved to take up arms; how much the more I that am impetuous by nature, and possess not a very dull pen!"—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 7, p. 68.

4830. RESULTS, Decisive. Admiral Nelson. [When Nelson found, after a long search, the French fleet at Alexandria, he prepared for battle, and] exclaimed that before the morrow his fate would be a peerage or Westminster Abbey.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 20, p. 355.

4831. RESULTS, Far-reaching. Nationality. Captain Argall was sent with an armed vessel to the coast of Maine. The avowed object of the voyage was to protect the English fishermen who frequented the waters between the Bay of Fundy and Cape Cod, but the real purpose was to destroy the colonies of France, if any should be found within the limits of the territory claimed by England [which he did]. . . . On his way back to Virginia he made a descent on the Dutch traders of Manhattan Island, destroyed many of their huts, and compelled the settlers to acknowledge the sovereignty of England. The result of these outrageous proceedings was to confine the French settlements in America to the banks of the St. Lawrence, and to leave a clear coast for the English flag from Nova Scotia to Florida.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 11, p. 109.

4832. RESURRECTION hinted. By Ancients. [Callicratidas was defeated by the Athenians near Arginusæ.] When it was known at Athens that the dead bodies had been left without interment, the people were highly enraged, and caused the whole weight of their resentment to fall upon those whom they deemed guilty of that crime. The ancients held it a great one not to provide sepulture for the dead; and we may observe, that, after all their battles, the first care of the conquered, notwithstanding the sense of their misfortune and their great affliction for a bloody defeat, was to demand a suspension of arms from the victor, in order to pay the last duties to those who had fallen in battle, upon which they believed their happiness in another life depended. They had little or no idea of the resurrection of the body; but, however, the Pagans, by the soul's concern for the body after death, the religious regard paid to it, and the zeal with which they rendered solemn honors to the dead, showed that they had some confused notion of a resurrection, which subsisted among all nations, and descended from the most ancient tradition, though they could not clearly distinguish it. [The victorious generals were sentenced to death for this neglect.] ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 8, ch. 2, § 5.

4833. RETALIATION, Popular. Virginia Colonists. [The Stamp Act was passed.] Soon they resolved that the act should recoil on England, and began to be proud of frugality; articles of luxury of British manufacture were banished, and threadbare coats were most in fashion.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 13.

4834. RETIREMENT, Religious. William Cowper. Mrs. Unwin's influence produced the Moral Satires. "The Task" was born of a more potent inspiration. One day Mrs. Jones, the wife of a neighboring clergyman, came into Olney to shop, and with her came her sister, Lady Austen, the widow of a baronet, a woman of the world, who had lived much in France, gay, sparkling and vivacious, but, at the same time, full of feeling even to overflowing. The apparition acted like magic on the recluse. He desired Mrs. Unwin to ask the two ladies to stay to tea; then shrank from joining the party which he had himself invited; ended by joining it, and, his shyness giving way with a rush, engaged in animated conversation with Lady Austen, and walked with her part of the way home. On her an equally great effect appears to have been produced. A warm friendship at once sprang up, and before long Lady Austen had verses addressed to her as Sister Annie. Her ladyship, on her part, was smitten with a great love of retirement. . . . That a woman of fashion, accustomed to French salons, should choose such an abode, with a pair of Puritans for her only society, seems to show that one of the Puritans, at least, must have possessed great powers of attraction.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 5.

4835. RETORT, A crushing. Samuel Johnson. However unfavorable to Scotland, he uniformly gave liberal praise to George Buchanan as a writer. In a conversation concerning the literary merits of the two countries, in which Buchanan was introduced, a Scotchman, imagining that on this ground he should have an undoubted triumph over him, exclaimed, "Ah, Dr. Johnson, what would you have said of Buchanan had he been an Englishman?" "Why, Sir (said Johnson, after a little pause), I should not have said of Buchanan, had he been an Englishman, what I will now say of him as a Scotchman—that he was the only man of genius his country ever produced."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 487.

4836. RETORT, A sarcastic. Richard I. Richard . . . of England was satiated with the glory and misfortunes of his first adventure; and he presumed to deride the exhortations of Fulk of Neuilly, who was not abashed in the presence of kings. "You advise me," said Plantagenet, "to dismiss my three daughters, pride, avarice, and incontinence; I bequeath them to the most deserving; my pride to the knights templars, my avarice to the monks of Cisteaux, and my incontinence to the prelates."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 60, p. 60.

4837. RETALIATION declined. Bajazet. [He was the great Ottoman general.] No sooner was Timour informed that the captive Ottoman was at the door of his tent, than he graciously stepped forward to receive him, seated him by his side, and mingled with just reproaches a soothing pity for his rank and misfortune. "Alas!" said the emperor, "the decree of fate is now accomplished by your own fault; it is the web which you have woven, the thorns of the tree which yourself have planted. I wished to spare, and even to assist, the champion of the Moslems; you braved our threats; you despised our friendship; you forced us to enter your kingdom with our invincible armies. Behold the event. Had you vanquished, I am not ignorant of the fate which you reserved for myself and my troops. But I disdain to retaliate; your life and honor are secure; and I shall express my gratitude to God by my clemency to man."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65, p. 267.

4838. RETRACTION refused. Alexander H. Stephens. [Judge Cone of Georgia attacked Stephens with a dirk-knife because of threats supposed to have been made by the latter, who was a small man and a semi-invalid.] Stephens, half fainting, fell upon his back. The giant Cone was at his throat in a moment; his head, by a grip of iron, was held against the cruel floor; the keen and blood-dripping knife was held aloft before him ready for the last fatal thrust, but still the poor, pale face of the little hero was set and defiant—his black eyes still flashed undauntedly. "Retract, or I'll cut your cursed throat!" hissed Cone. "Cut! I'll never retract!" gasped the almost lifeless Stephens. Like a flash the knife came down. With an almost superhuman effort the prostrate man caught it in his right hand. Clean through the muscles, tendons, and bones of the hand it cut, then stuck fast and reached no vital part. With desperate strength Cone tried to wrench it free. With a grasp almost of death the horribly mangled and mutilated hand still held it fast. In the struggle Stephens was once more dragged to his feet. The blood was rushing in streams from his many wounds. His hold upon the knife which sought his brave heart began to relax. He was dying. But even when he believed the next moment would be his last strong men came to his relief. The madman

Cone was secured and held fast.—NORTON'S ALEX. H. STEPHENS, ch. 3, p. 27.

4839. RETREAT, Hasty. Battle of Spurs. The English army advanced in August, 1513, and sat down before the walls of Térouanne. They were here joined by the eccentric Emperor Maximilian, who, after contracting to serve in the ranks as a volunteer, at the rate of 100 crowns a day, soon contrived to gratify his vanity by assuming the direction of the operations of the siege. A French force was dispatched to relieve Térouanne, under the orders of the Duke of Longueville. . . . The two armies met on the 16th of August, between Térouanne and Blangis, when, after a brief encounter, the French gendarmerie consulted their safety by a flight so precipitate that the day has become known in history as the "Battle of the Spurs."—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 13, § 8.

4840. ———. "Battle of Spurs." [In 1513, 10,000 French gendarmes, at the siege of Térouanne, were seized with some inexplicable panic at the first shock with the cavalry of the Emperor Maximilian and fled hastily from the field.] The French themselves, laughing at the panic-stricken flight of their army, called this "The Battle of the Spurs."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 16, p. 268.

4841. RETREAT impossible. Battle of Xeres. [The Saracens invaded Spain and overthrew the Goths.] Notwithstanding the valor of the [5000] Saracens [under Tarik] they fainted under the weight of multitudes, and the plain of Xeres was overspread with 16,000 of their dead bodies. "My brethren," said Tarik, to his surviving companions, "the enemy is before you, the sea is behind, whither would ye fly? Follow your general; I am resolved either to lose my life or to trample on the prostrate king of the Romans."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 253.

4842. RETREAT, Masterly. Battle of Brooklyn. At first the army seemed ruined. . . . It seemed an easy thing for Clinton and Howe to press on and capture all the rest. Yet, in a few hours, Washington brought together his shattered forces, reorganized his brigades, and stood ready for an assault in the trenches back of Brooklyn. During the 28th Howe, who was a sluggish, sensual man, ate pudding and waited for a fitter day. On the 29th there was a heavy fog over island and bay and river. Washington, clearly perceiving that he could not hold his position, and that his army was in great peril, resolved to withdraw to New York. The enterprise was extremely hazardous, requiring secrecy, courage and dispatch. By eight o'clock on that memorable night every boat and transport that could be obtained was lying at the Brooklyn ferry. There, under cover of the darkness, the embarkation began. Washington personally superintended every movement. All night with muffled oars the boatmen rowed silently back and forth, bearing the patriots to the northern side of the channel. At daylight on the following morning just as the last boat-load was leaving the wharf the movement was discovered by the British. They rushed into the American intrenchments, and found nothing there except a few worthless guns. After a severe battle which had cost him nearly 400 men, Howe had gained possession of Long Island—and nothing more. General

Greene, who was a competent judge, declared that Washington's retreat was the most masterly he had ever read or heard of.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 39, p. 312.

4843. RETRIBUTION begun. Lord Counselor Jeffreys. [James II. had fled to France.] And now the day of retribution had arrived. The Trimmer [Lord Halifax] was walking through Wapping, when he saw a well-known face looking out of the window of an ale-house. He could not be deceived. The eyebrows, indeed, had been shaved away. The dress was that of a common sailor from Newcastle, and was black with coal-dust; but there was no mistaking the savage mouth and eye of Jeffreys. The alarm was given. In a moment the house was surrounded by hundreds of people shaking bludgeons and bellowing curses. The fugitive's life was saved by a company of the train-bands, and he was carried before the lord mayor. . . . When the great man, at whose frown a few days before the whole kingdom had trembled, was dragged into the justice room begrimed with ashes, half dead with fright, and followed by a raging multitude, the agitation of the unfortunate mayor rose to the height. He fell into fits, and was carried to his bed, whence he never rose. Meanwhile the throng without was constantly becoming more numerous and more savage. Jeffreys begged to be sent to prison. . . . Two regiments of militia were drawn out to escort him, and found the duty a difficult one. It was repeatedly necessary for them to form, as if for the purpose of repelling a charge of cavalry, and to present a forest of pikes to the mob. The thousands who were disappointed of their revenge pursued the coach, with howls of rage, to the gate of the Tower, brandishing cudgels, and holding up halters full in the prisoner's view. The wretched man, meantime, was in convulsions of terror. He wrung his hands; he looked wildly out, sometimes at one window, and sometimes at the other, and was heard even above the tumult crying, "Keep them off, gentlemen! for God's sake keep them off!" At length . . . he was lodged in the [Tower] fortress, where some of his most illustrious victims had passed their last days, and where his own life was destined to close in unspeakable ignominy and horror.—MACAULAY'S Eng., ch. 10, p. 517.

4844. RETRIBUTION overlooked. Napoleon I. [Reared in an infidel age.] Having never been taught any correct ideas of probation or retribution, the question whether a few thousand illiterate peasants should eat, drink and sleep for a few years more or less, was in his view of little importance compared with those great measures of political wisdom which should meliorate the condition of Europe for ages. It is Christianity alone which stamps importance upon each individual life.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLÉON B., vol. 1, ch. 1.

4845. RETRIBUTION, Sanitary. Black Assize. In the year 1577 the jail fever raged in the county jail at Oxford, and spread from the prison to the court, and from the court to the town. In the course of forty hours the lord chief baron (as the presiding judge was called), the high sheriff, the jurymen, and all who were in the court room, to the number of three hundred, died of this malignant disease. The citizens fled in terror from the town, and, ever after, that session of the court was called the "Black Assize."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., "JOHN HOWARD," p. 62.

4846. RETRIBUTION, Sense of. Charles II. [In his last words before laying his head on the block] he acknowledged, with true Christian humility, that although innocent before the law of the crimes for which he was about to suffer, his conscience told him that he had been guilty of many faults and weaknesses, for which he accepted without a murmur his present death as a meet and salutary expiation. "I basely ratified," said he, in allusion to the fate of Strafford, "an unjust sentence, and the similar injustice I am now to undergo is a seasonable retribution for the punishment I inflicted on an innocent man."—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 47.

4847. REVENGE, Bloody. Sepoy Rebellion. As the Highlanders came to one of General Wheeler's dead daughters tied naked to the ground, having been subjected to treatment worse than death, they sat down, and cutting off her hair, divided it, with pale countenances and wrathful eyes, between them. Each one then slowly counted the number of threads he had, and with a solemn, fearful oath, swore that for each hair one man should die. An oath he more than kept.—GENERAL GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 328.

4848. REVENGE, Characteristic. American Indian. In case of death by violence, the departed shade could not rest till appeased by a retaliation. His kindred would "go a thousand miles for the purpose of revenge, over hills and mountains; through large cane swamps, full of grapevines and briars; over broad lakes, rapid rivers, and deep creeks; and all the way endangered by poisonous snakes, exposed to the extremities of heat and cold, to hunger and thirst" . . . often continuing from generation to generation . . . tribe against tribe . . . peace was restored by atoning presents.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

4849. REVENGE, Condescension of. Maria Theresa. [The empress-queen of Austria had been robbed of the province of Silesia by Frederick II.] Though the haughtiest of princesses, though the most austere of matrons, she forgot in her thirst for revenge both the dignity of her race and the purity of her character, and condescended to flatter the low-born and low-minded concubine, who, having acquired influence by prostituting herself, retained it by prostituting others. Maria Theresa actually wrote with her own hand a note full of expressions of esteem and friendship to her dear cousin, the daughter of the butcher Poisson, the wife of the publican D'Etiolles, the kidnapper of young girls for the Parc-aux-cerfs—a strange cousin for the descendant of so many emperors of the West!—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 77.

4850. REVENGE on the Dead. Paris. The fall of his [Louis XIII.] odious favorite [Concini] was hailed with extravagant delight by the citizens of Paris; the frantic populace disinterred his corpse, dragged it through the streets, tore it in pieces, and burned it to ashes.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 19, § 2.

4851. ———. Hanged. [On the 30th of Jan. 1661, after the restoration of Charles II., Evelyn records]: "This day (O the stupendous and inscrutable judgments of God!) were the carcasses of those arch-rebels Cromwell, Bradshaw (the judge who condemned his majesty [Charles I.], and Ireton (son-in-law to the Usurper), dragged out of their superb tombs in Westminster, among the kings, to Tyburn, and hanged on the gallows there from nine in the morning till six at night, and then buried under that fatal and ignominious monument, in a deep pit; thousands of people who had seen them in all their pride being spectators."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 15, p. 248.

4852. REVENGE declined. Matthew Hale. A man who had done Sir Matthew Hale a great injury came afterward to him for his advice in the settlement of his estate. Sir Matthew gave his advice very frankly to him, but would accept of no fee for it; and thereby showed, both that he could forgive as a Christian, and that he had the spirit of a gentleman, not to take money of one who had wronged him so grievously. When he was asked how he could use a man so kindly who had wronged him so much, his answer was, he thanked God he had learned to forget injuries.

4853. REVENGE, Determined. Woman's. [Mary Queen of Scots had strong hatreds. Murray and his adherents were the objects of her wrath in 1567, and she declared she would rather peril her crown than lose her revenge.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 9, p. 139.

4854. REVENGE, Dishonorable. Siege of Gaza. At length, after repeated assaults, the city was taken by storm, and its brave inhabitants perished almost to a man. The governor, Betis, whose noble defence of his country was worthy of the applause even of an enemy, was dragged round the walls of the city at the wheels of Alexander's chariot. "The king," says Curtius, "gloried that, in this instance, he imitated the example of his progenitor, Achilles, in the vengeance he took on the dead body of Hector."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4, p. 185.

4855. REVENGE, Female. Parysatis. [She was the mother of Cyrus. The captured family of Hydarnes, the Persian governor, were] delivered to Parysatis, to do with them as that mother, exasperated to the last excess by the treatment either done or intended against her daughter Hamestris, should think fit. That cruel princess began by causing Roxana, whose beauty had been the occasion of all this evil, to be sawed in two, and ordered all the rest to be put to death, except Statira, whose life she granted to the tears and the most tender and ardent solicitations of Arsaces . . . Such was the state of the affair at the death of Darius. Statira, as soon as her husband was upon the throne, caused Udiastes [the assassinator of her brother Teriteuchmes] to be delivered into her hands. She ordered his tongue to be torn out, and made him die in the most exquisite torments she could invent, to punish the crime which had occasioned the ruin of her family. . . . Parysatis on her side took her revenge on the son of Teriteuchmes, whom she caused to be poisoned; and we shall see that Statira's turn was not very remote. History has not a more tragical scene, nor a more monstrous complication of adultery, incest, and murder; which, after having occasioned great disorders in the royal family, terminated at length in the most fatal manner to all who had any share in it.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 9, ch. 1, § 1.

4857. REVENGE, Ignoble. Reign of Charles II. Sir John Coventry, a country gentleman, had, in debate, sneered at the profligacy of the court. In any former reign he would probably have been called before the Privy Council and committed to the Tower. A different course was now taken. A gang of bullies was secretly sent to slit the nose of the offender. This ignoble revenge, instead of quelling the spirit of opposition, raised such a tempest that the king was compelled to submit to the cruel humiliation of passing an act which attainted the instruments of his revenge, and which took from him the power of pardoning them.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 191.

4858. REVENGE, Implacable. Wife of Belisarius. From this pleasing and perhaps voluntary delusion, Belisarius [the Roman general] was awakened at Syracuse by the officious information of Macedonia; and that female attendant, after requiring an oath for her security, produced two chamberlains, who, like herself, had often beheld the adulteries of Antonina. A hasty flight into Asia saved Theodosius from the justice of an injured husband, who had signified to one of his guards the order of his death; but the tears of Antonina and her artful seductions assured the credulous hero of her innocence; and he stooped, against his faith and judgment, to abandon those imprudent friends who had presumed to accuse or doubt the chastity of his wife. The revenge of a guilty woman is implacable and bloody; the unfortunate Macedonia, with the two witnesses, were secretly arrested by the minister of her cruelty; their tongues were cut out, their bodies were hacked into small pieces, and their remains were cast into the sea of Syracuse.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 185.

4859. REVENGE, Ingenious. Picture. When Attila took possession of the royal palace of Milan, he was surprised and offended at the sight of a picture which represented the Cæsars seated on their throne, and the princes of Scythia prostrate at their feet. The revenge which Attila inflicted on this monument of Roman vanity was harmless and ingenious. He commanded a painter to reverse the figures and the attitudes; and the emperors were delineated on the same canvas approaching in a suppliant posture to empty their bags of tributary gold before the throne of the Scythian monarch.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 35, p. 445.

4860. REVENGE of Injustice. Jail Fever. Howard went into one of those dungeons that was twenty-four steps below the surface, and another that was thirty-seven; but they were usually ten or twelve feet under ground, with two small windows about two feet square. The floor was littered with what had been once straw, but which was soon ground into powder when the dungeon was dry, and into paste when it was damp. Damp it usually was, and chilly, and foul, and stinking, to a degree that only the heroic benevolence of a Howard could have borne to remain in it voluntarily. On this pulverized and rotten straw, teeming with vermin and surcharged with poisonous odors, the walls and ceiling exceeding filthy, the prisoners slept, covered in winter with a damp and filthy rug. The jail fever, of course, raged in all such prisons, and often spread into the towns. It was common for judges, lawyers, and jurymen to catch that malignant disease from the prisoners whom they tried; the bar and the bench of England . . . lost some of their brightest ornaments from this most deadly of fevers.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 44.

4861. REVENGE, Personal. James Hamilton. Murray, guardian of the infant King James and dictator of the kingdom, governed the unhappy country with vigor and address. But a proscribed gentleman of good family, James Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh, whose wife Murray had left to die in misery and madness on the threshold of her own dwelling, which had been bestowed by the regent on Bellenden, one of his partisans, swore to avenge at once his wife and his country. Gathering a handful of the earth which covered the bier of his wife, he wore it within his girdle as an eternal incentive to revenge; and repairing in disguise to the small town of Linlithgow, through which Murray had to pass on his return to Edinburgh, he placed himself at a window, fired upon and killed the regent. He then mounted a horse ready for him behind the house, and by swift flight escaped the regent's guards. "I alone," cried the dying Murray, "could have saved the church, the kingdom, and the king; anarchy will now devour them all!"—LAMARTINE'S QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 38.

4862. ———. Napoleon I. [When in exile at Elba he said:] "I never revenged myself for a personal injury during the whole course of my life."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 23.

4863. REVENGE, Savage. Husband's. [Robert, the pusillanimous Emperor of Constantinople.] The amorous youth had neglected his Greek bride, the daughter of Vataces, to introduce into the palace a beautiful maid, of a private though noble family of Artois; and her mother had been tempted by the lustre of the purple to forfeit her engagements with a gentleman of Burgundy. His love was converted into rage; he assembled his friends, forced the palace gates, threw the mother into the sea, and inhumanly cut off the nose and lips of the wife or concubine of the emperor.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 61, p. 117.

4864. REVENUE, Ancient. Roman. From the faint glimmerings of such doubtful and scattered lights, we should be inclined to believe, first, that (with every fair allowance for the difference of times and circumstances) the general income of the Roman provinces could seldom amount to less than fifteen or twenty millions of our money; and, secondly, that so ample a revenue must have been fully adequate to all the expenses of the moderate government instituted by Augustus, whose court was the modest family of a private senator, and whose military establishment was calculated for the defence of the frontiers, without any aspiring views of conquest, or any serious apprehension of a foreign invasion.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6, p. 189.

4865. REVENUE from Injustice. Turks. The patrimony of the sultan arises, in a great measure, from the confiscation of the estates of the viziers and bashaws; and when he has occasion to supply his private purse, it costs him only the condemnation of one of these unfortunate grandees. On the whole, the revenues of the Turkish empire are very inconsiderable. But the absolute power of the sultan supplies that defect, and can execute very great projects at a small expense.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 13, p. 213.

4866. REVENUE, Mismanaged. Reign of George III. A.D. 1763. Heavy complaints were made that the system of making all the revenue offices in America sinecure places, had led to such abuses that an American annual revenue of less than £2000 cost the establishment of the customs of Great Britain between seven and eight thousand pounds a year.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 5.

4867. REVERENCE, Excessive. Obsequious. William Pitt . . . is said to have knelt when he was with George II. in his closet, and to have bowed so low at the levee that his hooked nose was seen between his legs.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 16, p. 252.

4868. REVERENCE, Maternal. Alexander. He used to send magnificent presents to his mother; but then he never would let her have any concern in the affairs of the government. She used frequently to make very severe complaints upon that account; but he always submitted to her ill-humor with great mildness and patience. Antipater having one day written a long letter against her, the king, after reading it, replied, "Antipater does not know that one single tear shed by a mother will obliterate ten thousand such letters as this."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 9.

4869. REVERENCE for Parents. Ancients. Cyrus the Great, in the midst of his conquests, and at the most brilliant era of his good fortune, would not accept of the advantageous offer made him by Cyaxares, his uncle, of giving him his daughter in marriage, and Media for her dowry, till he had first advised with his father and mother and obtained their consent. History informs us here, that among the Persians, a son, how great and powerful soever he might be, never dared to seat himself before his mother till he had first obtained her leave; and that to do otherwise was considered as a crime.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 16, § 9.

4870. REVERENCE, Religious. [When the Romans offered their sacrifices, if] one of the horses that drew the chariots called Tensæ, in which are placed the images of the gods, happened to stumble, or if the charioteer took the reins in his left hand, the whole procession was to be repeated. And in later ages they have set about one sacrifice thirty several times on account of some defect or inauspicious appearance in it. Such reverence have the Romans paid to the Supreme Being.—PLUTARCH.

4871. REVERSES, Benefit of. The English. The reverses which compelled them, after a long and bloody struggle, to relinquish the hope of establishing a great continental empire, were really blessings in the guise of disasters. The spirit of the French was at last aroused. They began to oppose a vigorous national resistance to the foreign conquerors; and from that time the skill of the English captains and the courage of the English soldiers were, happily for mankind, exerted in vain. After many desperate struggles, and with many bitter regrets, our ancestors gave up the contest.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 19.

4872. REVOLT suppressed. Soldiers. About the middle of the same month the New Jersey brigade stationed at Pompton revolted. This movement Washington quelled by force. General Robert Howe marched to the camp with five hundred regulars and compelled twelve of the principal mutineers to execute the two leaders of the revolt. From that day order was completely restored. Those insurrections had a good rather than a bad effect; Congress was thoroughly alarmed, and immediate provisions were made for the better support of the army. An agent was sent to France to obtain a further loan of money. Robert Morris was appointed secretary of finance; the Bank of North America was organized; and, although the outstanding debts of the United States could not be paid, yet all future obligations were promptly met, for Morris and his friends pledged their private fortunes to sustain the credit of the government.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 44, p. 346.

4873. REVOLUTION by Contagion. America—France. Shortly after the American Declaration of Independence, signed on the 4th of July, 1776, three deputies from the new Republic—Benjamin Franklin, Arthur Lee, and Silas Deane—arrived in Paris to solicit aid from France in the struggle against the mother country. Their presence created an extraordinary sensation; and the enthusiasm thus produced was undoubtedly one of the causes which contributed powerfully to the subsequent outbreak of the Revolution.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 25, § 2.

4874. REVOLUTION, Instantaneous. Puritans. Calling a council of his officers, a remonstrance was framed, to be presented to the Parliament, reminding them that it was averse to the spirit of a democracy that any set of magistrates should be perpetual, and desiring that they might immediately think of dissolving, after issuing writs for the election of a new Parliament

This application, it may be imagined, met with a sharp reply, which was nothing more than what Cromwell wished and expected. Before the smallest hint had transpired of his design, he now presented himself with three hundred soldiers at the door of the House of Commons. Leaving his guards without, he took his seat for some time and listened to their debates; then, rising hastily up: "I judge," said he, "this Parliament to be ripe for dissolution" (taking one of the members by the cloak). "You," said he, "are a whoremaster;" to another, "You are a drunkard," and (to a third), "You are an extortioner. The Lord hath done with you, get you gone, you are no longer a Parliament." Then, stamping with his foot, which was a signal for the soldiers to enter, "Here," said he, pointing to the mace which lay on the table, "take away that fool's bauble;" then, ordering the soldiers to drive all the members out of the house, he locked the door himself, put the key into his pocket, and went home to his lodgings in Whitehall. Thus, by one of the boldest actions recorded in history, the famous Republic of England, which had subsisted four years and three months, was annihilated in one moment. — TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30, p. 413.

1875. REVOLUTIONS, Injustice brings. History. [Foss in "Judges of England" says,] one of the primary causes of the great rebellion that overthrew the Government, and that cost the king his head, was the degradation of the bench of justice.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 28, p. 447.

1876. REVOLUTIONS, Retrograde. Restoration of Charles II. Revolutions are of two kinds: they are either progressive or reactionary. A revolution of progress is often destructive, sweeping away much which should have been preserved. But such a revolution has a regenerating force; it renews the youth of a nation, and gives free play to its vital powers. Lost limbs are replaced by new. A revolution of reaction, on the other hand, is a benumbing influence, paralyzing effort, and levelling character. In such a conservative revolution the mean, the selfish, and the corrupt come to the top; man seeks ease and enjoyment rather than duty; virtue, honor, patriotism, and disinterestedness disappear altogether from a society which has ceased to believe in them. . . . The Restoration of 1660 was such a revolution.—PATTISON'S MILTON, ch. 12.

1877. REWARD, Destitute of. Captain John Smith. Extreme sufferings from his wounds and the ingratitude of his employers were the fruits of his services. He received, for his sacrifices and perilous exertions, not one foot of land, not the house he built, not the field his own hands had planted, nor any reward but the applause of his own conscience and the world. He was the father of Virginia, the true leader who first planted the Saxon race within the borders of the United States.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 4.

1878. REWARD of Gratitude. General Grant. During his visit [to New York, 1867], a purse of $100,000 was made up for him by the citizens. . . . Previous to this, Philadelphia had given him $30,000; Galena, a house and furniture, and Boston a library. If he had been an Englishman, and rendered such services to his country as he had to the Union, he would have received twice as much, and an estate and titles besides.—HEADLEY'S GRANT, p. 240.

4879. REWARD, Unexpected. By Alexander. This prince was naturally of a tender and humane disposition, which made him sensible of the affliction of persons in the lowest condition. A poor Macedonian was one day driving before him a mule laden with gold for the king's use: the beast being so tired that he was not able either to go on or sustain the load, the mule-driver took it up and carried it, but with great difficulty, a considerable way. Alexander, seeing him just sinking under his burden, and going to throw it on the ground, in order to ease himself, cried out, "Friend, do not be weary yet; try and carry it quite through to thy tent, for it is all thy own."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 12.

4880. RICH, Duty of the. Epaminondas. Though poor himself, and without any estate, his very poverty, by drawing upon him the esteem and confidence of the rich, gave him the opportunity of doing good to others. One of his friends being in great necessity, Epaminondas sent him to a very rich citizen, with orders to ask him for 1000 crowns in his name. That rich man coming to his house, to know his motives for directing his friend to him upon such an errand: "Why," replied Epaminondas, "it is because this honest man is in want, and you are rich."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 12, § 7.

4881. RICHES, Avarice with. Pythius. [He was a Lydian prince residing at Celsæne.] He presented great Xerxes with a sum equal to about £1,700,000 sterling. After such a conduct as this, who would not think that Pythius's peculiar characteristic and particular virtue had been generosity, and a noble contempt of riches? And yet he was one of the most penurious princes in the world; and who, besides his sordid avarice with regard to himself, was extremely cruel and inhuman to his subjects, whom he kept continually employed in hard and fruitless labor, always digging in the gold and silver mines which he had in his territories. When he was absent from home, his subjects went with tears in their eyes to the princess his wife, laid their complaints before her and implored her assistance. Commiserating their condition, she made use of a very extraordinary method to work upon her husband, and to give him a clear notion and a palpable demonstration of the folly and injustice of his conduct. On his return home, she ordered an entertainment to be prepared for him, very magnificent in appearance, but what in reality was no entertainment. All the courses and services were of gold and silver; and the prince, in the midst of all these rich dishes and splendid rarities, could not satisfy his hunger. He easily divined the meaning of this enigma, and began to consider that the end of gold and silver was not merely to be looked upon, but to be employed and made use of, and that to neglect, as he had done, the business of husbandry and the tilling of land, by employing all his people in digging and working of mines, was the direct way to bring a famine both upon himself and his country. For the future, therefore, he only reserved a fifth part of his people for the business of mining.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 2, § 2.

4882. RICHES in Contentment. Phocion. [Alexander made Phocion, the Athenian, a present of] a hundred talents. When the money was brought to Athens, Phocion asked the persons employed in that commission, "Why, among all the citizens of Athens, he should be singled out as the object of such bounty?" "Because," said they, "Alexander looks upon you as the only honest and good man." "Then," said Phocion, "let him permit me always to retain that character, as well as really to be that man." The envoys then went home with him, and when they saw the frugality that reigned there, his wife baking bread, himself drawing water, and afterward washing his own feet, they urged him the more to receive the present. They told him, "It gave them real uneasiness, and was, indeed, an intolerable thing, that the friend of so great a prince should live in such a wretched manner." At that instant a poor old man happening to pass by, in a mean garment, Phocion asked the envoys, "Whether they thought worse of him than of that man?" As they begged of him not to make such a comparison, he rejoined, "Yet that man lives upon less than I do, and is contented. In one word, it will be to no purpose for me to have so much money, if I do not use it; and if I was to live up to it, I should bring both myself and the king, your master, under the censure of the Athenians." Thus, the money was carried back from Athens, and the whole transaction was a good lesson to the Greeks, "That the man who did not want such a sum of money was richer than he who could bestow it."—PLUTARCH'S "PHOCION."

4883. RICHES despised. "Under the Feet." The general of Amurath, Evrenos, who had abjured the God of the Greeks for the Ailah of Mahomet, and who was conquering antique Greece to the Ottomans, signalized himself by presents that were the spoils of the islands and the continent of the Adriatic. Two hundred young Greek slaves of his own race, chosen among the flower of the youth and beauty of Thessaly, opened the market of his cortège of tributaries. Ten of these slaves carried upon their heads golden plates filled with Venetian ducats; ten others, silver plates filled with sequins; eighteen more had golden and silver goblets, to lave the fingers; the rest, cups, crystals, Venetian glasses, in which precious stones were incrustated in transparency. All these marvels, which the Ottomans call satschou (or things to be thrown under the feet), were, in fact, strewn beneath the feet of Bajazet and his affianced.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 251.

4884. RICHES, Joy in. Sudden. Among all the concubines of Mithridates that were brought before Pompey, he touched not one, but sent them to their parents or husbands; for most of them were either daughters or wives of the great officers and principal persons of the kingdom. But Stratonice, who was the first favorite, and had the care of a fort where the best part of the king's treasure was lodged, was the daughter of a poor old musician. She sung one evening to Mithridates at an entertainment, and he was so much pleased with her that he took her to his bed that night, and sent the old man home in no very good humor, because he had taken his daughter without condescending to speak one kind word to him. But when he waked next morning, he saw tables covered with vessels of gold and silver, a great retinue of eunuchs and pages, who offered him the choice of rich robes, and before his gate a horse with such magnificent furniture as is provided for those who are called the king's friends. All this he thought nothing but an insult and burlesque upon him, and therefore prepared for flight; but the servants stopped him, and assured him that the king had given him the house of a rich nobleman lately deceased, and that what he saw was only the first fruits—a small earnest of the fortune he intended him. At last he suffered himself to be persuaded that the scene was not visionary; he put on the purple, and mounted the horse, and, as he rode through the city, cried out, "All this is mine." The inhabitants, of course, laughed at him; and he told them they should not be surprised at this behavior of his, but rather wonder that he did not throw stones at them.—PLUTARCH'S POMPEY.

4885. RICHES, Power with. Philip. It is said that having one day consulted the oracle of Delphi, he received the following answer: "Make coin thy weapons, and thou'lt conquer all."

The advice of the priestess became his rule, and he applied it with great success. He boasted that he had carried more places by money than arms; that he never forced a gate till after having attempted to open it with a golden key; and that he did not think any fortress impregnable into which a mule laden with silver could find entrance. It has been said that he was a merchant rather than a conqueror; that it was not Philip, but his gold, which subdued Greece, and that he bought its cities rather than took them. He had pensioners in all the commonwealths of Greece, and retained those in his pay who had the greatest share in the public affairs. And, indeed, he was less proud of the success of a battle than that of a negotiation, well knowing that neither his generals nor his soldiers could share in the honor of the latter.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 14, § 1.

4886. RICHES slighted. Solon. [He was one of the Seven Wise Men of Greece. He visited Sardis, and was shown the treasures of Croesus—name proverbial for wealth.] When Solon had seen all, he was brought back to the king. Croesus then asked him which of mankind in all his travels he had found the most truly happy? "One Tellus," replied Solon, "a citizen of Athens, a very honest and good man, who, after having lived all his days without indigence, having always seen his country in a flourishing condition, has left children that are universally esteemed, has had the satisfaction of seeing those children's children, and at last died gloriously in fighting for his country."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 4.

4887. RICHES, Superseded. Grecians. [The Persians invaded Greece.] While Xerxes was continuing his march, some deserters from Arcadia came and joined his army. The king having asked them what the Grecians were then doing, was extremely surprised when he was told that they were employed in seeing the games and combats then celebrating at Olympia; and his surprise was still increased when he understood that the victor's reward in those engagements was only a crown of olive. "What men must they be," cried one of the Persian nobles, with great wonder and astonishment, "who are influenced only by honor, and not by money?"—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 2, § 7.

4888. RICHES, Tendency of. Degrading. The opulence of Sybaris was soon followed by luxury, and such a dissoluteness of manners as is scarcely credible. The citizens employed themselves in nothing but banquets, games, shows, parties of pleasure, and carousals. Public rewards and marks of distinction were bestowed on those who gave the most magnificent entertainments; and even to such cooks as were best skilled in the important art of making new discoveries in dressing dishes, and inventing new refinements to please the palate. The Sybarites carried their delicacy and effeminacy to such a height that they carefully removed from their city all such artificers whose work was noisy, and would not suffer any cocks in it, lest their shrill piercing crow should disturb their balmy slumbers.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 2, § 2.

4889. RICHES, Uncertain. Dionysius. It is certain that Dionysius, who had seen himself master of Syracuse, and of almost all Sicily, who had possessed immense riches, and had had numerous fleets and great armies of horse and foot under his command; that the same Dionysius, reduced now almost to beggary, and from a king become a schoolmaster, was a good lesson for persons of exalted stations; warning them not to confide in their grandeur, nor to rely too much upon their fortune.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 10, ch. 2, § 6.

4890. RIDICULE changed. By Puritans. From the Reformation to the civil war almost every cavalier, gifted with a fine sense of the ludicrous, had taken some opportunity of assailing the straight-haired, snuffling, whining saints, who christened their children out of the book of Nehemiah, who groaned in spirit at the sight of Jack in the Green, and who thought it impious to taste plum and porridge on Christmas day. At length a time came when the laughers began to look grave in their turn. The rigid, ungainly zealots, after having furnished much good sport during two generations, rose up in arms, conquered, ruled, and, grimly smiling, trod down under their feet the whole crowd of mockers.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 371.

4891. RIDICULE conquered. Napoleon I. [See No. 5033. His aristocratic school-fellows ridiculed his origin and poverty.] In consequence of this state of feeling, he secluded himself almost entirely from his fellow-students, and buried himself in the midst of his books and maps. While they were wasting their time in dissipation and in frivolous amusements, he consecrated his days and nights, with untiring assiduity, to study. He almost immediately elevated himself above his companions, and by his superiority commanded their respect. Soon he was regarded as the brightest ornament of the institution.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 1.

4892. RIDICULE cures Cowardice. Arab. [When Mahomet approached Mecca with an army of followers, the inhabitants rose en masse to resist him.] One of the oldest of them having refused to march on account of his corpulence, "Perfume thyself," said his fellow-citizens, "for thou art but a woman." He blushed at the reproach, and joined the march.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 106.

4893. RIDICULE, Defended by. Cæsar. This treason [of Cleopatra] opened Antony's eyes, and made him, when too late, give credit to what his friends had told him of the queen's perfidy. In this extremity he was for signalizing himself by an extraordinary act of valor, capable, in his opinion, of doing him abundance of honor. He sent to challenge Cæsar to a single combat. Cæsar made answer, that if Antony was weary of life, there were other ways to die besides that.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 24, § 3.

4894. RIDICULE of Greatness. Julian. As long as the fame of the Emperor Julian was doubtful, the buffoons of the palace, who were skilled in the language of satire, tried the efficacy of those arts which they had so often practised with success. They easily discovered that his simplicity was not exempt from affectation; the ridiculous epithets of a hairy savage, of an ape invested with the purple, were applied to the dress and person of the philosophic warrior; and his modest despatches were stigmatized as the vain and elaborate fictions of a loquacious Greek, a speculative soldier, who had studied the art of war amid the groves of the academy.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 22, p. 370.

4895. RIDICULE, Public. Reign of James II. [A period of great agitation for the preservation of the Protestant faith from the aims of a Catholic king.] Tyrconnel [lord-lieut. of Ireland] had transmitted for the royal approbation the heads of a bill repealing the law by which half the soil of Ireland was held, and he had sent to Westminster, as his agents, two of his Roman Catholic countrymen who had lately been raised to high judicial office: Nugent, chief justice of the Irish Court of King's Bench, a personification of all the vices and weaknesses which the English then imagined to be characteristic of the Popish Celt; and Rice, a baron of the Irish Exchequer, who, in abilities and attainments, was perhaps the foremost man of his race and religion. The object of the mission was well known; and the two judges could not venture to show themselves in the streets. If ever they were recognized, the rabble shouted, "Room for the Irish ambassadors;" and their coach was escorted with mock solemnity by a train of ushers and harbingers bearing sticks with potatoes stuck on the points. So strong and general, indeed, was at that time the aversion of the English to the Irish, that the most distinguished Roman Catholics par took of it.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 396.

4896. RIDICULE punished. Of Religion. [When Methodism was first introduced into Reading, Penn.,] there was a shop in the neighborhood of the school-house where some young men used to meet together. One of the company undertook to mimic the Methodists. He went on to show how they acted in their meetings. He shouted, clapped his hands, and then he would show how they fell down. He then threw him self down on the floor, and lay there as if asleep. His companions enjoyed the sport; but after he had lain for some time they wondered why he did not get up. They shook him in order to awake him. They saw he did not breathe; they turned pale; they sent for a physician, who examined the man and pronounced him dead. This awful incident stopped ridicule and persecution. —STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 3, p. 429.

4897. RIDICULE, Reformation by. Lanes. Alcibiades and Nicias, who were persons of the greatest interest in Athens, had each his party; but perceiving that the people were going to proceed to the Ostracism, and that one of them was likely to suffer by it, they consulted together, and joining interests, caused it to fall upon Hyperbolus [who was a mean wretch]. Hereupon the people, full of indignation at finding this kind of punishment dishonored and turned into ridicule, abolished it entirely. —PLUTARCH'S ARISTIDES.

4898. RIDICULE, Revolution by. Welsh. The Barons of Snowdon, with other noblemen of the most considerable families in Wales, had attended Llewellyn [Prince of Wales] to London, when he came thither at Christmas, A.D. 1277, to do homage to King Edward. . . . Their large retinues were quartered in Islington and the neighboring villages. These places did not afford milk enough for such numerous trains; they liked neither wine nor the ale of London, and though plentifully entertained, were much displeased at a new manner of living which did not suit their taste, nor perhaps their constitutions. They were still more offended at the crowds of people that flocked about them when they stirred abroad, staring at them, as if they had been monsters, and laughing at their uncouth garb and appearance. They were so enraged on this occasion, that they engaged privately in an association to rebel on the first opportunity, and resolved to die in their own country rather than ever come again to London, as subjects, to be held in such derision; and when they returned home they communicated their resentments to their compatriots, who made it the common cause of their country. —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 25, p. 384.

4899. RIDICULE, Unconscious of. George III. On the 9th of January, 1770, the Parliament was opened by the king [George III.]. With a singular want of perception of the ridiculous, the first words of the royal speech were these: "My lords and gentlemen, it is with much concern that I find myself obliged to open the session of Parliament with acquainting you that the distemper among the horned cattle has lately broke out in this kingdom." —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 19, p. 300.

4900. RIDICULE, Unfelt. Diogenes. Diogenes, the philosopher, when one said, "They deride you," answered well, "But I am not derided," accounting those only to be ridiculed who feel the ridicule and are discomposed at it. —PLUTARCH'S FABIVS MAXIMUS.

4901. RIDICULE, Warning in. Whitefield. In the days of Whitefield, Thorpe, one of his most violent opponents, and three others, laid a wager who could best imitate and ridicule Whitefield's preaching. Each was to open the Bible at random, and preach an extempore sermon from the first verse that presented itself. Thorpe's three competitors each went through the game with impious buffoonery. Then, stepping upon the table, Thorpe exclaimed, "I shall beat you all!" They gave him the Bible, and, by God's inscrutable providence, his eye fell first upon this verse, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." He read the words, but the sword of the Spirit went through his soul in a moment, and he preached as one who scarce knew what he said. The hand of God laid hold upon him, and, intending to mock, he could only fear and tremble. When he descended from the table, a profound silence reigned in the company, and not one word was said concerning the wager. Thorpe instantly withdrew, and after a season of the deepest distress passed into the full light of the Gospel, and became a most successful preacher of its grace.

4902. RIGHT of Might. English Earls. [Edward I. attempted to limit the independence of the old barons.] Immediately after his landing he appointed a commission of inquiry into the judicial franchises then existing, and on its report (of which the existing "Hundred-Rolls" are the result) itinerant justices were sent, in 1278, to discover by what right these franchises were held. The writs of quo warranto were roughly met here and there. Earl Warenne bared a rusty sword, and flung it on the justices' table. "This, sirs," he said, "is my warrant. By the sword our fathers won their lands when they came over with the Conqueror, and by the sword we will keep them." —HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 263.

4903. — —. William III. On the opening of the contest with France, William III. . . . was false to the principle of liberty of the seas,—prohibiting all commerce with France—and to the protest of Holland gave no other reply than that it was his will, and that he had power to make it good. —BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

4904. — —. Triumph of the Independents. To save its party from an entire defeat, the army interposed, and "purged" the House of Commons. "Hear us," said the excluded members to Colonel Pride, who expelled them. "I cannot spare time," replied the soldier. "By what right are we arrested?" demanded they of the extravagant Hugh Peters. "By the right of the sword," answered the late envoy from Massachusetts. —BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 11.

4905. RIGHT by Precedent. Napoleon I. A.D. 1803. [The British suddenly attacked all French vessels of every kind, without previous declaration of war, and made prisoners of seamen. The First Consul retaliated by suddenly imprisoning all Englishmen in France.] The cabinet of St. James remonstrated energetically against Napoleon's capture of peaceful travellers upon the land. Napoleon replied, "You have seized unsuspecting voyagers upon the sea." England rejoined, "It is customary to capture everything upon the ocean belonging to the enemy, and therefore it is right." Napoleon answered, "I will make it customary to do the same thing upon the land, and then that will also be right." —ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 26.

4906. RIGHT and Wrong. Boundaries. A good action is not distinguished from a bad action by marks so plain as those which distinguish a hexagon from a square. There is a frontier where virtue and vice fade into each other. Who has ever been able to define the exact boundary between courage and rashness, between prudence and cowardice, between frugality and avarice, between liberality and prodigality? Who has ever been able to say how far mercy to offenders ought to be carried, and where it ceases to deserve the name of mercy and becomes a pernicious weakness? What casuist, what law-giver, has ever been able nicely to mark the limits of the right of self-defence? All our jurists hold that a certain quantity of risk to life or limb justifies a man in shooting or stabbing an assailant; but they have long given up in despair the attempt to describe, in precise words, that quantity of risk.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 368.

4907. RIGHTS asserted. Captain William Wadsworth. A.D. 1693. [Fletcher, by royal commission, assumed to command Connecticut trainbands. The colonists claimed command of their own militia.] Hartford was . . . a community of farmers, the unmixed progeny of Puritans. William Wadsworth, the senior captain of the town [was exercising his men]. Fletcher advances, to assume command, ordering Bayard, of New York, to read his commission and the royal instructions. It is the fortune of our America, that if, at any moment, the happiness of a state depended on the will of one man, that man was true to his duty. At the order of Captain Wadsworth the drums began to roll. . . . The petulant Fletcher commanded silence. "I will not"—such had been his words to the Governor of Connecticut—"I will not set my foot out of this colony till I have seen his Majesty's commission obeyed." And Bayard . . . once more began to read. "Drum, drum, I say!" shouted Wadsworth, adding, as he turned to the governor of New York, "if I am interrupted again, I will make the sun shine through you in a moment." [Governor Fletcher retired.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 19.

4908. RIGHTS ignored. By Ruler. Charles II. seemed to regard the British Empire as personal property, to be used for the benefit of himself and his courtiers. In order to reward the worthless profligates who thronged his court, he began to grant to them large tracts of land in Virginia. What did it matter that these lands had been redeemed from the wilderness and were covered with orchards and gardens? It was no uncommon thing for an American planter to find that his farm, which had been cultivated for a quarter of a century, was given away to some dissolute flatterer of the royal household. Great distress was occasioned by these iniquitous grants, until finally, in 1673, the king set a limit to his own recklessness by giving away the whole State. Lord Culpepper and the Earl of Arlington, two ignoble noblemen, received under the great seal a deed by which was granted to them for thirty-one years all the dominion of land and water called Virginia.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 12, p. 11.

4909. RIGHTS, Importance of. "Squatter Sovereignty." In January of 1854 Senator Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, brought before the Senate of the United States a proposition to organize the territories of Kansas and Nebraska. In the bill reported for this purpose a clause was inserted providing that the people of the two territories, in forming their constitutions, should decide for themselves whether the new States should be free or slave-holding. This was a virtual repeal of the Missouri Compromise; for both the new territories lay north of the parallel of 36° 35'. Thus by a single stroke the old settlement of the slavery-question was to be undone. From January till May Mr. Douglas' report, known as the Kansas-Nebraska Bill, was debated in Congress. All the bitter sectional antagonisms of the past were aroused in full force. The bill was violently opposed by a majority of the representatives from the East and North; but the minority, uniting with the Congressmen of the South, enabled Douglas to carry his measure through Congress, and in May of 1854 the bill received the sanction of the President.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 59, p. 472.

4910. RIGHTS, Maintenance of. By Exercise. [When the British Parliament repealed the Stamp Act and withdrew all the taxes except 3d. on each pound of tea, the tea duties were retained] upon the principle that there must always be one tax to keep up the right.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 20, p. 310.

4911. RIGHTS, Petition of. Reign of Charles I. [The last Parliament but one before the Revolution.] There were, to our minds, some extraordinary subjects of debate, especially on the king's claim to commit without cause shown on the face of the warrant. "The greatest question," exclaimed Pym, "that ever was in this place or elsewhere!" Selden and Coke both spoke upon it. "What," answered Coke, "shall I accept such law? Shall I have a state of inheritance for life, or for years, in my land, and shall I be a tenant at will, for my liberty! A freeman to be a tenant at will for his freedom! There is no such tenure in all Littleton." We follow with earnest interest those discussions in which Elliot took so great and prominent a part, out of which came into existence the immortal Petition of Rights. These are great debates; greater debates are not recorded in history. "Magna Charta is such a fellow," said Coke, "he will have no sovereign." The great charter of the people's liberties was upheld and strengthened by the Petition of Rights.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 3, p. 72.

4912. RIGHTS, Sentimental. Political. By an apparent contradiction not difficult to reconcile, many of those who fought bravely for the right of the abolitionists to be heard in Congress by petition were yet enraged with them for continually, and, as they thought, causelessly raising and pressing the issue. They were willing to fight for the right of the abolitionists to do a certain thing, and then willing to fight the abolitionists for aimlessly and uselessly doing it. The men who were governed by these complex motives were chiefly Whigs.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, vol. 1, p. 24.

4913. RIOT, Night of. Flight of James II. [William, Prince of Orange, with an army of invasion and an English army of welcome, was drawing near to London.] When the night—the longest night, as it chanced, of the year—approached, forth came from every den of vice, from the bear-garden at Hockley, and from the labyrinth of tippling-houses and brothels in the Friars, thousands of housebreakers and highwaymen, cut-purses and ring-droppers. With these were mingled thousands of idle apprentices, who wished merely for the excitement of a riot. Even men of peaceable and honest habits were impelled by religious animosity to join the lawless part of the population; for the cry of No Popery—a cry which has more than once endangered the existence of London—was the signal for outrage and rapine. First the rabble fell on the Roman Catholic places of worship. The buildings were demolished. Benches, pulpits, confessionals, breviaries, were heaped up and set on fire. A great mountain of books and furniture blazed on the site of the convent at Clerkenwell. Another pile was kindled before the ruins of the Franciscan house in Lincoln's Inn Fields. The chapel in Lyme Street, the chapel in Bucklersbury, were pulled down. The pictures, images, and crucifixes were carried along the streets in triumph, amid lighted tapers torn from the altars. The procession bristled thick with swords and staves, and on the point of every sword and of every staff was an orange. —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 514.

4914. RISING, Early. Washington. During the whole of both his public and private life he was a very early riser. . . . Whether as chief magistrate or the retired citizen, we find this man of method and labor seated in his library from one to two hours before day in winter and at daybreak in summer. —CUSTIS WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 1.

4915. RITUALISM rejected. Catholic. Many felt a strong repugnance even to things indifferent which had formed part of the polity or ritual of the mystical Babylon. Thus Bishop Hooper, who died manfully at Gloucester for his religion, long refused to wear the episcopal vestments. Bishop Ridley, a martyr of still greater renown, pulled down the ancient altars of his diocese, and ordered the Eucharist to be administered in the middle of churches, at tables which the papists irreverently termed oyster-boards. Bishop Jewel pronounced the clerical garb to be a stage dress, a fool's coat, a relic of the Amorites, and promised that he would spare no labor to extirpate such degrading absurdities. Archbishop Grindal long hesitated about accepting a mitre from dislike of what he regarded as the mummery of consecration. Bishop Parkhurst uttered a fervent prayer that the Church of England would propose to herself the Church of Zurich as the absolute pattern of a Christian community. Bishop Ponet was of opinion that the word bishop should be abandoned to the papists, and that the chief officers of the purified Church should be called superintendents. None of these prelates belonged to the extreme section of the Protestant party. —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 47.

4916. RIVAL, A successful. Mary Queen of Scots. Mary had, after a few days of marriage, abandoned her transient fondness for the youth she imagined she had loved, conceived a coolness for Darnley [her husband], and became again prodigal of everything toward Rizzio [an Italian musician and courtier], on whom she lavished power and honors, violating the almost sacred etiquette of the times by admitting him to her table in her private apartments, and suppressing the name of the king in public papers, substituted that of Rizzio. Scotland found she had two kings, or, rather, the nominal king disappeared to give place to the favorite. —LAMARTINE'S QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 19.

4917. RIVAL, An unsuspected. Brother. A beautiful female, a matron in rank, a prostitute in manners, had instructed the younger Andronicus [son of the Greek Emperor Andronicus] in the rudiments of love; but he had reason to suspect the nocturnal visits of a rival; and a stranger passing through the street was pierced by the arrows of his guards, who were placed in ambush at her door. That stranger was his brother, Prince Manuel, who languished and died of his wound; and the Emperor Michael, their common father, whose health was in a declining state, expired on the eighth day, lamenting the loss of both his children. However guiltless in his intention, the younger Andronicus might impute a brother's and a father's death to the consequence of his own vices; and deep was the sigh of thinking and feeling men when they perceived, instead of sorrow and repentance, his ill-dissembled joy on the removal of two odious competitors. —GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 63, p. 177.

4918. RIVALRY, Business. Fulton's First Steamboat. The Clermont was immediately put upon the river as a packet-boat, and plied between New York and Albany until the close of navigation, being always crowded with passengers. Enlarged during the winter, she resumed her trips in the spring of 1808, and continued to run with great success, and with profit to her owners. It was long, however, before the river boatmen were disposed to tolerate this new and terrible rival. At first, it is said, they fled in affright from the vicinity of the monster, fearing to be set on fire or run down by her. Afterward, regaining their courage, they made so many attempts to destroy her that the Legislature of the State passed a special act for her protection. —CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 159.

4919. RIVALRY an Obstacle. Politics. [During the invasion of England by the Dutch, led by William, Prince of Orange,] a considerable number of peers . . . came, with Sancroft at their head, to present a petition, praying that a free and legal Parliament might be called, and that a negotiation might be opened with the Prince of Orange. . . . Unexpected difficulties arose. Halifax became first cold and then adverse. It was his nature to discover objections to everything; and on this occasion his sagacity was quickened by rivalry. The scheme, which he had approved while he regarded it as his own, began to displease him as soon as he found that it was also the scheme of Rochester, by whom he had been long thwarted and at length supplanted, and whom he disliked as much as it was in his easy nature to dislike anybody. Nottingham was at that time much under the influence of Halifax. They both declared that they would not join in the address if Rochester signed it. —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 465.

4920. RIVALRY, Talent vs. Money. Rome. At the time when Pompey returned from his Asiatic expedition, Cæsar held the office of prætor. The ambitious spirit of Pompey could brook neither a superior nor an equal. Crassus, a man of mean talents, but of a restless and ambitious spirit, had, by means of his enormous wealth, gained a very considerable party to his interest; for money at Rome could always insure popularity, and thus render even the weakest of men formidable to the liberties of their country. Thus, with the greatest inequality of talents, Pompey and Crassus were rivals in the path of ambition; and Cæsar, who at this time aspired to the consulate, and was well aware that, by courting exclusively either of the rivals, he infallibly made the other his enemy, showed the reach of his political genius by artfully effecting a reconciliation between them, and thus securing the friendship of both.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1, p. 400.

4921. ROADS, Improvement of. Reign of Charles II. It was only in fine weather that the whole breadth of the road was available for wheeled vehicles. Often the mud lay deep on the right and the left, and only a narrow track of firm ground rose above the quagmire. At such time obstructions and quarrels were frequent, and the path was sometimes blocked up during a long time by carriers, neither of whom would break the way. It happened, almost every day, that coaches stuck fast, until a team of cattle could be procured from some neighboring farm to tug them out of the slough. But in bad seasons the traveller had to encounter inconveniences still more serious.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 347.

4922. ROBBER, An honored. Jermack the Cossack. About the end of the sixteenth century a Cossack chief of the name of Jermack, who followed the profession of a robber, and was the leader of a gang of banditti, was the means of adding to the Russian empire all that immense tract of country known by the name of Siberia. He had long infested the Russian borders by his depredations, till at last, being taken prisoner with the greatest part of his followers, and condemned to suffer death, he threw himself upon the clemency of the czar, and offered, on condition of receiving a pardon, to point out an easy conquest of an immense extent of empire unknown to the Russians. His offer was accepted, the czar approved of the expedition, and Jermack set out as the general of a regular army for the conquest of Siberia, then in the hands of the Tartars. This expedition was attended with all the success that could be wished.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 34, p. 473.

4923. ROBBERS, Honored. Reign of Charles II. It is related how Claude Duval, the French page of the Duke of Richmond, took to the road, became captain of a formidable gang, and had the honor to be named first in the royal proclamation against notorious offenders; how, at the head of his troop, he stopped a lady's coach, in which there was a booty of four hundred pounds; how he took only one hundred, and suffered the fair owner to ransom the rest by dancing a co-ranto with him on the heath; how his vivacious gallantry stole away the hearts of all women; how his dexterity at sword and pistol made him a terror to all men; how, at length, in the year 1670, he was seized when overcome by wine; how dames of high rank visited him in prison, and with tears interceded for his life; how the king would have granted a pardon but for the interference of Judge Morton, the terror of highwaymen, who threatened to resign his office unless the law was carried into full effect; and how, after the execution, the corpse lay in state with all the pomp of scutcheons, waxlights, black-hangings, . . . till the same cruel judge who had intercepted the mercy of the crown sent officers to intercept the obsequies.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 356.

4924. ROBBERS, Hunting. Blood-hounds. The parishes were required to keep blood-hounds for the purpose of hunting the freebooters. Many old men who were living in the middle of the eighteenth century could well remember the time when those ferocious dogs were common; yet, even with such auxiliaries, it was found impossible to track the robbers to their retreats among the hills and morasses, for the geography of that wild country was very imperfectly known.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 265.

4925. ROBBERS, Success of. Reign of Charles II. The public authorities seem to have been often at a loss how to deal with these enterprising plunderers. At one time it was announced in the Gazette that several persons who were strongly suspected of being highwaymen, but against whom there was not sufficient evidence, would be paraded at Newgate in riding-dresses; their horses would also be shown; and all gentlemen who had been robbed were invited to inspect this singular exhibition. On another occasion a pardon was publicly offered to a robber if he would give up some rough diamonds, of immense value, which he had taken when he stopped the Harwich mail. A short time after appeared another proclamation, warning the inn-keepers that the eye of the government was upon them. Their criminal connivance, it was affirmed, enabled banditti to infest the roads with impunity.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 355.

4926. ROBBERY excused. Arabs. The separation of the Arabs from the rest of mankind has accustomed them to confound the ideas of stranger and enemy; and the poverty of the land has introduced a maxim of jurisprudence which they believe and practise to the present hour. They pretend that, in the division of the earth, the rich and fertile climates were assigned to the other branches of the human family; and that the posterity of the outlaw Ishmael might recover, by fraud or force, the portion of inheritance of which he had been unjustly deprived. According to the remark of Pliny, the Arabian tribes are equally addicted to theft and merchandise; the caravans that traverse the desert are ransomed or pillaged; and their neighbors, since the remote times of Job and Sesostrius, have been the victims of their rapacious spirit. If a Bedoween discovers from afar a solitary traveller, he rides furiously against him, crying, with a loud voice, "Undress thyself, thy aunt (my wife) is without a garment." A ready submission entitles him to mercy; resistance will provoke the aggressor.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 87.

4927. ROBBERY, Royal. Henry III. The king rose above the meanness of the beggar [at times], to do the more legitimate work of the robber. "He seized by force on whatever was used in the way of meat and drink—especially wine, and even clothes—against the will of those who sold these things."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 24, p. 367

1928. ROMANCE, Origin of. Roman Language. We have seen how prodigious was the waste of blood in those expeditions [the Crusades], and how few returned to their countries of those immense swarms which poured into the East. But those few who did return found in the admiration and applause of their countrymen a high reward for their labors; their praises were sung by bards and minstrels, and their exploits recorded in a species of composition unknown till this time, the celebrated old Romances. This species of composition was so named from the Romance language, in which the first of these works were composed. Latin was the vulgar tongue in France till the beginning of the ninth century; then arose a mixed dialect between the Latin and the Frank tongues, which was termed Romance, and which in process of time is now matured into the French language.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 10, p. 168.

1929. ROMANISM, Civil Assumption of. Paul IV. [In 1558 Elizabeth, Queen of England, despatched messengers, according to the custom of sovereign princes, to the various European courts, announcing her succession.] The arrogant Paul IV. replied to Elizabeth's messenger that it was great boldness in her to assume the crown without his consent, and that she must submit all her claims to his decision. [See No. 4939.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 8, p. 108.

1930. ROMANISM, Deliverance from. Prayer. [The church service book of Edward VI. contained a passage praying for deliverance] from the Bishop of Rome and all his detestable enormities.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 8, p. 114.

1931. ROMANISM, Display of. Priests. When Prince Charles was married to Henrietta Maria of France she brought with her to England twenty-nine priests in her train.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 25, p. 388.

1932. ROMANISM, Hatred of. Reign of Charles II. That hatred had become one of the ruling passions of the community, and was as strong in the ignorant and profane as in those who were Protestants from conviction. The cruelties of Mary's reign—cruelties which, even in the most accurate and sober narrative, excite just detestation, and which were neither accurately nor soberly related in the popular martyrologies—the conspiracies against Elizabeth, and, above all, the Gunpowder Plot, had left in the minds of the vulgar a deep and bitter feeling, which was kept up by annual commemorations, prayers, bonfires, and processions. It should be added that those classes which were peculiarly distinguished by attachment to the throne, the clergy and the landed gentry, had peculiar reasons for regarding the Church of Rome with aversion. The clergy trembled for their benefices, the landed gentry for their abbey and great tithes.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 216.

1933. ROMANISM insulted. Reign of James II. [After the acquittal of the seven Protestant Bishops. See No. 3031.] A figure made of wax with some skill, and adorned at no small expense with robes and a tiara, was mounted on a chair resembling that in which the bishops of Rome are still, on some great festivals, borne through Saint Peter's Church to the high altar. His holiness was generally accompanied by a train of cardinals and Jesuits. At his ear stood a buffoon disguised as a devil with horns and tail. No rich or zealous Protestant grudged his guinea on such an occasion, and, if rumor could be trusted, the cost of the procession was sometimes not less than a thousand pounds. After the pope had been borne some time in state over the heads of the multitude, he was committed to the flames with great acclamation.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 359.

1934. ROMANISM against Liberty. Magna Charta. John was compelled to yield to their demands; and on the 15th day of June, 1215, signed, at Runnymede, the ever memorable Magna Charta, the foundation and bulwark of English liberty. But the ink was scarcely dry when the tyrant complained bitterly to the pope of the violence to which he had been subjected, and besought his interference. Innocent [III.], in his capacity of suzerain of England, issued a bull, declaring the charter illegal, null and void, and forbade the king to permit and the barons to demand the observance of its provisions, under pain of excommunication.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 8, § 15.

1935. — — —. Magna Charta. [In 1215 Pope Innocent III. undertook to assist King John against his barons, who demanded and obtained the Magna Charta; he excommunicated them, and further proceeded by] annulling the charter. England said the insolent mandate had become a fief of the holy see, and the King of England had no right to surrender the privileges of the crown without the consent of his feudal superior. [See No. 4942.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 24, p. 358.

1936. ROMANISM, Oppression of. The Poor. On every side were the evidences of the vast endowments of the English Church—splendid cathedrals, rich abbey, shrines of inestimable value, bishops and abbots surrounded with baronial splendor, ample provision for the working clergy. And yet all the wealth of this church, acknowledged to be greater than that of any other church in Christendom, could not protect the people from the irritating demands which were generally made at the season of family affliction, and pressed too often upon the widow and the fatherless. The chronicler, reciting this grievance, says: "For the children of the defunct should all die for hunger, and go a begging, rather than they would of charity give to them the sely cow which the dead man ought [owned], if had only one." [The taking of mortuaries, or corpse presents, was a species of exaction which fastened upon the dead with the rapacity of the vulture, and reached even the humblest in the land.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 20, p. 325.

1937. ROMANISM patronized. By James II. The bishop of London was suspended from his ecclesiastical function for refusing to censure a clergyman who had preached against the doctrines of the Church of Rome. Six other bishops, having refused to publish the king's equally fraudulent as illegal declaration for liberty of conscience, were immediately committed to prison. James sent an ambassador to the pope, though all correspondence with Rome was by law treasonable, and he received the pope's nuncio in London, who published pastoral injunctions, and consecrated several Romish bishops. A catholic president was appointed by the king to Magdalen college, Oxford, and on its refusal to admit him, the whole members were expelled except two who complied. In short, the king's intentions were not at all disguised; and the Roman Catholics began openly to boast that a very little time would see their religion fully established.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 30, p. 425.

4938. ROMANISM, Relief in. Samuel Johnson. On the Roman Catholic religion he said: "If you join the Papists externally they will not interrogate you strictly as to your belief in their tenets. No reasoning Papist believes every article of their faith. There is one side on which a good man might be persuaded to embrace it. A good man of a timorous disposition in great doubt of his acceptance with God, and pretty credulous, may be glad to be of a church where there are so many helps to get to heaven. I would be a Papist if I could. I have fear enough; but an obstinate rationality prevents me. I shall never be a Papist, unless on the near approach of death, of which I have a very great terror. I wonder that women are not all Papists."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 521.

4939. ROMANISM and the State. Sixtus V. [In 1588,] Pope Sixtus V. made a solemn treaty with Philip II. [of Spain], and promised him an enormous subsidy, to be paid when he had taken any English port. The warlike pontiff was equally ready with his spiritual weapons. He published a new bull of excommunication against Elizabeth, and called all Catholics to a crusade against England, as for a holy war against the Infidel. They came from all lands where the doctrines of the Reformation had never taken root, or had been extirpated—they came, needy adventurers with high-sounding names, ready to fight for the true faith, and to have each a dainty plot of the English garden. They thought less of the plenary indulgences promised for their voluntary service than of the stores of wealth that would reward their valor, when the Jezebel, the accursed queen, should be hurled from her throne, and the pope should have bestowed her crown upon Philip or his nominee.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 14, p. 217. [See Cause, at No. 4929.]

4940. ——. Boniface VIII., in August, 1296, issued his famous bull "Clericis laicos," by which the clergy were forbidden to furnish princes with subsidies or any kind of pecuniary contribution without the permission of the Holy See, and any layman of whatever rank, demanding or accepting such payment, was ipso facto excommunicated.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 9, § 16.

4941. ——. Super-Sovereign. [Innocent III.] assumed the regency of Sicily during a minority. He decided between rival claimants to the imperial crown of Germany, first setting up one prince and then deposing him. He excommunicated Philip [II.] of France for an unlawful marriage, and compelled him to take back his repudiated wife.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 23, p. 337.

4942. ——. Innocent III. [In 1205 Innocent III. interdicted all the churches of England. King John did not yield, and in 1813 he was excommunicated. Innocent proceeded,] absolving his vassals from their fealty, exhorting all Christian princes and barons to assist in dethroning him, and excommunicating those who held any intercourse with him. . . . All the ordinary operations of law were suspended. There was impunity for crime. There was no safety for property. [See No. 4935].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 23, p. 341.

4943. ROMANISM vs. the State. Innocent III. [Innocent III. was pope in 1207; he was not satisfied with spiritual power,] unless he could render that power an instrument for the subjugation of every European state to a humiliating subserviency. This principle, as expressed by himself in a memorable letter, was that "as God created two luminaries, one superior for the day, and the other inferior for the night, which last owes its splendor entirely to the first, so he has disposed that the regal dignity should be but a reflection of the papal authority, and entirely subordinate to it."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 23, p. 337.

4944. ——. England. [In 1142] Milo, Earl of Hereford, has demanded money of the Bishop of Hereford to pay his troops. The bishop refuses and Milo then seizes his lands and goods. The bishop then pronounces sentence of excommunication against Milo and his adherents, and lays an interdict upon the whole country subject to the earl's authority. We might hastily think that the solemn curse pronounced against a nation, or a district, was an unmeaning ceremony, with its "bell, book, and candle," to terrify only the weak-minded. It was one of the most outrageous of the numerous ecclesiastical tyrannies. . . . Under an interdict, all churches were shut. No knell was tolled for the dead, for the dead remained unburied. No merry peals welcomed the bridal processions, for no couple could be joined in wedlock. The awe-stricken mother might have her infant baptized, and the dying might receive extreme unction. But all public offices of the church were suspended. The whole kingdom was placed by the pope under edict [in 1208].—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 18, p. 267.

4945. ——. Assumption. Dr. Lingard explains how the popes came to assume the power of deposing kings. They were at first contented with spiritual censures; but when all notions of justice came to be modelled upon the feudal principles, it was maintained that sovereigns, who held their fees from God, became traitors by disobedience; that as traitors they ought to forfeit their kingdoms or fees; and that the pontiff, the vicegerent of God upon earth, had the right to pronounce sentence against them for the violation of fealty.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 23, p. 341.

4946. ROMANISTS, Alliance of. Oath. [After the discovery of the gunpowder plot] all Roman Catholics who had been convicted of recusancy, and all who had not received the sacrament twice in twelve months in a Protestant church, were also required to take an oath of allegiance. In this oath the pretended power of the pope to absolve subjects from their obedi-once was to be expressly renounced.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 22, p. 338.

4947. ROMANISTS denounced. Cromwell. [He says the principle] begins to be exploded that people are for kings and churches, and saints are for the pope or churchmen. He goes on in this impassioned strain: "How dare you assume to call these men your flocks whom you have plunged into so horrid a rebellion [in 1639, in the interests of Charles II., and against the Commonwealth] by which you have made them and the country almost a ruinous heap? and whom you have fleeced, and polled, and peeled hitherto and make it your business to do so still. You cannot feed them, you poison them with your false, abominable, anti-Christian doctrines and practices. You keep the Word of God from them, and instead thereof give them your senseless orders and traditions.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 9, p. 126.

4948. ROMANISTS, Plot of. Assassination. [In 1880 it was arranged by the Romanists that an English officer by the name of Savage should assassinate Queen Elizabeth, and confederates would liberate Catholic Mary Queen of Scots. The plot was changed. It was thought to be a plan of too much importance to be left to the resolution of one man. It was arranged that six should engage in that service. The government frustrated their plan, and the execution of conspirators followed.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 18, p. 187.

4949. ROYALTY, Atrocity of. Constantinople. Constantinople itself was for some ages the theatre of disgraceful resolutions, achieved by the most atrocious crimes. The attention dwells with horror on the bloody tragedies of this period: one emperor assassinated in revenge of murder and incest; another poisoned by his own wife; a third stabbed in the bath by his servants; a fourth plucking out the eyes of his brothers; a mother the murderer of her own son, that she might herself enjoy his throne. Of such complexion was that series of sovereigns who swayed the empire of the East for nearly two hundred years. Under all these misfortunes Constantinople still remained the most populous, the most opulent, and the most polished city of Christendom. It was probably indebted for its welfare, amid all these distresses, to its extensive commerce, the consequence of its situation, which gives it the command of two seas.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 4, p. 92.

4950. ROYALTY, Maternal. Napoleon I. Soon after Napoleon's assumption of the imperial purple, he happened to meet his mother in the garden of St. Cloud. The emperor was surrounded with his courtiers, and half playfully extended his hand for her to kiss. "Not so, my son," she gravely replied, at the same time presenting her hand in return; "it is your duty to kiss the hand of her who gave you life."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 1.

4951. ROYALTIES, Miseries of. Stuarts. During the period of their separate sovereignty over Scotland, but three of the race escaped a violent death. The first of them who aspired to the crown of Great Britain was by an English monarch doomed to death on the scaffold; her grandson was beheaded in the name of the English people. The next in the line, long a needy exile, is remembered chiefly for his vices; and as if a domestic crime alone could avenge the national wrongs, James II. was reduced from royalty to beggary by the conspiracy of his own children.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 19.

4952. ROYALTY overthrown. Palace at Milan. A.D. 1796. [The Austrians were defeated at Lodi; the Archduke Ferdinand and his duchess fled.] The moment they had departed republican zeal burst forth unrestrained. The tri-colored cockade seemed suddenly to have fallen, as by magic, upon the hats and caps of the multitude. . . . "A placard was upon the palace—"This house to let; for the keys apply to the French Commissioner" [Napoleon Bonaparte].—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 5.

4953. ROYALTY, Rejected. Statue of George III. The Declaration [of Independence] was read on the 9th [of July] to every brigade in New York City. . . . In the evening a mob, composed in part of soldiers, threw down the equestrian statue of George III., which stood in the Bowling Green, and the lead of which it was formed was cut in pieces to be run into bullets. The riot offended Washington, and was rebuked in general orders.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 1.

4954. RUIN, An expressive. Rome. [In the fifteenth century.] This spectacle of the world, how is it fallen! how changed! how defaced! The path of victory is obliterated by vines, and the benches of the senators are concealed by a dunghill. Cast your eyes on the Palatine Hill, and seek among the shapeless and enormous fragments the marble theatre, the obelisks, the colossal statues, the porticos of Nero's palace; survey the other hills of the city; the vacant space is interrupted only by ruins and gardens. The forum of the Roman people, where they assembled to enact their laws and elect their magistrates, is now enclosed for the cultivation of pot-herbs, or thrown open for the reception of swine and buffaloes. The public and private edifices that were founded for eternity lie prostrate, naked, and broken, like the limbs of a mighty giant; and the ruin is the more visible from the stupendous relics that have survived the injuries of time and fortune.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 71, p. 517.

4955. RUIN, Inevitable. Reign of James II. [At the trial of the seven bishops who refused to aid the king in overthrowing the Protestant Church.] The jury was sworn; it consisted of persons of highly respectable station. The foreman was Sir Roger Langley, a baronet of old and honorable family. With him were joined a knight and ten esquires, several of whom are known to have been men of large possessions. . . . One name excited considerable alarm, that of Michael Arnold. He was brewer to the palace, and it was apprehended that the government counted on his voice. The story goes that he complained bitterly of the position in which he found himself. "Whatever I do," he said, "I am sure to be half ruined. If I say Not Guilty, I shall brew no more for the king; and if I say Guilty, I shall brew no more for anybody else." [The masses of the people sided with the bishops.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 347.

4956. RUIN, National. By Expansion. Ingenious men may point out a variety of internal as well as external circumstances, which had their operation in producing the decline, and at length the ruin of this immense fabric; but they may be all reduced to one single head. The fall of the Roman empire was the inevitable effect of its overgrown extension. The commonwealth subsisted by the virtuous and patriotic ardor of the citizens; but the passion for conquest, which at first found sufficient scope in the domestic war among the Italian states, was, after their reduction, necessarily extended to a distance. Remote dominion relaxed the patriotic affection, which of necessity grew the weaker, the more extensive were its objects. The vices of the conquered nation infected the victorious legions, and foreign luxuries corrupted their commanders. Selfish interest took the place of public virtue; the people were enslaved by despots, who, regarding as the first object the security of their own power, found it often their wisest policy to abase that martial spirit which was no less formidable to the matter of the state than to its foreign enemies. Thus the military character of the Romans went gradually to decay, because it was purposely depressed by the emperors; and thus their extensive dominions, wanting their necessary support of brave, of virtuous, and of disciplined troops, fell an easy prey to that torrent of barbarians which overwhelmed them.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 5, p. 21.

4957. RULER, A capable. Kildare. In 1494 Henry [VII.] took the country in hand. Sir Edward Poynings, a tried soldier, was despatched as deputy to Ireland with troops at his back. English officers, English judges, were quietly sent over. The lords of the pale were scared by the seizure of their leader, the Earl of Kildare. . . . The time had not yet come when England was strong enough to hold Ireland by her own strength. For a while the lords of the pale must still serve as the English garrison against the unconquered Irish, and Henry called his prisoner Kildare to his presence. "All Ireland cannot rule this man," grumbled his ministers. "Then shall he rule all Ireland," laughed the king, and Kildare returned as lord-deputy to hold the country loyally in Henry's name.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 498.

4958. RULER, Conceited. James II. James was always boasting of his skill in what he called kingcraft; and yet it is hardly possible even to imagine a course more directly opposed to all the rules of kingcraft than that which he followed. The policy of wise rulers has always been to disguise strong acts under popular forms. It was thus that Augustus and Napoleon established absolute monarchies, while the public regarded them merely as eminent citizens invested with temporary magistracies. The policy of James was the direct reverse of theirs. He enraged and alarmed his Parliament by constantly telling them that they held their privileges merely during his pleasure, and that they had no more business to inquire what he might lawfully do than what the Deity might lawfully do. Yet he quailed before them.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 68.

4959. RULER, Embarrassed. Prince of Wales. The Scotch Parliament, composed of fanatical Presbyterians, as hostile to the independent faith of Cromwell as to the papacy itself, treated for the throne with the Prince of Wales. They only required of him, in acknowledgment of his restoration in Scotland, the recognition of their national Church. This Church was a species of biblical mysticism, savage, and calling itself inspired, founded on the ruins of the Romish faith by a prophet named John Knox, with the sword in his hand, excommunication on his lips, and superstition in his heart—the true religion of civil war, replacing one intolerance by another, and adding to the natural ferocity of the people the most ridiculous assumption of extreme sanctity. Scotland at that time resembled a Hebrew tribe, governed by a leader assuming divine inspiration, interpreted through his disciples and priests. . . . The Prince of Wales, young, handsome, thoughtless, voluptuous, and unbelieving—a true English Alcibiades—condemned to govern a nation of bigoted and cruel sectarists, hesitated to accept a throne which he could only keep by feigning the hypocrisy and fanaticism of his parliament, or by rashly repudiating the yoke of the clergy.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 50.

4960. RULER, An excellent. Saladin. Egypt, Syria, and Arabia were adorned by the royal foundations of hospitals, colleges, and mosques, and Cairo was fortified with a wall and citadel; but his works were consecrated to public use; nor did the sultan indulge himself in a garden or palace of private luxury. In a fanatic age, himself a fanatic, the genuine virtues of Saladin commanded the esteem of the Christians; the Emperor of Germany gloried in his friendship; the Greek emperor solicited his alliance; and the conquest of Jerusalem diffused, and perhaps magnified, his fame both in the East and West.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 59, p. 23.

4961. RULER, A foolish. Justinian II. [Of Constantinople.] The name of a triumphant lawgiver was dishonored by the vices of a boy, who imitated his namesake only in the expensive luxury of building. His passions were strong; his understanding was feeble; and he was intoxicated with a foolish pride that his birth had given him the command of millions, of whom the smallest community would not have chosen him for their local magistrate. His favorite ministers were two beings the least susceptible of human sympathy, a eunuch and a monk; to the one he abandoned the palace, to the other the finances; the former corrected the emperor's mother with a scourge, the latter suspended the insolvent tributaries, with their heads downward, over a slow and smoky fire.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 48, p. 577.

4962. RULER, A great. Alfred the Great. [See No. 5876.] Alfred, whether we view him in his public or private character, deserves to be esteemed one of the best and greatest of princes. He united the most enterprising and heroic spirit with the greatest prudence and moderation; the utmost vigor of authority with perfect affability and a most winning deportment; the most exemplary justice with the greatest lenity. His civil talents were in every respect equal to his military virtues. He found the kingdom in the most miserable condition to which anarchy, domestic barbarism, and foreign hostility could reduce it; by the valor of his arms, and by his abilities as a politician and lawgiver, he brought it to a pitch of eminence and glory which, till then, England had never attained. The outlines of his admirable plan of political economy merit particular attention, as being, in fact, the foundation of the venerable system of the British Constitution. Alfred, in short, in every view of his character, must be regarded as one of the wisest and best of men that ever occupied the throne of any nation.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 5, p. 109.

4963. ———. Charles Martel. Charles Martel governed France for about thirty years with great wisdom, spirit, and ability. He was victorious over all his intestine foes; he kept in awe the neighboring nations; he delivered his country from the ravages of the Saracens, whom he entirely defeated between Tours and Poitiers—thus averting the imminent danger of Mahometanism overspreading Western Europe; and he died honored and lamented.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 2, p. 59.

4964. ———. Canute. Canute, from the extent of his dominions, was one of the greatest monarchs of the age. He was sovereign of Denmark, Norway, and England. His character, as King of England, was not uniform. He was, in the first years of his reign, detested by his subjects, whom he loaded with the heaviest taxes, and exasperated by numberless acts of violence and oppression. In his later years his administration was mild and equitable.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 6, p. 113.

4965. RULER, A horrible. Nero. How he sought to revive the flagging pulse of exhausted pleasure by unheard-of enormities, and strove to make shame shameless by undisguised publicity; how he put to death the last descendant of Augustus, the last descendant of Tiberius, and the last descendant of the Claudii; how he ended the brief but heart-rending tragedy of the life of Octavia by defaming her innocence, driving her to the island of Pandataria, and there enforcing her assassination under circumstances so sad as might have moved the hardest villain to tears; how he hastened by poison the death of Burrus, and entrusted the vast power of the Prætorian command to Tigellinus, one of the vilest of the human race; how, when he had exhausted the treasures amassed by the dignified economy of Claudius, he filled his coffers by confiscating the estates of innocent victims; how he caused the death of his second wife, Poppea, by a kick inflicted on her when she was in a delicate condition; how, after the detection of the conspiracy of Piso, he seemed to revel in blood; how he ordered the death of Seneca; how, by the execution of Pætus Thrasea and Barea Soranus, he strove to extinguish the last embers of Roman magnanimity, and to slay "virtue itself;" how wretches like Vatinus became the cherished favorites of his court; how his reign degenerated into one perpetual orgy, at once monstrous and vulgar—into these details, fortunately, we need not follow his awful career. . . . Probably no man who ever lived has crowded into fourteen years of life so black a catalogue of iniquities as this Colloot d'Herbois upon an imperial throne.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 3, p. 28.

4966. RULER, An independent. James I. James was a firm believer in the divinity which doth make a king; but it must seem something surprising that, however Scotland might bow down graciously to such follies, England should yield as compliantly to his will. His reply to his first counsellors upon his arrival in England is well known: "Do I mak the Judges? do I mak the Bishops? then, God is wauns! I mak what likes me, law and gospel." Commenting upon this, John Forster, in his "Statesmen of England," says, "he was not an absolute fool, and little more can be said of him."—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 36.

4967. RULER, A monster. Mahomet III. Mahomet III., the successor of Amurath, began his reign like a monster, by strangling nineteen of his brothers, and drowning twelve of his father's concubines, on the supposition of their being pregnant. Yet this barbarian supported the dignity of the empire and extended its dominions.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 23, p. 330.

4968. RULER, Natural. General Grant. His father being poor, as soon as Ulysses was able to help him he was put to work, to the neglect of his education. At the age of eight he was taught to drive a team, and at ten was accustomed to drive one from Georgetown—to which place his father had removed—to Cincinnati, a distance of forty miles, and bring a load back.—HEADLEY'S GENERAL GRANT, p. 26.

4969. RULER, Popular. Emperor Adrian. On his return to Rome, his conduct was such as to ingratiate him with every rank of the citizens. He remitted all the debts due to the treasury for the last sixteen years, by burning the records and obligations. He bestowed liberal presents upon those amongst the ancient families who had fallen into indigence, and appointed new funds for the maintenance and education of the children of the poor. He then undertook a progress through all the provinces of the empire, repressing abuses, and studiously relieving the people wherever he found the taxes too heavy or exorbitant. He rebuilt many cities which had been destroyed or had fallen into ruin. Among the rest he rebuilt Jerusalem, which he named Ælia Capitolina. In these progresses through his dominions, so careful was he in avoiding everything which might distress the provinces, that he used no equipage or show, but travelled on foot and lived with the frugality of a common soldier. This exemplary conduct made him beloved and respected by his subjects, as much as he was formidable to the enemies of the empire from his courage and resolution. His popularity became so great that he stood not in need of the ensigns of power and authority. The guards, and the fasces he deemed superfluous to him who made it his study to reign, not over the persons, but over the hearts of his subjects.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 497.

4970. ———. Charlemagne. This great prince was no less respectable in his private than in his public character. He was a man of the most amiable dispositions, and there never was a sovereign to whom his subjects were more attached from consideration of personal regard. His secretary and historian, Eginhart, gives a beautiful picture of his domestic life, and the economy of his family, which is characteristic of an age of great simplicity. He never rode abroad without being attended by his sons and daughters; the former he instructed in all manly exercises, in which he himself was particularly skilled; and his daughters, according to the simple manners of the times, were assiduously employed in the various labors of housewifery, particularly in spinning wool with the distaff. For his children he indulged in all the affection of the fondest parent, and he bore the premature loss of some of them with less magnanimity than might have been expected from so heroic a mind.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 3, p. 73.

4971. RULER, A righteous. Danish King. A letter which Cnut wrote after twelve years of rule to his English subjects marks the grandeur of his character and the noble conception he had formed of kingship. "I have vowed to God to lead a right life in all things," wrote the king, "to rule justly and piously my realms and subjects, and to administer just judgment to all. If heretofore I have done aught beyond what was just, through headiness or negligence of youth, I am ready, with God's help, to amend it utterly." No royal officer, either for fear of the king or for favor of any, is to consent to injustice, none is to do wrong to rich or poor, "as they would value my friendship and their own well-being." He especially denounces unfair exactions: "I have no need that money be heaped together for me by unjust demands." "I have sent this letter before me," Cnut ends, "that all the people of my realm may rejoice in my well-doing; for as you yourselves know, never have I spared, nor will I spare, to spend myself and my toil in what is needful and good for my people." Cnut's greatest gift to his people was that of peace. With him began the long internal tranquillity which was from this time to be the key-note of the national history. [Date, early in the eleventh century.]—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 87.

4972. RULER, Ruinous. Headless. After his enfranchisement from an oppressive guardian, John Palæologus remained thirty-six years the helpless, and, as it should seem, the careless spectator of the public ruin. Love, or rather lust, was his only vigorous passion; and in the embraces of the wives and virgins of the city, the Turkish slave forgot the dishonor of the emperor of the Romans [of the Eastern empire].—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 64, p. 242.

4973. RULER, A shameless. Charles II. A king might be pardoned for amusing his leisure with wine, wit, and beauty, but it was intolerable that he should sink into a mere saunterer and voluptuary; that the gravest affairs of state should be neglected, and that the public service should be starved and the finances deranged in order that harlots and parasites might grow rich.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 177.

4974. RULER, A spirited. Charles XII. [After the defeat of the Swedes at Pultowa.] Charles, a fugitive, with a few followers, crossed the river Dneiper, and sought an asylum in the dominions of the grand seignor. Let us now mark the conduct of Charles. In Sweden, where it was not known whether their king was dead or alive, the regency had thoughts of capitulating with the czar. When Charles heard of this proposal, he wrote to the senate that he would send them one of his boots to govern them. With his feeble train of followers, who amounted only to 1800 men, he formed a small camp near Bender, from whence he endeavored to prevail with the court of Constantinople to arm in his favor against the Russians.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 35, p. 480.

4975. RULER, A superior. Henry VII. The army of Richmond sang a hymn to God upon the field of battle [of Bosworth], and with the loudest acclamations proclaimed him as Henry VII. King of England. This auspicious day put an end to the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster. Henry, by marrying the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV., united in his own person the interests and rights of both these families. This excellent prince, who knew how to govern as well as to conquer, was one of the best monarchs that ever reigned in England. The nation, under his wise and politic administration, soon recovered the wounds it had sustained in those unhappy contests. The parliaments which he assembled made the most salutary laws, the people paid their taxes without reluctance, the nobles were kept in due subordination, and that spirit of commercial industry for which the English have been, in these latter ages, justly distinguished, began to make vigorous advances under the reign of Henry VII. The only failing of this prince was an economy, perhaps too rigid, which, in his latter years, degenerated even into avarice; and though his taxes were not oppressive, he left in the treasury, at his death, no less than two millions sterling.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14, p. 228.

4976. RULERS, Change of. "Pontiac's War." The French had won the affections of the savages by their pliability and their temperance, and retained it by religious influence; they seemed no more to be masters, but companions and friends. [The French were driven out of Canada and the west by the English.] More formidable enemies now appeared, arrogant in their pretensions, scoffing insolently at those whom they superseded, driving away their Catholic priests, and introducing the traffic in rum, which till then had been effectually prohibited. [War followed.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 7.

4977. RULERS, Many. Six Emperors. For the first, and indeed for the last time, the Roman world was administered by six emperors. In the West, Constantine and Maxentius affected to reverence their father Maximian. In the East, Licinius and Maximian honored with more real consideration their benefactor Galerius. The opposition of interest and the memory of a recent war divided the empire into two great hostile powers; but their mutual fears produced an apparent tranquillity.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 14, p. 466.

4978. RULERS, Precise and parental. John Howard. He began the education of his son al.

most as soon as the child was old enough to manifest a preference. He laid it down as an inflexible rule that the infant should have nothing that it cried for—an excellent principle when it is not carried too far, but one which is much better enforced by a mother than a father. A mother does not usually lay down any inflexible rule for the government of a very young child, but varies her treatment with the occasion. [The son became his father's shame and sorrow.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 68.

14979. RULERS, Responsibility of. Reign of Charles II. The prevailing discontent was compounded of many feelings. One of these was wounded national pride. That generation had seen England, during a few years, allied on equal terms with France, victorious over Holland and Spain, the mistress of the sea, the terror of Rome, the head of the Protestant interest. Her resources had not diminished; and it might have been expected that she would have been at least as highly considered in Europe under a legitimate king, strong in the affection and willing obedience of his subjects, as she had been under a usurper whose utmost vigilance and energy were required to keep down a mutinous people; yet she had, in consequence of the imbecility and meanness of her rulers, sunk so low that any German or Italian principality which brought five thousand men into the field was a more important member of the commonwealth of nations.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 215.

14980. RULERS, Responsibility of. British. They might safely be tyrants within the precinct of the court, but it was necessary for them to watch with constant anxiety the temper of the country. Henry VIII., for example, encountered no opposition when he wished to send Buckingham and Surrey, Anne Boleyn and Lady Salisbury, to the scaffold; but when, without the consent of Parliament, he demanded of his subjects a contribution amounting to one sixth of their goods, he soon found it necessary to retract. The cry of hundreds of thousands was that they were English and not French, freemen and not slaves.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 38.

14981. RULERS, Terrifying. Roman. All the vice, all the splendor, all the degradation of Pagan Rome, seemed to be gathered up in the person of [Nero] that emperor who first placed himself in a relation of direct antagonism against Christianity. Long before death ended the astute comedy in which Augustus had so gravely borne his part, he had experienced the Nemesis of Absolutism, and foreseen the awful possibilities which it involved. But neither he nor any one else could have divined that four such rulers as Tiberius, Gaius, Claudius, and Nero—the first a sanguinary tyrant, the second a furious madman, the third an uxorious imbecile, the fourth a heartless buffoon—would in succession afflict and horrify the world. Yet these rulers sat upon the breast of Rome with the paralyzing spell of a nightmare. The concentration of the old prerogatives of many offices in the person of one, who was at once Consul, Censor, Tribune, Pontifex Maximus, and perpetual Emperor, fortified their power with the semblance of legality, and that power was rendered terrible by the sword of the Prætorians and the deadly whisper of the informers.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 2, p. 11.

14982. RULERS, Uneducated. "Crowned Ass." [He was one of the early rulers of a part of Anjou in France.] Alone of his race, Fulk the Good waged no wars; his delight was to sit in the choir of Tours and to be called "canon." One Martinmas eve Fulk was singing there in clerical guise when the French king, Louis d'Outremer, entered the church. "He sings like a priest," laughed the king, as his nobles pointed mockingly to the figure of the count canon. But Fulk was ready with his reply. "Know, my lord," wrote the Count of Anjou, "that a king unlearned is a crowned ass." Fulk was in fact no priest, but a busy ruler, governing, enforcing peace, and carrying justice to every corner of the wasted land. To him alone of his race men gave the title of "the Good."—HISTORY OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 122.

14983. RUMORS, Welcomed. Death of Charles II. We cannot, therefore, wonder that wild stories without number were repeated and believed by the common people. His Majesty's tongue had swelled to the size of a neat's tongue. A cake of deleterious powder had been found in his brain. There were blue spots on his breast. There were black spots on his shoulder. Something had been put into his snuff-box. Something had been put into his broth. Something had been put into his favorite dish of eggs and ambergis. The Duchess of Portsmouth had poisoned him in a cup of chocolate. The queen had poisoned him in a jar of dried pears. Such tales ought to be preserved, for they furnish us with a measure of the intelligence and virtue of the generation which eagerly devoured them.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 411.

14984. RUNAWAY, A distinguished. Francisco Pizarro. One day a pig strayed from the herd and could not be found. Pizarro, dreading his father's anger, dared not go home. He made his way to a recruiting station, enlisted in the Spanish army as a private soldier, and served for a while in Italy. Attracted by the marvels related of the New World, and being naturally fond of adventure, he, too, joined at length an expedition to America, and, arriving at Hispaniola, served under Columbus, and soon won distinction. He had every quality that fits a man for a life of daring adventure.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 323.

14985. SABBATH, Defenceless on the. Jerusalem. Ptolemy advanced into Judea, and formed the siege of Jerusalem. The city was so strong by its advantageous situation, in conjunction with the works of art, that it would have sustained a long siege, had it not been for the religious fear the Jews entertained of violating the law, if they should defend themselves on the Sabbath. Ptolemy was not long unacquainted with this particular; and in order to improve the great advantage it gave him, he chose that day for the general assault; and as no individual among the Jews would presume to defend himself, the city was taken without any difficulty.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 16, § 4.

14986. SABBATH desecrated. Nobility. The private offences, in the support of whose official interdiction Wilberforce formed a society, were, profanation of the Lord's day, swearing, drunkenness. The great gave their Sunday card-parties and Sunday concerts long after Hannah More published, in 1796, her "Estimate of the Religion of the Fashionable World."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 7, p. 123.

1487. ——. London. [In London, in 1141], in every Sunday in Lent, a company with lances and shields went out to joust.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 18, p. 264.

1488. ——. England, 1388. [The law required] every servant of husbandry, laborer, and servant of artificer, . . . they shall have bows and arrows, and use the same on Sundays and holidays.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 1, p. 14.

1489. SABBATH misspent. Charles II.—Last. His palace had seldom presented a gayer or a more scandalous appearance than on the evening of Sunday, the first of February, 1685. . . . The great gallery of Whitehall, an admirable relic of the magnificence of the Tudors, was crowded with revellers and gamblers. The king sat there chatting and toying with three women, whose charms were the boast and whose voices were the disgrace of three nations. Barbara Palmer, Duchess of Cleveland, was there, no longer young, but still retaining some traces of that superb and voluptuous loveliness which twenty years before overcame the hearts of all men. There, too, was the Duchess of Portsmouth, whose soft and infantine features were lighted up with the vivacity of France. Hortensia Mancini, Duchess of Mazarin, and niece of the great cardinal, completed the group. [He died on Friday following.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 399.

1490. SABBATH observance enforced, Puritans. [In 1653] one unhappy victim is stocked three hours, for the heinous offence of going to Charminster immediately after dinner on Easter day, and eating milk and cream with some lads and lassies, upon which entertainment they spent twopence each. Even the plea that the moving about on the Sabbath-day was to hear a preacher in another parish was no mitigation of the offence of taking a longer walk than to the church at the offender's own door. . . . A tailor is brought up for working at two o'clock on a January morning, to have a piece of his manufacture complete in due time for some orthodox church-goer. Children are punished for playing at nine stones. Hanging out clothes to dry on the Sabbath was an especial offence.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 9, p. 172.

1491. SABBATH, Privacy on the. Washington. On Sunday no visitors were admitted to the President's house, save the immediate relatives of the family, with only one exception, Mr. Speaker Trumbull, since Governor of Connecticut, and who had been confidential secretary to the chief during the war.—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 2.

1492. SABBATH rejected, The. France. The revolutionary tribunals had closed the churches and prohibited the observance of the Sabbath. To efface if possible all traces of that sacred day, they had appointed every tenth day for cessation from labor and for festivity. A heavy fine was inflicted upon any one who should close his shop on the Sabbath, or manifest any reverence for that discarded institution.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 16.

1493. SACRAMENT, Inconsistency with the. Joan of Arc. [She was informed that she must be burnt at the stake that day.] After this burst of grief, she recovered herself and confessed; she then asked to communicate. The brother was embarrassed; but consulting the bishop, the latter told him to administer the sacrament, "and whatever else she might ask." Thus, at the very moment he condemned her as a relapsed heretic, and cut her off from the Church, he gave her all that the Church gives to her faithful. Perhaps a last sentiment of humanity awoke in the heart of the wicked judge; he considered it enough to burn the poor creature, without driving her to despair and damning her. Perhaps, also, the wicked priest, through free-thinking levity, allowed her to receive the sacraments as a thing of no consequence, which, after all, might serve to calm and silence the sufferer.—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 55.

1494. SACRIFICE consumed. By Lightning. A prodigy that happened at Amphipolis testified also the favor of the gods. The consul was offering sacrifice there, and the sacred ceremonies were begun, when a flash of lightning fell upon the altar, and at once consumed and consecrated the victim.—PLUTARCH'S PAULUS ÆMILIUS.

1495. SACRIFICE, Human. Arabs. The life of a man is the most precious oblation to deprecate a public calamity: the altars of Phœnicia and Egypt, of Rome and Carthage, have been polluted with human gore; the cruel practice was long preserved among the Arabs; in the third century a boy was annually sacrificed by the tribe of Dumatians; and a royal captive was piously slaughtered by the prince of the Saracens, the ally and soldier of the Emperor Justinian. A parent who drags his son to the altar exhibits the most painful and sublime effort of fanaticism; the deed, or the intention, was sanctified by the example of saints and heroes.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 95.

1496. ——. Gauls. Many of the religious rites among the Gauls were cruel and bloody. Human sacrifices were of frequent occurrence. It was believed that the life of man cannot be purchased but by that of his fellow-man; that the gods cannot be propitiated but at this costly price. Accordingly, those who were attacked by dangerous sickness, and those who were about to expose themselves to the hazards of war, procured through the ministry of the Druids the immolation of human victims on their behalf. Public sacrifices of the same kind were sometimes held. A colossal human figure was made of wicker-work, and its huge limbs filled with the bodies of living men, generally condemned criminals or captives taken in war. The image was then set on fire.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 1, § 10.

1497. ——. Swedes. Till the end of the eleventh century, a celebrated temple subsisted at Upsal, the most considerable town of the Swedes and Goths. It was enriched with the gold which the Scandinavians had acquired in their piratical adventures, and sanctified by the uncouth representations of the three principal deities, the god of war, the goddess of generation, and the god of thunder. In the general festival that was solemnized every ninth year, nine animals of every species (without excepting the human) were sacrificed, and their bleeding bodies suspended in the sacred grove adjacent to the temple.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 10, p. 283.

4998. ——. Romans. [The Romans were expecting the attack of the Gauls.] The vast preparations they made were further proofs of their fears (for it is said that so many thousands of Romans were never seen in arms either before or since), and so were the new and extraordinary sacrifices which they offered. . . . They buried two Greeks—a man and a woman, and likewise two Gauls, one of each sex, alive in the beast-market.—PLUTARCH.

4999. SACRIFICES, Christian. John Nelson. [One of Mr. Wesley's most heroic and successful preachers was a stone-cutter by trade.] He kept hewing stone by day, and preaching by night. . . . [His success awakened opposition.] The ale-house keepers complained of the loss of their customers by his preaching, and the parish clergyman wished not such a rival near him. He was arrested . . . as a vagrant without visible means of support. . . . Five hundred pounds bail was refused, witnesses were rejected, save his clerical accuser. Nelson repelled the charge manfully. "I am as able to get my living by my hands," said he, "as any man of my trade in England is, and you know it." [He was impressed for the army.] At Bradford he was plunged into a dungeon, into which flowed blood and filth from a slaughter-house above it, so that it smelled, he says, "like a pig-stye ; but my soul," he adds, "was so filled with the love of God that it was paradise to me." There was nothing in it to sit on, and his only bed was a heap of decayed straw.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 207.

5000. SACRIFICES, Ministerial. Rev. Thos. Smith. He rode four thousand miles and preached four hundred sermons in one year, and laid many nights on wet cabin floors sometimes covered with snow through the night, and his horse standing under a pelting storm of snow or rain, and at the end of the year received his travelling expenses and four silver dollars of his salary.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, ch. 4, p. 269.

5001. SACRILEGE, Infamous. Hakem the Turk. The temple of the Christian world, the church of the Resurrection, was demolished to its foundations ; the luminous prodigy of Easter was interrupted, and much profane labor was exhausted to destroy the cave in the rock which properly constitutes the holy sepulchre. At the report of this sacrilege, the nations of Europe were astonished and afflicted ; but, instead of arming in the defence of the Holy Land, they contented themselves with burning or banishing the Jews as the secret advisers of the impious barbarian.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 57, p. 532.

5002. SACRILEGE, Sectarian. Sacking of Constantinople. The churches were profaned by the licentiousness and party zeal of the Latins. [The Roman Catholics.] After stripping the gems and pearls, they converted the chalices into drinking-cups ; their tables, on which they gamed and feasted, were covered with the pictures of Christ and the saints ; and they trampled under foot the most venerable objects of the Christian worship. In the cathedral of St. Sophia the ample veil of the sanctuary was rent asunder for the sake of the golden fringe ; and the altar, a monument of art and riches, was broken in pieces and shared among the captors. Their mules and horses were laden with the wrought silver and gilt carvings which they tore down from the doors and pulpit ; and if the beasts stumbled under the burden, they were stabbed by their impatient drivers, and the holy pavement streamed with their impure blood. A prostitute was seated on the throne of the patriarch ; and that daughter of Belial, as she is styled, sung and danced in the church, to ridicule the hymns and processions of the Orientals.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 60, p. 93.

5003. SAFETY, Public. Inhumanity. [Gothic youths were distributed through the empire as hostages. They were tempted to conspire against their masters.] As soon as he [Julius], had obtained the discretionary power of acting as he should judge most expedient for the good of the republic, he assembled the principal officers, and privately concerted effectual measures for the execution of his bloody design. An order was immediately promulgated, that, on a stated day, the Gothic youth should assemble in the capital cities of their respective provinces ; and as a report was industriously circulated that they were summoned to receive a liberal gift of lands and money, the pleasing hope allayed the fury of their resentment, and, perhaps, suspended the motions of the conspiracy. On the appointed day, the unarmed crowd of the Gothic youth was carefully collected in the square or forum ; the streets and avenues were occupied by the Roman troops, and the roofs of the houses were covered with archers and slingers. At the same hour, in all the cities of the East, the signal was given of indiscriminate slaughter ; and the provinces of Asia were delivered, by the cruel prudence of Julius, from a domestic enemy, who, in a few months, might have carried fire and sword from the Hellespont to the Euphrates. The urgent consideration of the public safety may undoubtedly authorize the violation of every positive law.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26, p. 56.

5004. SAFETY, Selfish. Darius. [When Darius fled with his routed army before Alexander the Great, he was in great peril of his personal safety.] Justin tells us, that when those about Darius advised him to break down the bridge of the Cydnus, to retard the enemy's pursuit, he answered, "I will never purchase safety to myself at the expense of so many thousands of my subjects as must by this means be lost."—PLUTARCH'S "ALEXANDER," LANGHORNE'S NOTE.

5005. SAILOR, A great. Sebastian Cabot. [By his great discoveries in America] he advanced the commerce of England . . . and was pensioned as the great seaman.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 1.

5006. SAILOR, Trials of the. Sam. Johnson. His negro servant, Francis Barber, having left him and been some time at sea, . . . a state of life of which Johnson always expressed the utmost abhorrence. He said, "No man will be a sailor who has contrivance enough to get himself into a jail; for being in a ship is being in a jail, with the chance of being drowned." And at another time, "A man in a jail has more room, better food, and commonly better company."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 95.

5007. SAILOR, Youthful. Sir Francis Drake. When he was about twelve years old he was regularly apprenticed to the captain of a small vessel trading with Holland and France, in which he took the place of a cabin-boy. The cabin-boy of a ship in former times, like the youngest apprentice in a shop, was required to do all the odd, disagreeable jobs, such as greasing the mast, washing the dishes, furling the topmast sail, coiling up the ropes, tarring the cable, feeding the pig. Young Drake performed his duties so well, learned his business so thoroughly, and won the confidence and affection of the captain to such a degree, that the captain, dying when Drake was eighteen, bequeathed him his vessel. The young man soon proved his fitness to command. Having made one successful voyage to the western ports of France, he sailed next to Africa, and brought home a good share of the gold dust and elephants' tusks of Guinea.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 359.

5008. SAILORS, Destitution of. Reign of Charles II. It does not appear that there was in the service of any of the Stuarts a single naval officer, such as, according to the notions of our time, a naval officer ought to be—that is to say, a man versed in the theory and practice of his calling, and steered against all the dangers of battle and tempest, yet of cultivated mind and polished manners. There were gentlemen and there were seamen in the navy of Charles II., but the seamen were not gentlemen, and the gentlemen were not seamen.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 284.

5009. SAILORS, Patriotic. English. [Charles I. commanded Admiral Pennington to assist Louis in fighting the Huguenots.] For the third time Pennington took his vanguard into the French harbor, and with him went, with desperate reluctance, the seven merchant ships. One captain, Sir Ferdinando Gorges, broke through and returned, learning that the destination of the fleet was Rochelle. Pennington and the rest doggedly obeyed the king's warrant, and delivered up the ships and their stores without their crews, Pennington declaring that he would rather be hanged in England for disobedience than fight himself or see his seamen fight against their brother Protestants of France. He quietly looked on while his crews deserted, leaving every ship, including his own, to be manned by Frenchmen, and came back to set himself right with his countrymen. The vanguard hastened away to Rochelle, and her cannons, no longer manned by the English crews, accomplished the object of the "martyr king" and "Defender of the Protestant Faith!"—"opening fire against Rochelle, and mowing down the Huguenots like grass." These were the sailors of those days, and this was the English Government of those days.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 3, p. 60.

5010. SAINTS canonized. By Pope. The canonization of saints was practised by every bishop for twelve centuries; at length, the number growing out of all bounds, the popes thought it necessary to assume the exclusive right of canonization. Pope Alexander III., one of the most profligate of men, was the first who issued a solemn decree reserving to himself the sole right of making saints.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 3, p. 85.

5012. SAINTS, Pillar. Stylites. Among these heroes of the monastic life, the name and genius of Simeon Stylites have been immortalized by the singular invention of an aerial penance. At the age of thirteen the young Syrian deserted the profession of a shepherd, and threw himself into an austere monastery. After a long and painful novitiate, in which Simeon was repeatedly saved from pious suicide, he established his residence on a mountain, about thirty or forty miles to the east of Antioch. Within the space of a mandra, or circle of stones, to which he had attached himself by a ponderous chain, he ascended a column which was successively raised from the height of nine to that of sixty feet from the ground. In this last and lofty station the Syrian anchorite resisted the heat of thirty summers and the cold of as many winters. Habit and exercise instructed him to maintain his dangerous situation without fear or giddiness, and successively to assume the different postures of devotion. He sometimes prayed in an erect attitude, with his outstretched arms in the figure of a cross; but his most familiar practice was that of bending his meagre skeleton from the forehead to the feet; and a curious spectator, after numbering twelve hundred and forty-four repetitions, at length desisted from the endless account. The progress of an ulcer in his thigh might shorten but it could not disturb this celestial life; and the patient hermit expired without descending from his column.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 37, p. 539.

5013. SAINTS, Worship of. Introduction. At Rome the bones of St. Peter and St. Paul—or, rather, what they believed to be such—were removed from their graves one hundred and fifty years after their death, and deposited in magnificent shrines. In the following ages Constantinople, which could boast no treasures of that kind within her own walls, had recourse to the provinces, and acquired from them the supposed bodies of St. Andrew, St. Luke, and St. Timothy, after these had been dead for three hundred years. But these sacred treasures were appropriated solely to the churches of the capitals of the empire; other cities and their churches borrowed portions of these older relics; and where they had not interest to procure these, their priests had dexterity to discover relics of their own. The possession of these bones was found to conduce very much to the acquisition of more substantial treasures. It was easy to find skeletons, and to give them names; but it was necessary to prove their authenticity and virtue by making these bones perform miracles. Artifice and roguery had a powerful assistant here in popular credulity; and even natural events, when ascribed to the mediation of saints and martyrs, became proofs of their divine and supernatural power. It was easier for the vulgar mind to approach in prayer the image or simply the idea of a holy man—one who had been on earth subject to like passions with themselves—than to raise their imaginations to the tremendous and incomprehensible nature of the Supreme Power; hence the prayers to saints.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 4, p. 11.

5014. SALARY supplemented. Reign of Charles II. The regular salary, however, was the smallest part of the gains of an official man of that age. From the nobleman who held the white staff and the great seal down to the humblest tide-waiter and gauger, what would now be called gross corruption was practised without disguise and without reproach. Titles, places, commissions, pardons, were daily sold in market overt by the great dignitaries of the realm, and every clerk in every department imitated, to the best of his power, the evil example.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 288.

5015. SARCASM, Merited. "Leave the Thames." [In 1613 James I. threatened ruin to the Londoners by removing his own court, and the Court of Westminster Hall, and the Records in the Tower, because he was refused by the city a donation called a "benevolence." The Lord Mayor replied:] "Your Majesty hath power to do what you please, and your city of London will obey accordingly; but she humbly desires that when your Majesty shall remove your courts you would please to leave the Thames behind you."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 22, p. 357.

5016. SAVAGES, Ancient. Germany. [The Heruli inhabited the dark forests of Germany and Poland.] Their names, the only remains of their language, are Gothic. They fought almost naked, like the Icelandic Berserkirs; their bravery was like madness; few in number, they were mostly of royal blood. What ferocity, what unrestrained license, sullied their victories! The Goth respects the church, the priests, the senate; the Heruli mangle all in a general massacre; there is no pity for age, no refuge for chastity. Among themselves there is the same ferocity: the sick and the aged are put to death, at their own request, during a solemn festival; the widow ends her days by hanging herself upon the tree which shadows her husband's tomb. All these circumstances, so striking to a mind familiar with Scandinavian history, lead us to discover among the Heruli not so much a nation as a confederacy of princes and nobles.—MILMAN'S NOTE IN GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39, p. 16.

5017. SAVAGES, Gentle. Natives of St. Thomas. "So loving, so tractable, so peaceable, are these people," says Columbus in his journal, "that I swear to your majesties there is not in the world a better nation nor a better land. They love their neighbors as themselves, and their discourse is ever sweet and gentle, and accompanied with a smile; and though it is true that they are naked, yet their manners are decorous and praiseworthy."—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 4, ch. 8.

5018. SAVIOUR, A false. Titus Oates. [Titus Oates, the infamous and unscrupulous false witness who caused the death of those whom he accused of connection with the "Popish plot,"] put on an episcopal garb except the lawn sleeves—silk gown and cassock, great hat, satin hat-band and rose, long scarf—and was called, or most blasphemously called himself, the Saviour of the nation. Whoever he pointed at was taken up and committed, so that many people got out of his way, as from a blast. The very breath of him was pestilential, and if it brought not imprisonment or death on whomsoever it fell, it surely poisoned reputation.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 20, p. 337.

5019. SAVIOUR in a Name. Solon. [King of Sardis.] Cræsus being a prisoner, was condemned by [Cyrus] the conqueror to be burnt alive. Accordingly the funeral pile was prepared, and that unhappy prince, being laid thereon, and just upon the point of execution, recollecting the conversation he had formerly had with Solon, was wofully convinced of the truth of that philosopher's admonition, and in remembrance thereof, cried aloud three times, "Solon! Solon! Solon!" Cyrus, who, with the chief officers of his court, was present at this spectacle, was curious to know why Cræsus pronounced that celebrated philosopher's name with so much vehemence in this extremity. Being told the reason, and reflecting upon the uncertain state of all sublimary things, he was touched with commiseration at the prince's misfortune, caused him to be taken from the pile, and treated him afterward, as long as he lived, with honor and respect. Thus had Solon the glory, with one single word, to save the life of one king, and give a wholesome lesson of instruction to another.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1, art. 1.

5020. SCANDAL, Victim of. Rev. Charles Wesley. [The early Methodists were mobbed, their houses pulled down, and their lives in peril in the city of Cork.] Twenty-eight depositions were presented to the grand jury against the rioters, which were all thrown out, and the jury made a remarkable presentment which still stands on the city records, and which declares that "we find and present Charles Wesley to be a person of ill-fame, a vagabond, and a common disturber of his Majesty's peace, and we pray that he may be transported."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 282.

5021. SCANDALS, Ecclesiastical. Roman. The interested views, the selfish and angry passions, the arts of perfidy and dissimulation, the secret corruption, the open and even bloody violence which had formerly disgraced the freedom of election in the commonwealths of Greece and Rome too often influenced the choice of the successors of the apostles. While one of the candidates boasted the honors of his family, a second allured his judges by the delicacies of a plentiful table, and a third, more guilty than his rivals, offered to share the plunder of the church among the accomplices of his sacrilegious hopes.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20, p. 281.

5022. SCARCITY, Value by. Oracles. An unknown woman is said to have come to Tarquin with nine volumes of oracles written by the Sibyl of Cuma, for which she demanded a very considerable price. Tarquin refusing to purchase them at her rate, she burned three of them, and then asked the same price for the remaining six. Her proposal being rejected with scorn, she burned three more, and notwithstanding, still insisted on her first price. Tarquin, surprised at the novelty of the thing, put the books into the hands of the augurs to be examined, who advised to purchase them at any rate. Accordingly he did, and appointed two persons of distinction, styled Duumviri, to be guardians of them, who locked them up in a vault under the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and there they were kept until they were burned with the temple itself.—PLUTARCH'S PUBLICOLA, LANGHORNE'S NOTE.

5023. SCEPTICS, Superstitious. Ashley Cooper, Earl of Shaftesbury. Sceptics are apt to be superstitious; the organization which favors the moral restlessness of perpetual doubt often superinduces a nervous timidity. Shaftesbury was indifferent to religion; his physical irritability made him not indifferent to superstition. He would not fear God, but he watched the stars; he did not receive Christianity, and he could not reject astrology.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 13.

5024. SCHOLARSHIP, Defective. Robert Fulton. At school, Robert Fulton was a dull and troublesome boy. Books were disgusting to him. He had the impudence to tell his teacher, one day, that his head was so full of original notions that there was no vacant room in it for the contents of dusty books. But, out of school, he exhibited intelligence and talent.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 163.

5025. SCHOLARSHIP by Emulation. Charles XII. He was exceedingly obstinate, and, like most obstinate people, was sometimes led by the nose. For example; he would not learn Latin; but when he was artfully told that the King of Denmark and the King of Poland knew that language well, he threw himself into the study of it with great energy, and became a very good scholar [and king of Sweden].—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 433.

5026. SCHOLARSHIP revived. Arabs. In the ninth century we trace the first dawns of the restoration of science. After the fanaticism of the Arabs had subsided the caliphs aspired to conquer the arts, rather than the provinces, of the empire; their liberal curiosity rekindled the emulation of the Greeks, brushed away the dust from their ancient libraries, and taught them to know and reward the philosophers, whose labors had been hitherto repaid by the pleasure of study and the pursuit of truth; . . . a school was opened in the palace of Magnaura; and the presence of Bardas excited the emulation of the masters and students. At their head was the philosopher Leo, archbishop of Thessalonica; his profound skill in astronomy and the mathematics was admired by the strangers of the East; and this occult science was magnified by vulgar credulity, which modestly supposes that all knowledge superior to its own must be the effect of inspiration or magic. At the pressing entreaty of the Cæsar, his friend, the celebrated Photius, renounced the freedom of a secular and studious life, ascended the patriarchal throne, and was alternately excommunicated and absolved by the synods of the East and West. By the confession even of priestly hatred, no art or science, except poetry, was foreign to this universal scholar, who was deep in thought, indefatigable in reading, and eloquent in diction.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53, p. 378.

5027. SCHOOL, Aversion toward. Garibaldi. When he was about fourteen his father took him on board his vessel, on one of his trips to Genoa, and put him at school in that city. The school, it seems, was a very dull one, the teachers being totally unable to interest the boys in their studies; and this active lad suffered intolerably from the confinement and tedium. He and several of his companions resolved to escape. Garibaldi understanding well the management of a sail-boat, they got possession of one, put some provisions on board, and set sail for the open sea. But a treacherous abbe, to whom the secret had been confided, betrayed them, and informed Garibaldi's father, who jumped into a swift boat and made all sail in pursuit, and soon overtook them. They all returned to school crestfallen.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 493.

5028. SCHOOL, Caste in. Harvard. John Adams, in a class of twenty-four, ranked fourteenth. On state occasions, when the class entered a room, he would have gone in fourteenth. His grandson tells us that he would not have held even as high a rank as this but that his mother's ancestors were persons of greater consequence than his father's. This custom of arranging the students in accordance with the supposed social importance of their parents prevailed at Harvard until the year 1769, after which the alphabetical order was substituted.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 171.

5029. SCHOOL, Discipline in. Samuel Johnson. There is now less flogging in our great schools than formerly, but then less is learned there; so that what the boys get at one end they lose at the other.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 265.

5030. SCHOOL everywhere. Socrates. Socrates did not affect the manners or the habits of a public teacher. He had no school; he gave no professed lectures on philosophy; he mingled with his fellow-citizens in all ranks of life, conversing with each man on the subjects best suited to his occupation and talents. The theatres, the temples, the shops of the artists, the courts of justice, the public streets, were all occasionally the scene of his moral conversations and instructive arguments.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 268.

5031. SCHOOL of Observation. Hugh Miller. [He was apprenticed to a stone-mason; the] quarry proved to be one of his best schools . . .

were other men saw nothing, he detected analogies, differences and peculiarities which set him a thinking. He simply kept his eyes and his mind open; was sober, diligent, and persevering; and this was the secret of his intellectual growth.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 91.

5032. SCHOOL, Perils of. Edgar Allan Poe. [This remarkable poet became a drunkard. Mr. John Allan, a rich merchant, adopted him.] When the boy was not quite seven years of age, he took him to London; and, in a village near that city, he placed the little orphan at a boarding-school, where he left him for nearly five years. So far as is known, the child had not a friend, still less a relation, on that side of the ocean. Here was an eager, vivacious, and probably precocious boy, confined in the desolation of an English school; which is, generally speaking, a scene as unsuited to the proper nurture of the young as Labrador for the breeding of canary-birds. Such a boy as that needed the tenderness of women and the watchful care of an affectionate and wise father. He needed love, home, and the minute, fond attention which rare and curious plants usually receive, but which children seldom do, who are so much more worthy of it, and would reward it so much more. He needed, in short, all that he did not have, and he had in abundance much that he did not need. If the truth could be known, it would probably be found that Poe received at this school the germ of the evil which finally destroyed him. Certainly he failed to acquire the self-control and strong principle which might have saved him.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 738.

5033. SCHOOL, Trials at. Napoleon I. [The young aristocrats] sneered at the plainness of Napoleon's dress, and at the emptiness of his purse [when at school at Brienne, near Paris]. His proud spirit was stung to the quick by these indignities, and his temper was roused by that disdain to which he was compelled to submit, and from which he could find no refuge. Then . . . was implanted in his mind that hostility, which he ever afterward so signally manifested to rank, founded not on merit, but upon the accident of birth. . . . Thirty years after this Napoleon said, "Called to the throne by the voice of the people, my maxim has always been, 'A career open to talent,' without distinction of birth."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 1.

5034. SCHOOL-DAYS, Happy. Samuel Johnson. He maintained that a boy at school was the happiest of human beings. I supported a different opinion, from which I have never yet varied, that a man is happier; and I enlarged upon the anxiety and sufferings which are endured at school. JOHNSON: "Ah! Sir, a boy's being flogged is not so severe as a man's having the hiss of the world against him. Men have a solicitude about fame, and the greater share they have of it, the more afraid they are of losing it."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 124.

5035. SCHOOL-LIFE, Tedious. Shakespeare. There was in Stratford an ancient grammar school, where Latin and Greek were taught; and taught (as I guess) in the ancient dull way; for this school Shakespeare attended from about his seventh to his fourteenth year, and he speaks in his plays of boys creeping "unwillingly to school," and of their going from school with alacrity. There are thirteen passages in the works of Shakespeare expressive of the tedium and disgust which boys used to endure in the barbarous schools of the olden time; whereas, there is not one which alludes to school as a pleasant place.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 24.

5036. SCHOOL-LIFE, Temptations of. Wilberforce. [Wilberforce entered St. John's College, Cambridge] 1776, at the age of seventeen. He tells his experience: "I was introduced, on the first night of my arrival, to as licentious a set of men as can well be conceived. They drank hard, and their conversation was even worse than their lives. . . . After the first year I shook off in great measure my connection with them." He got into better society, "but those," he complains, "with whom I was intimate, their object seemed to be to make and keep me idle. If ever I appeared studious they would say to me, 'Why in the world should a man of your fortune trouble himself with faggery?' " Wilberforce was one of the few who could "escape contagion, and emerge pure from so foul a pool."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6.

5037. SCHOOLMASTER imitated. William Cowper. Cowper was under Vincent Bourne, his portrait of whom is, in some respects, a picture not only of its immediate subject, but of the schoolmaster of the last century. "I love the memory of Vinny Bourne. . . . I love him, too, with a love of partiality, because he was usher of the fifth form at Westminster when I passed through it. He was so good-natured and so indolent that I lost more than I got by him, for he made me as idle as himself. He was such a sloven, as if he had trusted to his genius as a cloak for everything that could disgust you in his person; and, indeed, in his writings he has almost made amends for all. . . . I remember seeing the Duke of Richmond set fire to his greasy locks, and box his ears to put it out again."—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 1.

5038. SCHOOLMASTER vs. Soldier. Brougham. [Mr. Brougham in 1828 declared in Parliament that it . . . unconstitutional that almost the whole patronage of the State should be placed in the hands of a military Premier—the Duke of Wellington. But he would not exaggerate the danger.] He was perfectly satisfied that there would be no unconstitutional attack on the liberties of the people. These are not the times for such an attempt. There were periods when the country had heard with dismay that the soldier was abroad. That was not the case now. Let the soldier be ever so . . . much abroad, in the present age he could do nothing. There was another person abroad—a less important person—whose labors had tended to produce this state of things—the schoolmaster was abroad.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 13, p. 229.

5039. SCHOOLS appreciated. Colony of Mass. [In 1636] six years after the arrival of Winthrop, the general court voted a sum, equal to a year's rate of the whole colony, toward the erection of a college. In 1638, John Harvard, who arrived in the bay only to fall a victim to the most wasting disease of the climate, desiring to connect himself imperishably with the happy ness of his adopted country, bequeathed to the college one half of his estate and all his library.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

5040. SCHOOLS, Beginning of. New England Colonies. "To the end that learning may not be buried in the graves of our forefathers," it was ordered in all the Puritan colonies, "that in every township, after the Lord hath increased them to the number of fifty householders, shall appoint one to teach all children to write and read; and when any town shall increase to one hundred families they shall set up a grammar school, the masters thereof being able to instruct youth, so far as they may be fitted for the university."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

5041. SCHOOLS, Christianized. Roman. [About the beginning of the third century the Church was in a prosperous condition.] Philosophy, her most dangerous enemy, was now converted into her most useful ally. The groves of the academy, the gardens of Epicurus, and even the portico of the Stoics, were almost deserted, as so many different schools of scepticism or impiety; and many among the Romans were desirous that the writings of Cicero should be condemned and suppressed by the authority of the senate. The prevailing sect of the new Platonians judged it prudent to connect themselves with the priests, whom, perhaps, they despised, against the Christians, whom they had reason to fear.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16, p. 59.

5042. SCHOOLS, Excellence in. Athenian. The Attic schools of rhetoric and philosophy maintained their superior reputation from the Peloponnesian war to the reign of Justinian. Athens, though situate in a barren soil, possessed a pure air, a free navigation, and the monuments of ancient art. That sacred retirement was seldom disturbed by the business of trade or government; and the last of the Athenians were distinguished by their lively wit, the purity of their taste and language, their social manners, and some traces, at least, in discourse, of the magnanimity of their fathers. In the suburbs of the city, the academy of the Platonists, the lyceum of the Peripatetics, the portico of the Stoics, and the garden of the Epicureans, were planted with trees and decorated with statues; and the philosophers, instead of being immured in a cloister, delivered their instructions in spacious and pleasant walks, which, at different hours, were consecrated to the exercises of the mind and body.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40, p. 106.

5043. SCHOOLS, Perverted. Reign of James II. The king had already begun to treat Oxford with such rigor, that the rigor shown toward Cambridge might, by comparison, be called lenity. Already University College had been turned by Obadiah Walker into a Roman Catholic seminary. Already Christ Church was governed by a Roman Catholic dean. Mass was already said daily in both those colleges.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 261.

5044. SCHOOLS, Ragged. In London. A Scotch gardener, Andrew Walker, attempted to weed "The Devil's Acre" [a district in London abandoned to thieves, beggars, and pickpockets], and in 1839 set up a school, in a stable, for reclaiming the wretched children who swarmed around him. This was the beginning of "Ragged Schools" in London.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 22, p. 399.

5045. ———. In Portsmouth. [John Pounds, a Portsmouth cobbler, started a Ragged School and for many years rescued poor children from destruction. He was a poor man, but] in the course of his benevolent career he was the gratuitous instructor of five hundred children, who without him would have swelled the numbers of the criminal population.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 22, p. 399.

5046. SCHOOLS, Struggle for. James II. He was resolved to transfer to his own Church all the wealthiest and most splendid foundations of England. It was to no purpose that the best and wisest of his Roman Catholic counsellors remonstrated. They represented to him that he had it in his power to render a great service to the cause of his religion without violating the rights of property. [See No. 877].—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 263.

5047. SCIENCE an Ally. War. In the two sieges, the deliverance of Constantinople may be chiefly ascribed to the novelty, the terrors, and the real efficacy of the Greek fire. The important secret of compounding and directing this artificial flame was imparted by Callinicus, a native of Heliopolis, in Syria, who deserted from the service of the caliph to that of the emperor. The skill of a chemist and engineer was equivalent to the succor of fleets and armies; and this discovery or improvement of the military art was fortunately reserved for the distressful period when the degenerate Romans of the East were incapable of contending with the warlike enthusiasm and youthful vigor of the Saracens.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 63, p. 282.

5048. SCIENCE contributory to Art. Navigation. His [John II., King of Portugal] two physicians, Roderigo and Joseph, the latter a Jew, the most able astronomers and cosmographers of his kingdom, together with the celebrated Martin Behem, entered into a learned consultation on the subject. The result of their conferences and labors was the application of the astrolabe to navigation, enabling the seaman, by the altitude of the sun, to ascertain his distance from the equator. This instrument has since been improved and modified into the modern quadrant, of which, even at its first introduction, it possessed all the essential advantages. It is impossible to describe the effect produced upon navigation by this invention. It cast it loose at once from its long bondage to the land, and set it free to rove the deep.—IRVING'S COOLUMBUS, ch. 6.

5049. SCIENCE, Experimental. Baconian. The year 1660, the era of the restoration of the old Constitution, is also the era from which dates the ascendancy of the new philosophy. In that year the Royal Society, destined to be a chief agent in a long series of glorious and salutary reforms, began to exist. In a few months experimental science became all the mode. The transfusion of blood, the ponderation of air, the fixation of mercury, succeeded to that place in the public mind which had been lately occupied by the controversies of the Rota. Dreams of perfect forms of government made way for dreams of wings with which men were to fly from the tower to the Abbey, and of double-reeled ships which were never to founder in the fiercest storm. All classes were hurried along by the prevailing sentiment. Cavalier and Roundhead, Churchman and Puritan, were for once allied. Divines, jurists, statesmen, nobles, princes, swelled the triumph of the Baconian philosophy. Poets sang with emulous fervor the approach of the Golden Age. . . . Dryden, with more zeal than knowledge, joined his voice to the general acclamation, and foretold things which neither he nor anybody else understood. The Royal Society, he predicted, would soon lead us to the extreme verge of the globe, and there delight us with a better view of the moon. —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 379.

5050. SCIENCE, Infatuated by. Pliny. In the first year of the reign of Titus happened that most remarkable eruption of Mount Vesuvius which overwhelmed the cities of Herculaneum and Pompeii, and in which the elder Pliny lost his life, from an earnest curiosity to be a near witness of that striking spectacle. He had determined to embellish his Natural History with a description of that most interesting phenomenon, and for this purpose rushed eagerly into that situation of danger from which others were as eagerly attempting to escape. He was there suffocated by a cloud of sulphurous vapor. —TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 493.

5051. SCIENCE, Magic-like. Admiral Drake. [In 1587 Admiral Drake came to Plymouth and found the populous town had no adequate supply of fresh water.] At Dartmoor he found a leat, or spring, that he found was capable of being conducted from the high ground to a reservoir at the northern suburb of Plymouth. He mounted his horse, says the local tradition, and riding to the distant hills found the desired supply; and having pronounced some magical words, rode back, and the stream followed him all the way to the town. . . . Science since that time has uttered many words which appear magical. —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 14, p. 216.

5052. SCIENCE the Patron of Art. Navigation. [See No. 5867.] Preparatory to this remarkable voyage the Argonauts were furnished with instructions by Chiron, the astronomer, who framed for their use a scheme of the constellations, giving a determined place to the solstitial and equinoctial points; the former in the 15th degrees of Cancer and Capricorn, and the latter in the 15th degrees of Aries and Libra. This recorded fact has served as the basis of an emendation of the ancient chronology by Sir Isaac Newton. —TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 8, p. 71.

5053. SCIENCE and Politics. Julius Cæsar. The genius of Cæsar was not confined to the arts of government, but carried its researches into every branch of science and philosophy. The duration of the year at this time was twelve lunar months, with an intercalation of twenty-two or twenty-three days, alternately, at the end of every two years; but the pontiffs either introduced or omitted the intercalation according to circumstances, as they wanted to abridge or prolong the time of the magistrates continuing in office—and thus there was the greatest confusion in the calendar. Cæsar, who was a proficient in astronomy, and to whose writings in that science even Ptolemy confesses that he owed information, corrected the errors of the calendar by fixing the solar year at three hundred and sixty-five days, with an intercalation of one day every fourth year. —TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 2, p. 412.

5054. SCOURGING ineffective. James II. [The notorious Catherine Sedley was his mistress. In seasons of repentance he stimulated his purpose of reformation by scourging his own shoulders. See No. 1133.] James wrote, imploring and commanding her to depart. He owned that he had promised to bid her farewell in person. "But I know too well," he added, "the power which you have over me. I have not strength of mind enough to keep my resolution if I see you." He offered her a yacht to convey her with all dignity to Flanders, and threatened that if she did not go quietly she should be sent away by force. She at one time worked upon his feelings by pretending to be ill. Then she assumed the airs of a martyr, and impudently proclaimed herself a sufferer for the Protestant religion. Then again she adopted the style of John Hampden. She defied the king to remove her. She would try the right with him. While the Great Charter and the Habeas Corpus Act were the law of the land she would live where she pleased. —MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 67.

5055. SCRIPTURE misused. Against Columbus. A council of clerical sages was convened in the collegiate convent of St. Stephen to investigate the new theory of Columbus. It was composed of professors of astronomy, geography, mathematics, and other branches of science, together with various dignitaries of the church, and learned friars. . . . At the very threshold of the discussion, instead of geographical objections, Columbus was assailed with citations from the Bible and the Testament: the book of Genesis, the psalms of David, the prophets, the epistles, and the gospels. To these were added the expositions of various saints and reverend commentators. —IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 2, ch. 3.

5056. SCULPTOR, The mental. Socrates. [His father was a sculptor.] He was surprised that a sculptor should employ his whole attention to fashion an insensible stone into the likeness of a man, and that a man should take so little pains not to resemble an insensible stone. —ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 9, ch. 4, § 1.

5057. SCULPTURE, Nobility of. Eternalize Fame. It is the peculiar advantage of the art of sculpture that, being ordinarily employed on the most durable materials, and such as possess small intrinsic value, it bids the fairest of all the arts to eternize the fame of the artist. While its works resist all natural decay from time, they afford no temptation to alter their form, in which consists their only value. They may lie hid from neglect in an age of ignorance, but they are safe, though buried in the earth; and avarice or industry, to supply the demands of an after age of taste, will probably recover them. —TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 7, p. 229.

5058. SEA, Passion for the. Sir John Franklin. Almost from infancy the boy had shown a fondness for sea-stories, and had often said that he meant to be a sailor. This was regarded as a boy's fancy that would soon pass away; but when he was but eleven years old a circumstance occurred which gave reason to suppose that his taste for the sea was something more than this. He had never yet beheld the ocean, though it was but twelve miles from his school. One day, when the school had a holiday, he and one of his school-fellows walked that twelve miles to the shore, for no other purpose than to gaze upon the sea. All that he had ever heard or dreamed of the grandeur and charm of the ocean was more than realized, and he sat, hour after hour, entranced with the magnificence of the view. From that day he was never shaken in his resolve to spend his life upon the sea.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 390.

5059. SEA-BATHING unappreciated. England. In the beginning of the eighteenth century . . . there was no gathering on the coast, east or west, north or south, to inhale the breeze or float in the brine. The sea was as much dreaded by inland dwellers as the mountains were hateful to the inhabitants of the plains.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 1, p. 10.

5060. SEAL, Importance of the. British. [William of Orange was welcomed in England and James II. fled for France. The Seal of State was thrown into the Thames.] Next to the Prince of Wales the chief object of anxiety was the great seal. To that symbol of kingly authority our jurists have always ascribed a peculiar and almost mysterious importance. It is held that if the keeper of the seal should affix it, without taking the royal pleasure, to a patent of peerage or to a pardon, though he may be guilty of a high offence, the instrument cannot be questioned by any court of law, and can be annulled only by an act of Parliament. James seems to have been afraid that his enemies might get this organ of his will into their hands, and might thus give a legal validity to acts which might affect him injuriously. [It was recovered.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 486.

5061. SECESSION, Planned. New England. On the night of the 2d of February, 1812, an Irishman, named John Henry, now a naturalized citizen of the United States, called at the President's mansion and revealed to him the astounding fact that the ministry of Great Britain, co-operating with Sir James Craig, Governor of Canada, had been engaged for some years in a treasonable scheme to destroy the American Union. . . . As early as 1808 the attention of the Canadian governor had been called to certain published articles written by Henry against republican governments; and the latter was summoned to Montreal. From him Craig learned of the intense hostility of the Federal party to the administration, and of the great distress of New England on account of the embargo and other restrictions on commerce, . . . and he was promised an annual salary of $5000 to return to Boston and become the secret agent of England and Canada. The purpose of the conspirators was to aggravate the popular discontent of New England until the Eastern States should be induced to secede from the Union and join themselves with Canada. But with the repeal of the embargo and the subsidence of political excitement, the people were in no humor to be led into rebellion. Sir James Craig died, and Henry, unsuccessful and unpaid, went, in 1811, to London, and presented his claim for £30,000 to the English ministers; . . . but this, for services which had resulted in nothing, was reckoned a serious matter, . . . and he was sent back to get what remuneration he could from the successor of Craig in Canada. Enraged at his treatment, the spy, instead of returning to Montreal, sailed to Boston, and going thence to Washington, divulged the whole conspiracy to the President, surrendered his correspondence with Craig, and received therefor $50,000 out of the secret service fund of the United States. The disclosure of this perfidious business contributed greatly to consolidate public sentiment against Great Britain and to strengthen the hands of the war party.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 49, p. 392.

5062. SECRECY, Deception in. Lieutenant-Governor Hutchinson, Mass. A.D. 1769. "I humbly entreat your Lordship that my letters may not be made public," was his ever-renewed prayer to successive secretaries of State, so that he conducted the government like one engaged in a conspiracy or an intrigue. But some of his letters . . . discovered. . . disclosed that he had laid snares for the lives of patriots, and had urged the "thorough" of English liberty in America.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 42.

5063. SECRECY, Impenetrable. Napoleon I. "I never," said Josephine, "beheld Napoleon for a moment perfectly at ease, not even with myself. He is constantly alert. If at any time he appears to show a little confidence, it is merely a feint to throw the person with whom he converses off his guard, and to draw forth his real sentiments; but never does he himself disclose his real thoughts."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 9.

5064. SECRET imperilled, A. Cato. [Cato the Censor said] that in all his life he never repented but of three things: the first was, that he had trusted a woman with a secret; the second, that he had gone by sea when he might have gone by land; and the third, that he had passed one day without having his will in his possession.—PLUTARCH'S "CATO THE CENSOR."

5065. SECRETS burdensome. Josephine. Josephine, frank and candid, and a stranger to all artifice, could not easily conceal her knowledge or her thoughts. Napoleon consequently seldom intrusted to her any plans which he was unwilling to have known. "A secret," he once observed, "is burdensome to Josephine."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 9.

5066. SECTARIAN, The Wind a. Reign of James II. [The disloyal English were waiting to welcome William, Prince of Orange.] The general impatience for the arrival of the Dutch became every day stronger. The gales which at this time blew obstinately from the west, and which at once prevented the prince's armament from sailing and brought fresh Irish regiments from Dublin to Chester, were bitterly cursed and reviled by the common people. The weather, it was said, was popish. Crowds stood in Cheap-side gazing intently at the weather-cock on the graceful steeple of Bow Church, and praying for a Protestant wind.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 433.

5067. SECTARIANISM in Death. Mary Queen of Scots. [Before her speedy execution.] She had asked for her almoner Préaux; two Protestant ministers were sent to her. "Madam, we come to console you," they said, stepping over the threshold of her chamber. "Are you Catholic priests?" she cried. "No," replied they. "Then I will have no comforter but Jesus," she added, with a melancholy firmness.—LAMARTINE'S QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 48.

5068. SECTARIANISM, Narrow. Scots. [William of Orange had been welcomed by the English.] Among the [Scotch] insurgents were some fierce and moody men who had formerly disowned Argyle, and who were now equally eager to disown William. His highness, they said, was plainly a malignant. There was not a word about the Covenant in his declaration. The Dutch were a people with whom no true servant of the Lord would unite. They consorted with Lutherans, and a Lutheran was as much a child of perdition as a Jesuit. The general voice of the kingdom, however, effectually drowned the growl of this hateful faction.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 561.

5069. SECTS, Aversion among. Donatists. If they obtained possession of a church which had been used by their Catholic adversaries, they purified the unhallowed building with the same zealous care which a temple of idols might have required. They washed the pavement, scraped the walls, burnt the altar, which was commonly of wood, melted the consecrated plate, and cast the Holy Eucharist to the dogs, with every circumstance of ignominy which could provoke and perpetuate the animosity of religious factions.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 21, p. 299.

5070. SECTS, Differences of. Persian—Turk. The national religion of the Persians is the Mahometan, as reformed by Sophi. The slender difference of opinions between them and the Turks is the cause of an aversion much stronger than ever subsisted between the Protestants and Catholics. If a Persian were washing his hands in a river, he would conceive himself contaminated if he knew that a Turk had bathed in it.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 23, p. 331.

5071. — — —. Magnified. [When the Greeks and Latins met to form a reunion of the Catholic church in the fifteenth century they experienced great difficulty and their labor was ineffective.] In the treaty between the two nations several forms of consent were proposed, such as might satisfy the Latins without dishonoring the Greeks; and they weighed the scruples of words and syllables till the theological balance trembled with a slight preponderance in favor of the Vatican. It was agreed (I must entreat the attention of the reader) that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son, as from one principle and one substance; that he proceeds by the Son, being of the same nature and substance, and that he proceeds from the Father and the Son, by one spiration and production.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 67, p. 321.

5072. SEDITION, Partisan. "Blues" and "Greens." [Against the Emperor Justinian.] A military force, which had been despatched to the aid of the civil magistrate, was fiercely encountered by an armed multitude, whose numbers and boldness continually increased; and the Heruli, the wildest barbarians in the service of the empire, overturned the priests and their relics, which, from a pious motive, had been rashly interposed to separate the bloody conflict. The tumult was exasperated by this sacrilege; the people fought with enthusiasm in the cause of God; the women, from the roofs and windows, showered stones on the heads of the soldiers, who darted firebrands against the houses; and the various flames, which had been kindled by the hands of citizens and strangers, spread without control over the face of the city. The conflagration involved the cathedral of St. Sophia, the baths of Zeuxippus, a part of the palace, from the first entrance to the altar of Mars, and the long portico from the palace to the forum of Constantine; a large hospital, with the sick patients, was consumed; many churches and stately edifices were destroyed, and an immense treasure of gold and silver was either melted or lost. From such scenes of horror and distress the wise and wealthy citizens escaped over the Bosphorus to the Asiatic side; and during five days Constantinople was abandoned to the factions, whose watchword, Nika, vanquish! has given a name to this memorable sedition.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40, p. 61.

5074. SEDUCTION by Promises. Henry VIII. "If it please you," the king wrote at this time to Anne Boleyn, "to do the office of a true, loyal mistress, and give yourself body and heart to me, who have been and mean to be your loyal servant, I promise you not only the name, but that I shall make you my sole mistress, remove all others from my affection, and serve you only." What stirred Henry's wrath most was Catherine's "stiff and obstinate" refusal to bow to his will. Wolsey's advice that "your grace should handle her both gently and doulcely" only goaded Henry's impatience.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 549.

5075. SEDUCTION, Punishment of. Constantine. The laws of Constantine against rapes not only to the brutal violence which compelled, but even to the gentle seduction which might persuade, an unmarried woman, under the age of twenty-five, to leave the house of her parents. The successful ravisher was punished with death; and as if simple death was inadequate to the enormity of his guilt, he was either burnt alive, or torn in pieces by wild beasts in the amphitheatre. The virgin's declaration that she had been carried away with her own consent, instead of saving her lover, exposed her to share his fate. The duty of a public prosecution was intrusted to the parents of the guilty or unfortunate maid; and if the sentiments of nature prevailed on them to dissemble the injury, and to repair by a subsequent marriage the honor of their family, they were themselves punished by exile and confiscation. The slaves, whether male or female, who were convicted of having been accessory to rape or seduction, were burnt alive, or put to death by the ingenious torture of pouring down their throats a quantity of melted lead. . . . But whenever the offence inspires less horror than the punishment, the rigor of penal law is obliged to give way to the common feelings of mankind.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 14, p. 495.

5076. SEEKING for God. Cromwell. For my beloved daughter, Bridget Ireton, . . . your sister Claypole is, I trust in mercy, exercised with some perplexed thoughts. She sees her own vanity and carnal mind—bemoaning it. She seeks after (as I hope also) what will satisfy. And thus to be a seeker is to be one of the best sect next to a finder ; and such a one shall every faithful humble seeker be at the end. Happy seeker, happy finder ! Who ever tasted that the Lord is gracious, without some sense of self, vanity, and badness ? Who ever tasted that graciousness of His, and could go less in desire [i.e., because less desirous], less pressing after full enjoyment ? Dear heart, press on ; let not thy husband, let not anything cool thy affections after Christ. I hope he [thy husband] will be an occasion to inflame them. That which is best worthy of love in thy husband is that of the image of Christ he bears. Look on that, and love it best, and all the rest for that. I pray for thee and him ; do so for me.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 12, p. 161.

5077. SELF, Conquest of. Mahomet. He instituted in each year a fast of thirty days, and strenuously recommended the observance as a discipline which purifies the soul and subdues the body, as a salutary exercise of obedience to the will of God and his apostle. During the month of Ramadan, from the rising to the setting of the sun, the Mussulman abstains from eating, and drinking, and women, and baths, and perfumes ; from all nourishments that can restore his strength, from all pleasure that can gratify his senses. In the revolutions of the lunar year the Ramadan coincides, by turns, with the winter cold and the summer heat ; and the patient martyr, without assuaging his thirst with a drop of water, must expect the close of a tedious and sultry day. The interdiction of wine, peculiar to some orders of priests or hermits, is converted by Mahomet alone into a positive and general law ; and a considerable portion of the globe has abjured, at his command, the use of that salutary though dangerous liquor.—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 28.

5078. SELF first. Honors. [Battle with Xerxes.] . . . When they came to the Isthmus, and every officer [of the Athenians] took a bullet from the altar to inscribe upon it the names of those that had done the best service, every one put himself in the first place, and Themistocles in the second.—PLUTARCH'S "THEMISTOCLES."

5079. SELF, Mastery of. Alfred the Great. Scholar and soldier, artist and man of business, poet and saint, his character kept that perfect balance which charms us in no other Englishman save Shakespeare. And all was guided, controlled, ennobled by a single aim. "So long as I have lived," said the king as life closes about him, "I have striven to live worthily." Little by little men came to know what such a life of worthiness meant. Little by little they came to recognize in Ælfred a ruler of higher and nobler stamp than the world had seen. Never had it seen a king who lived solely for the good of his people. Never had it seen a ruler who set aside every personal aim to devote himself solely to the welfare of those whom he ruled. It was this grand self-mastery that gave him his power over the men about him.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 69.

5080. SELF-ABNEGATION in Oratory. Demosthenes. That which characterizes Demosthenes more than any other circumstance, and in which he has never been imitated, is such an absolute oblivion of himself, and so scrupulous and constant a solicitude to suppress all ostentation of wit—in a word, such a perpetual care to confine the attention of the auditor to the cause, and not to the orator, that he never suffers any one turn of thought or expression to escape him which has no other view than merely to please and shine. This reserve and moderation in so fine a genius as Demosthenes, and in matters so susceptible of grace and elegance, adds perfection to his merit, and renders him superior to all praises.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 16, § 2.

5081. SELF-ABNEGATION, Patriotic. Regulus. [Attilus Regulus led the Roman army against the Carthaginians and was captured.] Carthage . . . began seriously to wish for peace. Ambassadors for that purpose were despatched to Rome ; and Regulus was sent along with them [to encourage the negotiations]. They exacted at the same time from him an oath that he would return to Carthage in case there should neither be peace nor an exchange of prisoners. To the surprise of all, this great and generous man used his utmost endeavors to dissuade his countrymen from agreeing to a peace ; a proposition which he represented as proceeding solely from the weakness of the enemy, whom, by continuing the war, they would compel to any submission. But still further, he even dissuaded his countrymen from consenting to an exchange of prisoners ; a measure which he endeavors to convince them must be to their disadvantage, from this circumstance, that they had in their hands many of the best officers of the enemy, whom they would be obliged to exchange against private men. His arguments prevailed, and the negotiation was broken off. . . . The Pontifex Maximus, on being consulted on the validity of the oath he had sworn to return to Carthage, gave it as his opinion that, it having been extorted by the necessity of his situation, he was under no obligation to observe it. But the noble soul of Regulus could not admit of such evasion. Disregarding the entreaties of his friends, the tears of his wife and children, the urgent remonstrance of the senate and of the whole Roman people, this generous and heroic man resolved that the terror of consequences, how dreadful soever, should not persuade him to a violation of his honor. "I am not ignorant," said he, "that death and the severest tortures are preparing for me ; but what are these to the stain of an infamous action, the reproach of a guilty mind ? I have sworn to return to Carthage ; it is therefore my duty to go. Let the gods direct the consequence as to their wisdom shall seem best." To Carthage accordingly he returned, where, as he had foreseen, he suffered a cruel and ignominious death.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9, p. 369.

5082. SELF-COMMAND against Fear. William III. One day when William III. was in the trenches [before the walls of Numur] the deputy governor of the Bank of England placed himself at his side. "Mr. Godfrey," said the king, "why do you expose yourself?" The Londoner replied, "Not being more exposed than your Majesty, should I be excusable if I showed more concern?" William, who had a special objection to men going beyond their commission, replied, "I am in my duty and therefore have a more reasonable claim to preservation." A cannon-ball in a few minutes finished the career of the over-zealous amateur.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 12, p. 181.

5083. SELF-CONTROL, Remarkable. Duke Frederic. It is but justice to this most respectable man to relate an anecdote, told by Roger Ascham, preceptor to Queen Elizabeth, who, when in Germany, was personally acquainted with him. Duke Frederic was taken prisoner by Charles V. in the battle of Mulberg, and upon a representation of some of his councillors that the exemplary punishment of so eminent a man would prove of great service in checking the progress of the Reformation, the emperor, forgetting his own obligations to him, condemned him to be beheaded, on a scaffold, at Wittenberg. The warrant for his execution, signed by the emperor's hand, was sent to Duke Frederic the night before, and was delivered to him while he was playing at chess, with his cousin, the landgrave of Luthenbergh. He read it over attentively, and then folding it up, "I perceive," said he, "that I fall a victim to my religion, and that my death is necessary to the emperor's schemes of distinguishing the Protestant faith. But God will maintain his own cause. Come, sinner," said he, "take heed to your game;" and then, with the same composure as if he had received a private letter of little importance, he continued to play till he had defeated his antagonist. It is a satisfaction to learn that the emperor, impressed, as is said, by this admirable example of fortitude, gave immediate orders for a recall of the warrant, and ever afterward treated the elector of Saxony with the highest respect and esteem.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 19, p. 286.

5084. SELF-DENIAL, Conception of. American Indian. The Indian, detesting restraint, was perpetually imposing on himself extreme hardships, that by penance and suffering he might atone for his offences, and by acts of self-denial he might win for himself the powerful favor of the invisible world.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

5085. SELF-DENIAL, Unavailing. Rev. William Bramwell. [He was inclined to piety from his childhood, but] an exemplary life could not satisfy the demands of his conscience. He sought relief by austerities, which only exasperated his sufferings; he would bow for hours with his knees bare on sand which he spread on the floor, confessing his sins and repeating his prayers. He spent his holidays meditating in the solitude of the woods; he fasted and watched, and took solitary walks throughout the night. After protracted struggles he received better views of faith, while partaking of the Lord's Supper at the church of Preston.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 309.

5086. SELF-DESTRUCTION, Working for. Making Arms. [In A.D. 410 Alaric the Goth plundered Rome. He was made master-general of Eastern Illyricum.] The use to which Alaric applied his new command distinguishes the firm and judicious character of his policy. He issued his orders to the four magazines and manufactures of offensive and defensive arms, Margus, Ratiaria, Naissus, and Thessalonica, to provide his troops with an extraordinary supply of shields, helmets, swords, and spears; the unhappy provincials were compelled to forge the instruments of their own destruction; and the barbarians removed the only defect which had sometimes disappointed the efforts of their courage.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 30, p. 198.

5087. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Basis of. France. France had tried Republicanism, and the experiment had failed [and Napoleon became dictator]. There was neither intelligence nor virtue among the people sufficient to enable them to govern themselves. During ages of oppression they had sunk into an abyss from whence they could not rise, in a day, to the dignity of freemen. Not one in thirty of the population of France could either read or write. Religion, with all its restraints, was scouted as fanaticism.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 16.

5088. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Capacity for. Massachusetts. A.D. 1774. As the supervision of [royal] government disappeared, each man seemed more and more a law unto himself; and as if to show that the world had been governed too much, order prevailed in a province where, in fact, there existed no regular government, no administration but committees, no military officers but those chosen by the militia. Yet never were legal magistrates obeyed with more alacrity.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 16.

5089. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Faculty of. Romans—English. To the student of political history, and to the English student above all others, the conversion of the Roman republic into a military empire commands a peculiar interest. Notwithstanding many differences, the English and the Romans essentially resemble one another. The early Romans possessed the faculty of self-government beyond any people of whom we have historical knowledge, with the one exception of ourselves.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 1.

5090. SELF-GOVERNMENT withheld. Virginia Colony. The first written charter of a permanent American colony, which was to be the chosen abode of liberty, gave to the mercantile corporation nothing but a desert territory, with the right of peopling and defending it, and reserved to the monarch absolute legislative authority, the control of all appointments, and a hope of ultimate revenue. To themselves it conceded not one elective franchise, not one of the rights of self-government.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., ch. 4.

5091. SELF-POSSESSION, Brave. Admiral Le Fort. One day, after a dinner of unusual excess, he [Peter the Great] fell into a dispute with Admiral Le Fort, and was so transported with fury that he rushed upon him sword in hand.

Le Fort, with admirable self-possession, bared his bosom to the stroke, and stood motionless to receive it. The czar, drunk as he was, was recalled to himself by this action, put up his sword, and, as soon as he was a little sobered, publicly asked Le Fort's pardon for his violence. "I am trying," said he, "to reform my country, and I am not yet able to reform myself."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 430.

5092. SELF-PROTECTION first. War. Grecian lawgivers [were wont to] punish him who throws away his shield, not him who loses his sword or spear; thus instructing us that the first care of every man, especially of every governor of a city, or commander of an army, should be to defend himself, and after that he is to think of annoying the enemy.—PLUTARCH'S PELOPIDAS.

5093. SELF-RELIANCE, Excellence in. Duc de Liancourt. Louis Philippe and brothers visited . . . Mount Vernon. The amiable Duc de Liancourt bore his reverses of fortune with great magnanimity. He used to say: "In the days of my power and affluence, under the ancient régime of France, I kept fifty servants, and yet my coat was never so well brushed as it is now."—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 22.

5094. SELF-RELIANCE, Success by. General Grant. [He proposed to pass his gun-boats past the formidable batteries of Vicksburg.] When the idea became known to those in his intimacy, to his staff, and to his corps commanders, it seemed to them full of danger. To move his army below Vicksburg was to separate it from the North, and from all its supplies. . . . If failure came it was sure to be overwhelming. . . . Sherman, McPherson, Logan, Wilson—all opposed his plan. [His persistence occasioned the fall of Vicksburg.]—HEADLEY'S GRANT, p. 104.

5095. SELF-SACRIFICE, Magnanimity of. Alexander. [When the army of Alexander the Great was marching against Darius, in crossing the deserts] they often suffered more for want of water than by fatigue; many of the cavalry were unable to hold out. While they were upon the march some Macedonians had filled their bottles at a river, and were bringing the water upon mules. These people, seeing Alexander greatly distressed with thirst (for it was in the heat of the day), immediately filled a helmet with water, and presented it to him. He asked them to whom they were carrying it, and they said, "Their sons; but if our prince does but live, we shall get other children, if we lose them." Upon this he took the helmet in his hands; but looking round, and seeing all the horsemen bending their heads, and fixing their eyes upon the water, he returned it without drinking. However, he praised the people that offered it, and said, "If I alone drink, these good men will be dispirited." The cavalry, who were witnesses to this act of temperance and magnanimity, cried out, "Let us march! We are neither weary nor thirsty, nor shall we even think ourselves mortal, while under the conduct of such a king." At the same time they put spurs to their horses.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

5096. SELFISHNESS, Petulant. Roman Nobles. When they have called for warm water, if a slave has been tardy in his obedience, he is instantly chastised with three hundred lashes; but should the same slave commit a wilful murder, the master will mildly observe that he is a worthless fellow; but that if he repeats the offence, he shall not escape punishment.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 256.

5097. SENSATION, Public. Captain John Smith. [Based on fiction.] Then it was—eight years after his residence with Powhatan—that he first told the famous tale of his rescue by Pocahontas from a violent death. Doubtless he told it to help the advertising scheme, and to excuse his old friend Rolfe for marrying an Indian girl. He wrote a letter to the Queen of England, recommending the "Virginia Princess" to her Majesty, in which he used the following language: "After some six weeks' fattening among those savage courtiers, at the minute of my execution, she hazarded the beating out of her own brains to save mine; and not only that, but so prevailed with her father that I was safely conducted to Jamestown." The trick succeeded to admiration. Pocahontas became the lion of the London season. The king and queen received her at court with gracious civility; the bishop of London gave her a banquet, and King James consulted his council upon the question, whether Rolfe had not committed a grave offence in marrying a princess of an imperial house! After a year's stay in England poor Pocahontas, sick from the change in her mode of living, and yet unwilling to go, set out with her husband on her return home. While waiting at Gravesend for the sailing of the ship, she died.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 659.

5098. SENSATIONALISTS by Singularity. Samuel Johnson. BOSWELL: "Is it wrong then, sir, to affect singularity, in order to make people stare?" JOHNSON: "Yes, if you do it by propagating error; and, indeed, it is wrong in any way. There is in human nature a general inclination to make people stare; and every wise man has himself the cure of it, and does cure himself. If you wish to make people stare by doing better than others, why, make them stare till they stare their eyes out. But consider how easy it is to make people stare, by being absurd. I may do it by going into a drawing-room without my shoes. You remember the gentleman in the Spectator, who had a commission of lunacy taken out against him for his extreme singularity, such as never wearing a wig, but a nightcap. Now, sir, abstractedly, the night-cap was best; but, relatively, the advantage was overbalanced by his making the boys run after him."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 161.

5099. SENSE, Effect of good. Joan of Arc. The originality of the Pucelle, the secret of her success, was not her courage or her visions, but her good sense. Amid all her enthusiasm the girl of the people clearly saw the question, and knew how to resolve it. The knot which politicians and doubter could not unloose she cut. She pronounced, in God's name, Charles VII. to be the heir; she reassured him as to his legitimacy, of which he had doubts himself, and she sanctified this legitimacy by taking him straight to Reims, and by her quickness gaining over the English the decisive advantage of the coronation.—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 1.

5100. SENSE deceived. Gnostics. The Gnostics were distinguished by the epithet of Docetes, . . . and betrayed the human while they asserted the divine nature of Christ. . . . They vainly pretended that the imperfections of matter are incompatible with the purity of a celestial substance. While the blood of Christ yet smoked on Mount Calvary, the Docetes invented the impious and extravagant hypothesis that, instead of issuing from the womb of the Virgin, He had descended on the banks of the Jordan in the form of perfect manhood ; that he had imposed on the senses of His enemies and of His disciples, and that the ministers of Pilate had wasted their impotent rage on an airy phantom, who seemed to expire on the cross, and after three days to rise from the dead.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 21, p. 307.

5101. SENSE, Fallacious. Eleatic School. The Eleatic sect of philosophy . . . was founded by Xenophanes about five hundred years before Christ. They maintained that things had neither a beginning, an end, nor any change ; that all the phenomena which we see of changes in the visible world are entirely in our own senses ; and that of the real essence of things we have no perception, and therefore can attain to no knowledge ; but as our senses are fallacious, and it is only through their medium that we perceive anything, so we cannot trust to them, and therefore have no assurance of the truth of anything whatever. Yet upon this basis of nothing, the Eleatics (strange to tell) raised a system of physics, of which the principal doctrines were, that the universe was a compound of the four elements ; that the stars were kindled up by the motion of the clouds ; that the sun was an immense body of ignited vapor ; but that various suns lighted various parts of the earth ; and, finally (the only rational dogma, though not derived by any logical inference from premises), that there is but one God, who rules over all nature.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 265.

5103. SENSIBILITY, Nervous. Southey. It would not do for Southey to burn away to-day in some white flame of excitement the nerve which he needed for use to-morrow. He could not afford to pass a sleepless night. If his face glowed or his brain throbbed, it was a warning that he had gone far enough. His very susceptibility to nervous excitement rendered caution the more requisite. . . . "The truth is," writes

Southey, "that though some persons, whose knowledge of me is scarcely skin-deep, suppose I have no nerves, because I have great self-control as far as regards the surface, if it were not for great self-management, and what may be called a strict intellectual regimen, I should very soon be in a deplorable state of what is called nervous disease, and this would have been the case any time during the last twenty years." And again : "A man had better break a bone, or even lose a limb, than shake his nervous system."—DOWDEN'S SOUTHEY, ch. 4.

5104. SENSITIVENESS to Defect. Philip of Macedon. [He besieged the city of Methone.] Aster of Amphipolis had offered his service to Philip as so excellent a marksman that he could bring down birds in their most rapid flight. The monarch made this answer : "Well, I will take you into my service when I make war upon starlings ;" which answer stung the cross-bowman to the quick. A repartee proves often of fatal consequence to him who makes it ; and it is no small merit to know when to hold one's tongue. Aster having thrown himself into the city, he let fly an arrow, on which was written, "To Philip's right eye," and gave him a most cruel proof that he was a good marksman ; for it hit him in his right eye. Philip sent him back the same arrow with this inscription, "If Philip takes the city, he will hang up Aster ;" and accordingly he was as good as his word. A skilful surgeon drew the arrow out of Philip's eye with so much art and dexterity that not the least scar remained ; and though he could not save his eye, he yet took away the blemish. But nevertheless this monarch was so weak as to be angry whenever any person happened to let slip the word Cyclops, or even the word eye, in his presence.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 14, § 11.

5105. SENSUALITY, Imperial. Commodus. The Emperor Commodus valued nothing in sovereign power except the unbounded license of indulging his sensual appetites. His hours were spent in a seraglio of three hundred beautiful women, and as many boys, of every rank and of every province ; and wherever the arts of seduction proved ineffectual, the brutal lover had recourse to violence. The ancient historians have expatiated on these abandoned scenes of prostitution, which scorned every restraint of nature or modesty ; but it would not be easy to translate their too faithful descriptions into the decency of modern language.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4, p. 111.

5106. SENSUALITY, Religious. Pagans. The temple and the village [of Daphne] were deeply bosomed in a thick grove of laurels and cypresses, which reached as far as a circumference of ten miles, and formed in the most sultry summers a cool and impenetrable shade. A thousand streams of the purest water, issuing from every hill, preserved the verdure of the earth and the temperature of the air ; the senses were gratified with harmonious sounds and aromatic odors ; and the peaceful grove was consecrated to health and joy, to luxury and love. The vigorous youth pursued, like Apollo, the object of his desires ; and the blushing maid was warned, by the fate of Daphne, to shun the folly of unseasonable coyness. The soldier and the philosopher wisely avoided the temptation of this sensual paradise, where pleasure, assuming the character of religion, imperceptibly dissolved the firmness of manly virtue. But the groves of Daphne continued for many ages to enjoy the veneration of natives and strangers; the privileges of the holy ground were enlarged by the munificence of succeeding emperors; and every generation added new ornaments to the splendor of the temple.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 23, p. 448.

5107. SENTIMENT ignored. Romans. To prevent the risk of a second act of insubordination, Sylla [the Dictator] made personal arrangements to attach Pompey directly to himself. He had a step-daughter named Æmilia. She was already married, and was pregnant. Pompey too was married to Antistia, a lady of good family; but domestic ties were not allowed to stand in the way of higher objects. Nor did it matter that Antistia's father had been murdered by the Roman populace for taking Sylla's side, or that her mother had gone mad and destroyed herself on her husband's horrible death. Late Republican Rome was not troubled with sentiment. Sylla invited Pompey to divorce Antistia and marry Æmilia. Pompey complied. Antistia was sent away. Æmilia was divorced from her husband, and was brought into Pompey's house, where she immediately died.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 8.

5108. SENTIMENTS, Power of. Jane MacCreac. July, 1777. Jane MacCreac, a young woman of twenty, betrothed to a loyalist in the British service and esteeming herself under the protection of British arms, was riding from Fort Edward [N. Y.] to the British camp at Sandy Hill, escorted by two Indians. The Indians quarrelled about the reward offered on her safe arrival, and at half a mile from Fort Edward one of them sunk a tomahawk in her skull. The incident was not of unusual barbarity; but this massacre of a betrothed girl on her way to her lover touched the hearts of all who heard the story.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 22.

5109. SENTIMENT, Public. Better than Laws. Lysurgus left none of his laws in writing; it was ordered in one of the Rhetoræ that none should be written. For what he thought most conducive to the virtue and happiness of a city was principles interwoven with the manners and breeding of the people. These would remain immovable as formed in inclination, and be the strongest and most lasting tie; and the habits which education produced in the youth would answer in each the purpose of a law-giver.—PLUTARCH'S "LYCURGUS."

5110. — — —. Mary Queen of Scots. [After Mary Queen of Scots had married Bothwell, the supposed murderer of her previous husband, she was soon captured by a confederacy of nobles who sought to put down the power of Bothwell.] She was conducted into Edinburgh amidst the execrations of an infuriated populace. The soldiers carried a banner on which was painted the body of the murdered Darnley lying under the tree near the kirk of Field, and a child kneeling beside it, with the legend "Judge and avenge my cause, O Lord." This terrible flag was paraded before her; and when she awoke next morning, and looked out of the window of the provost house in which she had been lodged, the same dreadful representation was hung up to meet her first gaze. In her despair she attempted to address the people, who were moved to some pity at her agony. [Public sentiment punished the murderer.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 9, p. 149.

5111. SENTIMENTS, Irrepressible. Napoleon I. [He declared there was no nobility but that of merit, yet] he divorced his faithful Josephine and married a daughter of the Cæsars, that by an illustrious alliance he might avail himself of this universal and innate prejudice. No power of reasoning can induce one to look with the same interest upon the child of Cæsar and the child of the beggar.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 1.

5112. SEPULCHRE, Kissing the Holy. Crusaders. [The Crusaders had taken the city of Jerusalem.] The holy sepulchre was now free, and the bloody victors prepared to accomplish their vow. Bareheaded and barefoot, with contrite hearts, and in a humble posture, they ascended the hill of Calvary, amidst the loud anthems of the clergy, kissed the stone which had covered the Saviour of the world, and bedewed with tears of joy and penitence the monument of their redemption.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58, p. 594.

5113. SEPULCHRES, Economy in. Athenians. The expense was excessive at the death of great persons, and their sepulchres were as sumptuous and magnificent as those of the Romans in the age of Cicero. Demetrius made a law to abolish this abuse, which had passed into a custom, and inflicted penalties on those who disobeyed it. He also ordered the ceremonials of funerals to be performed by night, and none were permitted to place any other ornament on tombs than a column three cubits high, or a plain tablet, mensam, and appointed a particular magistrate to enforce the observation of this law.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 16, § 5.

5114. SEPULTURE, Preparation for. Spartans. The body of Agesilaus was carried to Sparta. Those who were about him not having honey, with which it was the Spartan custom to cover the bodies they wished to embalm, made use of wax in its stead.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 12, § 10.

5115. SERENADE, Response to. Abraham Lincoln. On the occasion of a serenade, the President was called for by the crowd assembled. He appeared at the window with his wife (who is somewhat below the medium height), and made the following brief remarks: "Here I am, and here is Mrs. Lincoln. That's the long and short of it."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 749.

5116. SERFAGE, Burdens of. England. Thirteenth Century. The troubles of the time helped here as elsewhere the progress of the town: serfs, fugitives from justice or their lord, the trader, the Jew, naturally sought shelter under the strong hand of St. Edmund. But the settlers were wholly at the abbot's mercy. Not a settler but was bound to pay his pence to the abbot's treasury, to plow a rood of his land, to reap in his harvest-field, to fold his sheep in the abbey folds, to help bring the annual catch of eels from the abbey waters. Within the four crosses that bounded the abbot's domain land and water were his : the cattle of the townsmen paid for their pasture on the common ; if the fullers refused the loan of their cloth, the cellars would refuse the use of the stream, and seize their looms wherever they found them. No toll might be levied from tenants of the abbey farms, and customers had to wait before shop and stall till the buyers of the abbot had had the pick of the market. There was little chance of redress, for if burghers complained in folk-mote it was before the abbot's officers that its meeting was held ; if they appealed to the alderman, he was the abbot's nominee and received the horn, the symbol of his office, at the abbot's hands. Like all the greater revolutions of society, the advance from this mere serfage was a silent one ; indeed, its more galling instances of oppression seem to have slipped unconsciously away.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 177.

5117. SERMON, A long. Bishop Burnet. In the pulpit, the effect of his discourses, which were delivered without any notes, was heightened by a noble figure and by pathetic action. He was often interrupted by the deep hum of his audience ; and when, after preaching out the hour-glass, which in those days was part of the furniture of the pulpit, he held it up in his hand, the congregation clamorously encouraged him to go on till the sand had run off once more.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 162.

5118. SERMON, A queer. Bishop Turner's. [At the coronation of James II.] The sermon was made up of quaint conceits, such as seventy years earlier might have been admired, but such as moved the scorn of a generation accustomed to the purer eloquence of Sprat, of South, and of Tillotson. King Solomon was King James. Adonijah was Monmouth. Joab was a Rye House conspirator ; Shimei a Whig libeler ; Abiathar, an honest but misguided old Cavalier. One phrase in the Book of Chronicles was construed to mean that the king was above the Parliament [and another was cited to prove that he alone ought to command the militia].—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 441.

5119. SERMONS, Soporific. Latimer's. The good Latimer is not very hard upon those who slept at sermons ; he tells a story of a gentlewoman of London whose neighbor met her in the street and said, " Mistress, whither go ye ? " " Marry," said she, " I am going to St. Thomas of Acres to the sermon. I could not sleep all this last night, and I am going now thither : I never failed of a good nap there."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 29, p. 491.

5120. SERVANT, Devotion of. Maria. The story of Maria, the daughter of the magnificent Eudæmon, is singular and interesting. In the sack of Carthage she was purchased from the Vandals by some merchants from Syria, who afterward sold her as a slave in their native country. A female attendant, transported in the same ship, and sold in the same family, still continued to respect a mistress whom fortune had reduced to the common level of servitude ; and the daughter of Eudæmon received from her grateful affection the domestic services which she had once required from her obedience. This remarkable behavior divulged the real condition of Maria, who, in the absence of the bishop of Cyrrhus, was redeemed from slavery by the generosity of some soldiers of the garrison.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 33, p. 382.

5121. SERVANT, A useful. Sidney Godolphin. Godolphin had been bred a page at Whitehall, and had early acquired all the flexibility and the self-possession of a veteran courtier. He was laborious, clear-headed, and profoundly versed in the details of finance. Every government, therefore, found him a useful servant ; and there was nothing in his opinions or in his character which could prevent him from serving any government. " Sidney Godolphin," said Charles, " is never in the way, and never out of the way." This pointed remark goes far to explain Godolphin's extraordinary success in life.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 238.

5122. SERVICE, Demoralized. Reign of Charles II. The chief bait which allured these men [the court favorites] into the [naval] service was the profit of conveying bullion and other valuable commodities from port to port ; for both the Atlantic and the Mediterranean were then so infested by pirates from Barbary that merchants were not willing to trust precious cargoes to any custody but that of a man-of-war. A captain in this way sometimes cleared several thousand pounds by a short voyage ; and for this lucrative business he too often neglected the interests of his country and the honor of his flag, made mean submission to foreign powers, disobeyed the most direct injunctions of his superiors, lay in port when he was ordered to chase a Sallee rover, or run with dollars to Leghorn when his instructions directed him to repair to Lisbon ; and all this he did with impunity.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 283.

5123. SEVERITY, Disgraceful. " Bottomless Bagge." There was one living in the West at that time, " Bottomless Bagge," Sir James Bagge, and it is to no other than Archbishop Laud that he must be thankful for his characteristic patronymic. He was Buckingham's choice, and a most worthy agent for the West ; he had a profound genius for servilities, meannesses, and rascalities of every kind ; he was a man who could lick the blacking off a great man's boots and swear that it was better than port wine ; it was he who offered the £5 to the Frenchmen for their £80. We see in him the cur constantly snapping round about the heels of Eliot, and always with the same sinuous sanctity—his fragrant name is an ointment poured forth with a large flavoring of asafœtida ; a truculent rascal, a genuine barnacle, a great high-priest of the Circumlocution Office, embodying in himself a premature aptitude of chicane and red tape, which might make him a study even in these modern days. The rascal does not seem to have got the worst of it.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 4, p. 64.

5124. SEVERITY, Parental. Roman. [War with the Samnites.] The battle began ; and Titus Manlius, the son of the consul Torquatus, being challenged by a Latin captain, accepted the summons, defeated his antagonist, and returned with his spoils to the main army. His father, with a true Roman severity, ordered his head to be struck off for disobedience.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 7, p. 353.

5125. SHAME, Consummate. Queen of Spain. A.D. 1808. [Prince] Ferdinand [who demanded the abdication of his imbecile father and dissolute mother, Charles IV. and Louisa Maria] was endeavoring to blazon abroad his mother's shame, and to bring Godroy [one of the king's body-guard] to trial as his mother's paramour. Napoleon thus delicately suggested to him that, in dishonoring his mother, he did but invalidate the legitimacy of his own birth. . . . The still more wretched mother retaliated, as perhaps no mother ever retaliated before. She told her son to his face that he was of ignoble birth—that her husband was not his father.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 1.

5126. SHAMS, Military. American Revolution. [Major General Stupen wrote of the disorder and confusion in Washington's army at Valley Forge as he found it.] I have seen a regiment consisting of thirty men, and a company of one corporal. [The men were only engaged for three, or six, or nine months, so that it was impossible to have a regiment or company complete.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 24, p. 383.

5127. SHOUTING vs. Silence. Trojans—Greeks. It appears from Homer's accounts that the Greeks, in rushing on to engagement, preserved a deep silence, while the Trojans, like most other barbarous nations, uttered hideous shouts at the moment of attack.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 8, p. 78.

5128. SICKNESS cured by Gifts, The. Fifteenth Century. The Church held its empire over the will of the population, high and low, through the universal belief in the efficacy of its ceremonial observances for procuring health and weal and the safety of souls: A husband is sick in London, and his anxious wife writes, "My mother behested [vowed] another image of wax of the weight of you, to our Lady of Walsingham; and she sent four nobles to the four orders of Friars at Norwich to pray for you; and I have behested to go on a pilgrimage to Walsingham and St. Leonards." [A.D. 1450-1486.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 8, p. 125.

5129. SICKNESS, Friend in. Samuel Johnson. Miss Williams told me he asked her to sit down by him, which she did; and upon her inquiring how he was, he answered, "I am very ill indeed, madam. I am very ill when you are near me; what should I be were you at a distance?"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 519.

5130. SICKNESS, Information in. Aristotle. Once, when he was sick, he said to the doctor, "Do not treat me as you would a driver of oxen or a digger, but tell me the cause, and you will find me obedient."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 558.

5131. SICKNESS, Saintly. Rev. John W. Fletcher. A friend went to visit the heavenly-minded Fletcher in his illness. He remarked: "I went to see a man with one foot in the grave, but found him with one foot in heaven."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 50.

5132. SIGN of Destiny. Mahomet. [The monk Djerdjis, at an interview] perceived a sign below the neck, between the shoulders of Mahomet, a sign regarded by the Arabs as the omen of a great destiny.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 58.

5133. SIGNAL for Action. Alexander. In drawing up his army and giving orders, as well as exercising and reviewing it, he spared Bucephalus on account of his age, and rode another horse; but he constantly charged upon him; and he had no sooner mounted him than the signal was always given.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

5134. SIGNAL mistaken. Gildo the Rebel. Gildo was prepared to resist the invasion with all the forces of Africa. . . . He proudly reviewed an army of 70,000 men, and boasted, with the rash presumption which is the forerunner of disgrace, that his numerous cavalry would trample under their horses' feet the troops of Mascezel, and involve, in a cloud of burning sand, the natives of the cold regions of Gaul and Germany. But the Moor, who commanded the legions of Honorius [the Roman Emperor], . . . fixed his camp of 5000 veterans in the face of a superior enemy and, after the delay of three days, gave the signal of a general engagement. As Mascezel advanced before the front with fair offers of peace and pardon, he encountered one of the foremost standard-bearers of the Africans, and on his refusal to yield, struck him on the arm with his sword. The arm and the standard sunk under the weight of the blow; and the imaginary act of submission was hastily repeated by all the standards of the line. At this signal the disaffected cohorts proclaimed the name of their lawful sovereign; the barbarians, astonished by the defection of their Roman allies, dispersed, according to their custom, in tumultuary flight; and Mascezel obtained the honors of an easy and almost bloodless victory. The tyrant escaped from the field.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 29, p. 186.

5135. SIGNALS, Ancient. Greek Empire. The language of signals, so clear and copious in the naval grammar of the moderns, was imperfectly expressed by the various positions and colors of a commanding flag. In the darkness of the night, the same orders to chase, to attack, to halt, to retreat, to break, to form, were conveyed by the lights of the leading galley. By land, the fire-signals were repeated from one mountain to another; a chain of eight stations commanded a space of five hundred miles; and Constantinople in a few hours was apprised of the hostile motions of the Saracens of Tarsus.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53, p. 366.

5136. SIGNATURE of Ignorance. "Rude Mark." In the eighth year of his age Theodoric was reluctantly yielded by his father to the public interest, as the pledge of an alliance which Leo, Emperor of the East, had consented to purchase by an annual subsidy of three hundred pounds of gold. The royal hostage was educated at Constantinople with care and tenderness. His body was formed to all the exercises of war, his mind was expanded by the habits of liberal conversation; he frequented the schools of the most skilful masters; but he disdained or neglected the arts of Greece, and so ignorant did he always remain of the first elements of science, that a rude mark was contrived to represent the signature of the illiterate King of Italy.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39, p. 2.

5137. SIGNATURE, Remarkable. Arabs. The Arabs relate that Amurath, at the moment of ratifying a convention which engaged the republic [of Ragusa] to pay a tribute of five hundred ducats in gold to the Sultan, in exchange for the liberty of navigation and commerce in the Turkish seas, dipped the interior of his hand in the ink, and applying it to the parchment, left there on the trace of his five fingers, as the lion imprints his five claws on the sand. By an accident, say they, of the disposition of the Sultan's hand in this gesture, the three middle fingers were joined and extended, the thumb and the little finger were separated fanwise. This signature, say they further, was imitated by the successors of the Sultan as a sign of power, of disdain, and of possession of the earth.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 245.

5138. SIGNATURE, Responsible. Judges of Charles I. To sign the death-warrant was a solemn deed, from which some of the judges were ready to shrink; Cromwell concealed the magnitude of the act under an air of buffoonery; the chamber rang with gaudy; he daubed the cheek of one of the judges that sat next him with ink, and, amid shouts of laughter, compelled another, the wavering Ingoldsby, to sign the paper as a jest.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 11.

5139. SIGNATURE, A responsible. Duke of Monmouth. [After the overthrow of his rebellion] Monmouth threw himself on the ground, and crawled to the king's feet [James II.]. He wept. He tried to embrace his uncle's knees with his pinioned arms. He begged for life, only life, life at any price. . . . A declaration, filled with atrocious calumnies, had been put forth. The regal title had been assumed. For treasons so aggravated there could be no pardon on this side of the grave. The poor terrified duke vowed that he had never wished to take the crown, but had been led into that fatal error by others. As to the Declaration, he had not written it. He had not read it. He had signed it without looking at it. It was all the work of Ferguson, that bloody villain Ferguson. "Do you expect me to believe," said James, with contempt but too well merited, "that you set your hand to a paper of such moment without knowing what it contained?"—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 575.

5140. SIGNATURE, Symbolic. Indian Tribes. [Peace was made by the tribes with the French and their allies.] A written treaty was made, to which each nation drew for itself a symbol. The Senecas and Onondagas drew a spider; the Cayugas a calumet; the Oneidas a forked stick; the Mohawks a bear; the Hurons a beaver; the Abenakis a deer, and the Ottawas a hare. . . . It was declared that peace should reach beyond the Mississippi.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

5141. SIGNS, Faith in. Gold-Seekers. [Gold-seekers went among the frozen regions of North America, following Frobisher's discoveries.] At one moment they expected death, and at the next they looked for gold. Spiders abounded, and "spiders were a sign of great store of gold." [The ships were laden with valueless earth.]—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 3.

5142. SIGNS, Need of. Reign of Charles II. The houses were not numbered. There would, indeed, have been little advantage in numbering them; for of the coachmen, chairmen, porters, and errand-boys of London, a very small proportion could read. It was necessary to use marks which the most ignorant could understand. The shops were therefore distinguished by painted signs, which gave a gay and grotesque aspect to the streets. The walk from Charing Cross to Whitechapel lay through an endless succession of Saracen's Heads, Royal Oaks, Blue Bears, and Golden Lambs, which disappeared when they were no longer required for the direction of the common people.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 335.

5143. SIGNS, Significant. "Of the Times." [After the marriage of Philip of Spain to Queen Mary of England indications of a change in the policy of the government were soon given.] After a few days of banqueting, Philip and Mary proceeded to Windsor, where the king was installed as a knight of the garter; "at which time," says Holinshed, "a herald took down the arms of England at Windsor, and in place of them would have set the arms of Spain, but he was commanded to set them up again by certain lords." This was one sign of the times.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 5, p. 75.

5144. SIGNS, Welcome. Columbus' First Voyage. On the 14th of September the voyagers were rejoiced by the sight of what they considered harbingers of land. A heron and a tropical bird, called the Rabo de Junco, neither of which is supposed to venture far to sea, hovered about the ships.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 3, ch. 2.

5145. SILENCE enjoined. Alexander. [Alexander the Great distributed his favors with a free hand. His mother wrote him:] "You do well in serving your friends, and it is right to act nobly; but by making them all equal to kings, in proportion as you put it in their power to make friends, you deprive yourself of that privilege." Olympias often wrote to him in that manner; but he kept all her letters secret, except one, which Hephæstion happened to cast his eye upon, when he went, according to custom, to read over the king's shoulder; he did not hinder him from reading on; only, when he had done, he took his signet from his finger and put it to his mouth.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

5146. SILENCE of Grief. Bonaparte. [After the battle of Leipzig, which decided the overthrow of Bonaparte's power in Europe, he was seen sitting at a window in Freiburg], his head resting on his arm in silent despair. Berthier sat opposite to him in a similar state. Neither spoke, and officers who entered were silently ordered, by a wave of the hand, to leave the room.—STEFFENS IN KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 31, p. 565.

5147. SILENCE in Misfortune. Pompey. After this fatal engagement [with Cæsar], Pompey experienced all the miseries of a fugitive. The last scenes of the life of this illustrious man afford a striking picture of the vicissitudes of fortune and the instability of all human greatness. He passed the first night, after his defeat, in the solitary hut of a fisherman upon the sea-coast. Thence he went on board a vessel, which landed him first at Amphipolis; whence he sailed to Lesbos, where his wife Cornelia was waiting, in anxious expectation, the issue of the late decisive conflict. They met upon the sea-shore. Pompey embraced her without uttering a word, and this silence spoke at once the whole extent of his misfortune. They fled for protection to Egypt.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 2, p. 408.

5148. SILENCE necessary. Plunder. [In 1645, when the Parliament army plundered the Basing House, one soldier got three bags of silver, which (he not being able to keep his own counsel) grew to be common pillage among the rest, and the fellow had but one half crown left to himself at last.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 4, p. 50.

5149. SILENCE, Public. Samuel Johnson. We talked of public speaking. JOHNSON: "We must not estimate a man's powers by his being able or not able to deliver his sentiments in public. Isaac Hawkins Browne, one of the first wits of this country, got into Parliament, and never opened his mouth. For my own part, I think it is more disgraceful never to try to speak than to try it and fail; as it is more disgraceful not to fight than to fight and be beaten."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 244.

5150. SILENCE, Reasonable. Reign of Henry VIII. As it was by terror that he [Thomas Cromwell] mastered the king, so it was by terror that he mastered the people. Men felt in England, to use the figure by which Erasmus paints the time, "as if a scorpion lay sleeping under every stone." The confessional had no secrets for Cromwell. Men's talk with their closest friends found its way to his ear. "Words idly spoken," the murmurs of a petulant abbot, the ravings of a moon-struck nun, were, as the nobles cried passionately at his fall, "tortured into treason." The only chance of safety lay in silence. "Friends who used to write and send me presents," Erasmus tells us, "now sent neither letters nor gifts, nor received any from any one, and this through fear." But even the refuge of silence was closed by a law more infamous than any that has ever blotted the statute-book of England. Not only was thought made treason, but men were forced to reveal their thoughts on pain of their very silence being punished with the penalties of treason.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 577.

5152. SIMONY, Papal. Pope Vigilius. [The pope Sylvester was tried on the charge of treason.] Accused by credible witnesses, and the evidence of his own subscription, the successor of St. Peter was despoiled of his pontifical ornaments, clad in the mean habit of a monk, and embarked, without delay, for a distant exile in the East. At the emperor's command, the clergy of Rome proceeded to the choice of a new bishop; and after a solemn invocation of the Holy Ghost, elected the deacon Vigilius, who had purchased the papal throne by a bribe of two hundred pounds of gold.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 169.

5153. SIMPLICITY difficult. Samuel Johnson. Goldsmith said that he thought he could write a good fable, mentioned the simplicity which that kind of composition requires, and observed, that in most fables the animals introduced seldom talk in character. "For instance," said he, "the fable of the little fishes, who saw birds fly over their heads, and envying them, petitioned Jupiter to be changed into birds. The skill," continued he, "consists in making them talk like little fishes." While he indulged himself in this fanciful reverie, he observed Johnson shaking his sides and laughing. Upon which he smartly proceeded, "Why, Dr. Johnson, this is not so easy as you seem to think; for if you were to make little fishes talk, they would talk like whales."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 210.

5154. SIMPLICITY preserved. Joan of Arc. [She had predicted the coronation of Charles VII. at Rheims.] With his coronation the maid felt her errand to be over. "O gentle king, the pleasure of God is done," she cried, as she flung herself at the feet of Charles and asked leave to go home. "Would it were his good will," she pleaded with the archbishop, as he forced her to remain, "that I might go and keep sheep once more with my sisters and my brothers; they would be so glad to see me again!" But the policy of the French court detained her.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 432.

5155. SIMPLICITY, Royal. Julian. [The ruler of Gaul.] The simple wants of nature regulated the measure of his food and sleep. Rejecting with disdain the delicacies provided for his table, he satisfied his appetite with the coarse and common fare which was allotted to the meanest soldiers. During the rigor of a Gallic winter, he never suffered a fire in his bed-chamber; and after a short and interrupted slumber, he frequently rose in the middle of the night from a carpet spread on the floor, to despatch any urgent business, to visit his rounds, or to steal a few moments for the prosecution of his favorite studies.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 19, p. 233.

5156. SIN, Indulgence in. For Money. With more boldness than ever, the new Pope Leo had sent, in 1516, agents through the world to sell indulgences, and the man chosen for Saxony, Tetzel the Dominican, and his band, were among the most zealous preachers of this iniquity. "I would not exchange," said he, in one of his harangues, "my privilege" (as vender of the papal letters of absolution) "against those which St. Peter has in heaven; for I have saved more souls by my indulgences than the apostle by his sermons. Whatever crime one may have committed"—naming an outrage upon the person of the Virgin Mary—"let him pay well, and he will receive pardon. Likewise the sins which you may be disposed to commit in future may be atoned for beforehand."—BUNSEN'S LUTHER, p. 9.

5157. SIN overlooked. Samuel Johnson. I stated to him an anxious thought, by which a sincere Christian might be disturbed, even when conscious of having lived a good life, so far as is consistent with human infirmity; he might fear that he should afterward fall away, and be guilty of such crimes as would render all his former religion vain. Could there be, upon this awful subject, such a thing as balancing of accounts? Suppose a man who has led a good life for seven years commits an act of wickedness, and instantly dies; will his former good life have any effect in his favor?" JOHNSON: "Sir, if a man has led a good life for seven years, and then is hurried by passion to do what is wrong, and is suddenly carried off, depend upon it he will have the reward of his seven years' good life: God will not take a catch of him. Upon this principle Richard Baxter believes that a suicide may be saved. 'If,' says he, 'it should be objected that what I maintain may encourage suicide, I answer, I am not to tell a lie to prevent it.'"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 499.

5158. SIN, Remedy for. American Indians. That man should take up the cross, that sin should be atoned for, are ideas that dwell in human nature; they were so diffused among the savages, that Leclercq believed some of the apostles must have reached the American continent.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

5159. SIN, Unpardonable. William Cowper. Cowper tells us that "to this moment he had felt no concern of a spiritual kind;" that "ignorant of original sin, insensible of the guilt of actual transgression, he understood neither the law nor the gospel—the condemning nature of the one, nor the restoring mercies of the other." But after attempting suicide he was seized, as he well might be, with religious horrors. Now it was that he began to ask himself whether he had been guilty of the unpardonable sin, and was presently persuaded that he had, though it would be vain to inquire what he imagined the unpardonable sin to be.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 1.

5160. SINCERITY, Attractions of. Reign of William and Anne. [All Catholic priests in parishes were prisoners at large, all others were banished by law.] The Catholic priest adjuring his religion, received a pension of thirty and afterward of forty pounds. And in spite of these laws, there were, it is said, four thousand Catholic clergymen in Ireland; and the Catholic worship gained upon the Protestant, so attractive is sincerity when ennobled by persecution.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 4.

5161. SINCERITY, Power in. Julius Caesar. He never misled his army as to an enemy's strength; or if he misstated their numbers, it was only to exaggerate. In Africa, before Thapsus, when his officers were nervous at the reported approach of Juba, he called them together, and said briefly: "You will understand that within a day King Juba will be here with the legions, 80,000 horse, 100,000 skirmishers, and 300 elephants. You are not to think or ask questions. I tell you the truth, and you must prepare for it. If any of you are alarmed, I shall send you home." [His army never lost a battle while he was with them in person.]—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 28.

5162. SINGULARITY, Motive for. Diogenes. As the character of this extraordinary person was differently judged of in his own time, some accounting him the wisest of men and others little better than a madman, it is no wonder that his estimation with the moderns should be equally various. It is not to be doubted that the love of singularity was a powerful motive of his conduct and opinions. He opposed the common-sense of mankind, and affected a contempt even of reputation, as he found that conduct a new mode of acquiring it.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 269.

5163. SINNERS, Crusade of. First Crusade. The French possessed more of the spirit of adventure than the Italians. The design was no sooner proposed in a council held at Clermont, in Auvergne, than they took up arms with the most enthusiastic emulation. The principal nobles immediately sold their lands to raise money for the expedition, and the Church bought them at an easy rate, and thus acquired immense territorial possessions; even the poorest barons set out upon their own charges, and the vassals attended the standard of their lords. Besides these, whom we may suppose to have been influenced by the piety of the design, an innumerable multitude, a motley assemblage of beggars, slaves, malefactors, strumpets, debauchees, and profligates of all kinds joined the throng, and hoped to find in those scenes of holy carnage and desolation means of making their fortune by plunder.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 9, p. 154. [NOTE.]—Many even of these miscreants had their own motives of piety. Mr. Gibbon's observation has both truth and wit in it. "At the voice of their pastor, the robber, the incendiary, the homicide, arose by thousands to redeem their souls, by repeating on the infidels the same deeds which they had exercised against their Christian brethren."—GIBBON, ch. 68.

5164. SINS, Deliverance from. By Indulgences. This warning against the preachers of indulgences was justified by good reasons. For in the neighborhood of Wittenberg, at the town of Jüterbock, Tetzel, a Dominican monk, carried on his traffic. There were lively times at that place, as at an annual fair and market. The people danced and caroused, rejoicing that they were rid of their sins. And large multitudes flocked from Wittenberg to patronize Tetzel.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 1, p. 9.

5165. SINS of Others. John Bunyan. Of himself he says: "Though I could sin with delight and ease, and take pleasure in the villainies of my companions, even then, if I saw wicked things done by them that professed goodness, it would make my spirit tremble. Once, when I was in the height of my vanity, hearing one swear that was reckoned a religious man, it made my heart to ache."—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 1.

5166. SINS, Tormenting. John Bunyan. "My sins," he says, "did so offend the Lord that even in my childhood He did scare and affright me with fearful dreams, and did terrify me with dreadful visions. I have been in my bed greatly afflicted, while asleep, with apprehensions of devils and wicked spirits, who still, as I then thought, labored to draw me away with them, of which I could never be rid. I was afflicted with thoughts of the Day of Judgment night and day, trembling at the thoughts of the fearful torments of hell fire." When, at ten years old, he was running about with his companions in "his sports and childish vanities," these terrors continually recurred to him, yet "he would not let go his sins."—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 1.

5167. SISTER, A comforting. To Frederick the Great. Amid disastrous defeat in battle and increasing and determined foes, his mother, "whom he loved most tenderly," died. A few friends remained faithful to him, cheering him by their correspondence. "Oh, that Heaven had heaped all ills on me alone!" said his affectionate sister; "I would have borne them with firmness."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 12.

5168. SKILL misapplied. Perpetual Motion. Richard Arkwright . . . had so little knowledge of mechanical principles, that he took it into his head to invent a perpetual motion. So infatuated was he, that he spent most of his time, and soon all his money, in making experiments. Peace fled from his house, and plenty from his board. His wife very naturally resented this infringement of her rights, and, on one unhappy day, overcome with sudden anger, she broke to pieces his wheels and levers, and all the apparatus of his perpetual motion. Violence never answers a good purpose between people who live together in a relation so intimate—neither violence of word nor deed. Richard Arkwright could not forgive this cruel stroke; he separated himself from his wife, and never lived with her again.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 708.

5169. SKILL, Proof of. Maier Rothschild. The Landgrave's friend, General Estorff, had noticed the accuracy and good sense of Maier Rothschild many years before, when the banker was a banker's clerk in Hanover. He recommended him for the post, and he was summoned to the Landgrave's residence. When he arrived, it chanced that the mighty monarch was getting badly beaten in a game of chess, by General Estorff. "Do you understand chess?" asked the Landgrave. "Yes, your Highness," said the banker. "Then step up here and look at my game." Rothschild obeyed, and suggested the moves by which the game was easily won. It was enough. From that time to the end of his life he managed the finances of the Landgrave of Hesse.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 567.

5170. SLANDER, Defence from. Napoleon I. When I have been asked to cause answers to be written to them [see No. 24] I have uniformly replied, "My victories and my works of public improvement are the only response which it becomes me to make."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 9.

5171. SLANDER from Envy. John Bunyan. Envy at his rapidly-acquired reputation brought him baser enemies. He was called a witch, a Jesuit, a highwayman. It was reported that he had "his misses," that he had two wives, etc. "My foes have missed their mark in this," he said, with honest warmth; "I am not the man. If all the fornicators and adulterers in England were hanged by the neck, John Bunyan, the object of their envy, would be still alive and well."—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 5.

5172. SLANDER, Fine for. $500,000. The late sheriff [of London], Pinkington, having said, upon the duke's [of York, afterward James II.] return, "he had fired the city and was now come to cut their throats," he caused him to be indicted, and the court assigned his Royal Highness £100,000 for damages.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 23, p. 370.

5173. SLANDER, Opposition by. John Wesley. When the country was in general commotion, occasioned by threatened invasions from France and Spain, and by the movements of the Scotch Pretender, . . . all sorts of calumnies against Wesley flew over the land. He had been seen with the Pretender in France; had been taken up for high treason, and was at last safe in prison awaiting his doom. He was a Jesuit, and kept Roman priests in his house at London. He was an agent of Spain, whence he received large remittances, in order to raise a body of twenty thousand men to aid the expected Spanish invasion. He was an Anabaptist; a Quaker; had been prosecuted for unlawfully selling gin; had hanged himself; and, at any rate, was not the genuine John Wesley, for it was well known that the latter was dead and buried.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 199.

5174. SLANDER of Piety. Constantine. [After he became a Christian.] The historian Zosimus maliciously asserts that the emperor had imbrued his hands in the blood of his eldest son before he publicly renounced the gods of Rome and of his ancestors.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20, p. 249.

5175. ———. Richard Baxter's. [Reign of James II.] In a Commentary on the New Testament, he had complained, with some bitterness, of the persecution which the Dissenters suffered. That men who, for not using the Prayer Book, had been driven from their homes, stripped of their property, and locked up in dungeons, should dare to utter a murmur, was then thought a high crime against the State and the Church. . . . An information was filed. Baxter begged that he might be allowed some time to prepare for his defence. It was on the day on which Oates was pilloried in Palace Yard that the illustrious chief of the Puritans, oppressed by age and infirmities, came to Westminster Hall to make this request. Jeffreys burst into a storm of rage. "Not a minute," he cried, "to save his life. I can deal with saints as well as with sinners. There stands Oates on one side of the pillory; and if Baxter stood on the other, the two greatest rogues in the kingdom would stand together."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 456.

5176. SLANDER punished. By James I. On the 3d of August, 1596, John Dickson, an Englishman, was indicted for uttering calumnious and slanderous speeches against the king. The amount of his offence was that, being drunk, he had allowed a boat he was managing to come in the way of one of the king's ordnance vessels, when, being called upon by Archibald Gairdenar, one of his Majesty's cannoners, to give place to his Majesty's ordnance, "he fyrst ansserit, that he would nocht vyre his boit for king or kasard; and thairefter, maist prouddie, arrogantlie, shlanderouslie, and calumniouslie callit his Majestie ane bastard king: and that he was nocht worthie to be obeyit." The jury found him guilty, but qualified their verdict by admitting his drunkenness; but their qualification did not avail; the poor fellow was hanged.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 35.

5177. SLANDER rewarded. Dick Talbot. [He had declared Anne Hyde's adultery with himself before her marriage to the king.] Had her husband [James II.] been a man really upright and honorable, he would have driven from his presence with indignation and contempt the wretches that slandered her. But one of the peculiarities of James' character was that no act, however wicked and shameful, which had been prompted by a desire to gain his favor, ever seemed to him deserving of disapprobation. Talbot continued to frequent the court, appearing daily with brazen front before the princess whose ruin he had plotted, and was installed into the lucrative post of chief panderer to her husband.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 45.

5178. SLANDER, Victim of. Columbus. [Put in chains. See No. 1648.] From the early and never-to-be-forgotten outrage upon Castilian pride, of compelling hidalgos, in time of emergency, to labor in the construction of works necessary to the public safety, down to the recent charge of levying war against the government, there was not a hardship, abuse, nor sedition in the island that was not imputed to the misdeeds of Columbus and his brothers. Besides the usual accusations of inflicting oppressive labor, unnecessary tasks, painful restrictions, short allowances of food, and cruel punishments upon the Spaniards, and waging unjust wars against the natives, they were now charged with preventing the conversion of the latter, that they might send them slaves to Spain, and profit by their sale. This last charge, so contrary to the pious feelings of the admiral, was founded on his having objected to the baptism of certain Indians of mature age, until they could be instructed in the doctrines of Christianity; justly considering it an abuse of that holy sacrament to administer it thus blindly. Columbus was charged, also, with having secreted pearls and other precious articles collected in his voyage along the coast.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 13, ch. 7.

5179. SLANDERS, Vile. Primitive Church. There were many who pretended to confess or to relate the ceremonies of this abhorred society. It was asserted, "that a new-born infant, entirely covered over with flour, was presented, like some mystic symbol of initiation, to the knife of the proselyte, who unknowingly inflicted many a secret and mortal wound on the innocent victim of his error; that as soon as the cruel deed was perpetrated, the sectaries drank up the blood, greedily tore asunder the quivering members, and pledged themselves to eternal secrecy, by a mutual consciousness of guilt. It was as confidently affirmed that this inhuman sacrifice was succeeded by a suitable entertainment, in which intemperance served as a provocative to brutal lust; till, at the appointed moment, the lights were suddenly extinguished, shame was banished, nature was forgotten; and, as accident might direct, the darkness of the night was polluted by the incestuous commerce of sisters and brothers, of sons and of mothers."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16, p. 11.

5180. SLAUGHTER, Barbarous. 58,000. The Numidians had seized some territories belonging to Carthage, and a war ensued, in which the Carthaginians were much weakened. The son of Massinissa, a barbarian in every sense, slaughtered in cold blood 58,000 of the Carthaginians after they had laid down their arms.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9, p. 384.

5181. SLAUGHTER, Exterminating. Of Germans. The poor Germans stood bravely defending themselves as they could; but the sight of their women flying in shrieking crowds, pursued by the Roman horse, was too much for them, and the whole host were soon rushing in despairing wreck down the narrowing isthmus between the Meuse and the Rhine. They came to the junction at last, and then they could go no farther. Multitudes were slaughtered; multitudes threw themselves into the water and were drowned. Cæsar, who was not given to exaggeration, says that their original number was 430,000. The only survivors of whom any clear record remains were the detachments who were absent from the battle, and the few chiefs who had come into Cæsar's camp and continued with him at their own request from fear of being murdered by the Gauls. This affair was much spoken of at the time, as well it might be. Questions were raised upon it in the Senate. Cato insisted that Cæsar had massacred a defenceless people in a time of truce, that he had broken the law of nations, and that he ought to be given up to the Germans. The sweeping off the earth in such a manner of a quarter of a million human creatures, even in those unscrupulous times, could not be heard of without a shudder.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 16.

5182. SLAVERY, Antiquity of. Older than the Records. Slavery and the slave-trade are older than the records of human society; they are found to have existed wherever the savage hunter began to assume the habits of pastoral or agricultural life; and, with the exception of Australasia, they have extended to every portion of the globe. They pervaded every nation of civilized antiquity. . . . The founder of the Jewish nation was a slaveholder and a purchaser of slaves.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 5.

5183. SLAVERY, Abuses of. Reign of James II. [The rebels captured with the Duke of Monmouth were consigned to ten years of slavery in the Indies.] The human cargoes were stowed close in the holds of small vessels. So little space was allowed that the wretches, many of whom were still tormented by unhealed wounds, could not all lie down at once without lying on one another. They were never suffered to go on deck. The hatchway was constantly watched by sentinels armed with hangers and blunderbusses. In the dungeon below all was darkness, stench, lamentation, disease, and death. Of ninety-nine convicts who were carried out in one vessel, twenty-two died before they reached Jamaica, although the voyage was performed with unusual speed. The survivors, when they arrived at their house of bondage, were mere skeletons. During some weeks coarse biscuit and fetid water had been doled out to them in such scanty measure that any one of them could easily have consumed the ration which was assigned to five. They were, therefore, in such a state, that the merchant to whom they had been consigned found it expedient to fatten them before selling them.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 603.

5184. SLAVERY, Beginnings of. Georgia. Agriculture had not flourished. Commerce had not sprung up. The laws of property had been so arranged that estates could descend only to the oldest sons of families. The colonists were poor, and charged their poverty to the fact that slave-labor was forbidden in the province. This became the chief question which agitated the people. The proprietary laws grew more and more unpopular. The statute excluding slavery was not rigidly enforced, and, indeed, could not be enforced when the people had determined to evade it. Whitefield himself pleaded for the abrogation of the law. Slaves began to be hired first for short terms of service, then for longer periods, then for a hundred years, which was equivalent to an actual purchase for life. Finally, cargoes of slaves were brought directly from Africa, and the primitive free-labor system of Georgia was revolutionized.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 29, p. 244.

5185. SLAVERY of Captives. Romans. The captive Barbarians, exchanging death for slavery, were distributed among the provincials, and assigned to those districts (in Gaul, the territories of Amiens, Beauvais, Cambrai, Treves, Langres, and Troyes are particularly specified) which had been depopulated by the calamities of war. They were usefully employed as shepherds and husbandmen, but were denied the exercise of arms, except when it was found expedient to enroll them in the military service. Nor did the emperors refuse the property of lands, with a less servile tenure, to such of the Barbarians as solicited the protection of Rome. They granted a settlement to several colonies of the Carpi, the Bastarnæ, and the Sarmatians; and, by a dangerous indulgence, permitted them in some measure to retain their national manners and independence.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13, p. 415.

5186. SLAVERY in England. A.D. 1215. A large portion of the people were in the condition of villanage. Some were in a state of slavery. The men went with the land as chattels.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 24, p. 350.

5187. SLAVERY introduced. Virginia. The year 1619 was marked by the introduction of negro slavery into Virginia. The servants of the people of Jamestown had hitherto been persons of English or German descent, and their term of service had varied from a few months to many years. No perpetual servitude had thus far been recognized, nor is it likely that the English colonists would of themselves have instituted the system of slave labor. In the month of August a Dutch man-of-war sailed up the river to the plantations, and offered by auction twenty Africans. They were purchased by the wealthier class of planters, and made slaves for life. It was, however, nearly a half century from this time before the system of negro slavery became well established in the English colonies.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 11, p. 111.

5188. SLAVERY mitigated. Athenian. All Athenian slaves were allowed to purchase their freedom at a price stipulated by the magistrate. If any slave found his treatment intolerably severe, and was unable to purchase his freedom, he might oblige his master to sell him to another who would use him better. The emancipation of a slave, however, did not exempt him from all the duties to his master.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 10, p. 103.

5189. ———. Romans. [During the times of Caius Marcius Coriolanus, the Romans] treated their slaves with great moderation, and this was natural, because they worked and even ate with them. It was deemed a great punishment for a slave who had committed a fault to take up that piece of wood with which they supported the thill of a wagon, and carry it round the neighborhood.—PLUTARCH'S CAIUS MARCIUS.

5190. SLAVERY, Natural. Turks. The constitution of the Turkish government is such a fabric of slavery, that it is almost impossible that any subject of the empire should inherit a free or an ingenuous spirit. The grand signior himself is born of a slave of the seraglio. The viziers are often slaves by birth, and through the whole empire it is hard to find any that derive their origin from ingenuous parents. It is therefore no wonder that the Turks should inherit a disposition fitted for the rule of an absolute master. [Says Grotius after Aristotle:] "Thus some nations are slaves by nature, born to be governed, not to govern."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 13, p. 212.

5191. SLAVERY opposed. By Friends. To the Society of Friends in England belongs the honor of the first united efforts to prevent the continuance of the slave trade, against which they petitioned Parliament in 1783.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 26, p. 466.

5192. SLAVERY, Prevalence of. In Rome. It was more for the interest of the merchant or manufacturer to purchase than to hire his workmen; and in the country slaves were employed as the cheapest and most laborious instruments of agriculture. To confirm the general observation, and to display the multitude of slaves, we might allege a variety of particular instances. It was discovered, on a very melancholy occasion, that four hundred slaves were maintained in a single palace of Rome. The same number of four hundred belonged to an estate which an African widow, of a very private condition, resigned to her son, while she reserved for herself a much larger share of her property. A freedman, under the reign of Augustus, though his fortune had suffered great losses in the civil wars, left behind him three thousand six hundred yoke of oxen, two hundred and fifty thousand head of smaller cattle, and what was almost included in the description of cattle, four thousand one hundred and sixteen slaves.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 52.

5193. SLAVERY of Prisoners. Reign of James II. The number of prisoners [who had been rebels under the Duke of Monmouth] whom Jeffreys transported was eight hundred and forty-one. These men, more wretched than their associates who suffered death, were distributed into gangs, and bestowed on persons who enjoyed favor at court. The conditions of the gift were that the convicts should be carried beyond sea as slaves, that they should not be emancipated for ten years, and that the place of their banishment should be some West Indian island. This last article was studiously framed for the purpose of aggravating the misery of the exiles.

In New England or New Jersey they would have found a population kindly disposed to them, and a climate not unfavorable to their health and vigor. It was therefore determined that they should be sent to colonies where a Puritan could hope to inspire little sympathy. . . . It was estimated by Jeffreys that, on an average, each of them, after all charges were paid, would be worth from ten to fifteen pounds. There was, therefore, much angry competition for grants. . . . More than one fifth of those who were shipped were flung to the sharks before the end of the voyage.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 602.

5194. SLAVERY, Punished by. England. It was a class which sprang mainly from debt or crime. Famine drove men to "bend their heads in the evil days for meat;" the debtor, unable to discharge his debt, flung on the ground his freeman's sword and spear, took up the laborer's mattock, and placed his head as a slave within a master's hands. The criminal whose kinsfolk would not make up his fine became a crime-serf of the plaintiff or the king. Sometimes a father pressed by need sold children or wife in bondage. In any case, the slave became part of the live-stock of his master's estate, to be willed away at death with horse or ox, whose pedigree was kept as carefully as his own. His children were bondsmen like himself; even a freeman's children by a slave mother inherited the mother's taint. "Mine is the calf that is born of my cow," ran an English proverb. Slave cabins clustered round the homestead of every rich landowner; ploughman, shepherd, goatherd, swineherd, oxherd, and cowherd, dairymaid, barnman, sower, hayward, and woodward, were often slaves. It was not, indeed, slavery such as we have known in modern times, for stripes and bonds were rare; if the slave was slain it was by an angry blow, not by the lash. But his master could slay him if he would; it was but a chattel the less. The slave had no place in the justice court, no kinsmen to claim vengeance or guilt-fine for his wrong. If a stranger slew him his lord claimed the damages; if guilty of wrong-doing, "his skin paid for him," under his master's lash. If he fled he might be chased like a strayed beast, and when caught he might be flogged to death. If the wrong-doer were a woman-slave she might be burned.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 15.

5196. SLAVERY, Unchristian. British. How great a part the Catholic ecclesiastics subsequently had in the abolition of villanage we learn from the unexceptionable testimony of Sir Thomas Smith, one of the ablest Protestant councillors of Elizabeth. When the dying slaveholder asked for the last sacraments, his spiritual attendants regularly adjured him, as he loved his soul, to emancipate his brethren for whom Christ had died. So successfully had the Church used her formidable machinery, that, before the Reformation came, she had enfranchised almost all the bondmen in the kingdom except her own, who, to do her justice, seem to have been very tenderly treated.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 23.

5197. SLAVES, Angelic. English. But once masters of the Britons, the Bernician Englishmen turned to conquer their English neighbors to the south, the men of Deira, whose first king, Ælla, was now sinking to the grave. The struggle filled the foreign markets with English slaves, and one of the most memorable stories in our history shows us a group of such captives as they stood in the market-place of Rome, it may be in the great Forum of Trajan, which still in its decay recalled the glories of the Imperial City. Their white bodies, their fair faces, their golden hair, was noted by a deacon who passed by. "From what country do these slaves come?" Gregory asked the trader who brought them. The slave-dealer answered, "They are English," or, as the word ran in the Latin form, it would bear at Rome, "they are Angles." The deacon's pity veiled itself in poetic humor. "Not Angles, but angels," he said, "with faces so angel-like! From what country come they?" "They come," said the merchant, "from Deira." "De ira!" was the untranslatable word-play of the vivacious Roman; "ay, plucked from God's ire and called to Christ's mercy! And what is the name of their king?" They told him, "Ælla," and Gregory seized on the word as of good omen. "Alleluia shall be sung in Ælla's land," he said, and passed on, musing how the angel-faces should be brought to sing it.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 40.

5198. SLAVES of Disbelievers. Virginia. A. D. 1670. Statute: . . . "All servants, not being Christians, imported into this country by shipping, shall be slaves." Yet it was added, "conversion to the Christian faith doth not make free!"—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 14.

5199. SLAVES, Docility of. Civil War. [President Lincoln's emancipation proclamation] had shown that slavery was an element of strength with us; that it had assisted us in our struggle; that no servile insurrections had taken place in the South, in spite of all the allurements of our enemy; that the slave had tilled the soil while his master had fought; that in the large districts unprotected by our troops, and with a white population consisting almost exclusively of women and children, the slave had continued at his work, quiet, cheerful, and faithful, . . . though prompted to the work of assassination and pillage by the most brutal examples of the Yankee soldiery.—POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 6, p. 182.

5200. SLAVES, Rebellion of. Roman. They found a leader in a young Thracian robber chief, named Spartacus, who was destined for the amphitheatre, and who preferred meeting his masters in the field to killing his friends to make a Roman holiday. Spartacus, with two hundred of his companions, burst out from the Capuan "stables," seized their arms, and made their way into the crater of Vesuvius, which was then, after the long sleep of the volcano, a dense jungle of wild vines. The slaves of the adjoining plantations deserted and joined them. The firespread, Spartacus proclaimed universal emancipation, and in a few weeks was at the head of an army with which he overran Italy to the foot of the Alps, defeated consuls and prætors, captured the eagles of the legions, wasted the farms of the noble lords, and for two years held his ground against all that Rome could do.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 9.

5201. SLAVES, White. In Virginia. The supply of white servants became a regular business, and a class of men, nicknamed spirits, used to delude young persons, servants, and idlers into embarking for America, as to a land of spontaneous plenty. White servants came to be a usual article of traffic. They were sold in England to be transported, and in Virginia were resold to the highest bidder; like negroes, they were to be purchased on shipboard, as men buy horses at a fair.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 5.

5202. SLAVE-TRADE opposed. Continental Congress, A.D. 1774. We will neither support nor purchase any slave imported after the 1st day of December next; after which time we will wholly discontinue the slave-trade, and will neither be concerned in it ourselves, nor will we hire our vessels nor sell our commodities or manufactures to those who are concerned in it.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 13.

5203. SLAVE-TRADE respected. New York. A.D. 1661. We have seen Elizabeth of England a partner in the commerce of which the Stuarts, to the days of Queen Anne, were distinguished patrons; the city of Amsterdam did not blush to own shares in the slave-ship, to advance money for the outfits, and to participate in the returns. In proportion to population, New York had as many Africans as Virginia. . . . They were imported . . . often directly from Guinea, and were sold at public auction to the highest bidder. The average price was less than $140.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

5204. SLEEP, Benefit of. Disposition. It was a rule with Cato to have his slaves either employed in the house or asleep, and he liked those best that slept the most kindly, believing that they were better tempered than others that had not so much of that refreshment, and fitter for any kind of business.—PLUTARCH'S CATO THE CENSOR.

5205. SLEEP at Command. Napoleon I. "Different affairs are arranged in my head," said he, "as in drawers. When I wish to interrupt one train of thought, I close the drawer which contains that subject, and open that which contains another. They do not mix together or inconvenience me. I have never been kept awake by an involuntary preoccupation of mind. If I wish for repose, I shut up all the drawers, and I am asleep. I have always slept when I wanted rest, and almost at will."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 5.

5206. SLEEP, Deficient. Josiah Quincy. This excellent man carried one of his virtues to excess—early rising. He rose so early in the morning that he scarcely had sleep enough; so that, when he sat down during the day for ten minutes, he was very likely to fall asleep. John Quincy Adams was also addicted to excessive early rising. One day these two distinguished men went into Judge Story's lecture-room to hear him read his lecture to his class in the law school. The judge received the two presidents with his usual politeness, and placed them on the platform by his side, in full view of the class, and then went on with his lecture. In a very few minutes both the presidents were fast asleep. The judge paused a moment, and pointing to the two sleeping gentlemen, uttered these words: "Gentlemen, you see before you a melancholy example of the evil effects of early rising." This remark was followed by a shout of laughter, which effectually roused the sleepers, after which the judge resumed his discourse.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 758.

5207. SLEEP, Exceptional. Sir Walter Scott. Basil Hall reports Scott's having told him . . . that "having once arrived at a country inn, he was told there was no bed for him. 'No place to lie down at all?' said he. 'No,' said the people of the house; 'none, except a room in which there is a corpse lying.' 'Well,' said he, 'did the person die of any contagious disorder?' 'Oh, no; not at all,' said they. 'Well, then,' continued he, 'let me have the other bed. So,' said Sir Walter, 'I laid me down, and never had a better night's sleep in my life.'" He was, indeed, a man of iron nerve.—HUTTON'S LIFE OF SCOTT, ch. 4.

5208. SLEEP, Perilous. Columbus' First Voyage. [Coasting near St. Thomas.] Columbus, who had hitherto kept watch, finding the sea calm and smooth, and the ship almost motionless, retired to rest, not having slept the preceding night. He was, in general, extremely wakeful on his coasting voyages, passing whole nights upon deck in all weathers; never trusting to the watchfulness of others where there was any difficulty or danger to be provided against. In the present instance he felt perfectly secure. . . . No sooner had he retired than the steersman gave the helm in charge to one of the ship-boys, and went to sleep. This was in direct violation of an invariable order of the admiral, that the helm should never be intrusted to the boys. The rest of the mariners who had the watch took like advantage of the absence of Columbus, and in a little while the whole crew was buried in sleep. In the mean time the treacherous currents which run swiftly along this coast carried the vessel quietly, but with force, upon a sand-bank. The heedless boy had not noticed the breakers, although they made a roaring that might have been heard a league. [The vessel was wrecked.]—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 4, ch. 8.

5209. SLEEP, Surprising. Duke of Argyle. [On the day appointed for his decapitation at Edinburgh, for rebellion.] one of the lords of the council, who had probably been bred a Presbyterian, and had been seduced by interest to join in oppressing the church of which he had once been a member, came to the castle with a message from his brethren, and demanded admittance to the earl. It was answered that the earl was asleep. The privy councillor thought that this was a subterfuge, and insisted on entering. The door of the cell was softly opened; and there lay Argyle on the bed, sleeping, in his irons, the placid sleep of infancy. The conscience of the renegade smote him. He turned away, sick at heart, ran out of the castle, and took refuge in the dwelling of a lady of his family who lived hard by. There he flung himself on a couch, and gave himself up to an agony of remorse and shame. His kinswoman, alarmed by his looks and groans, thought that he had been taken sick with sudden illness, and begged him to drink a cup of sack. "No, no," he said, "that will do me no good." She prayed him to tell her what had disturbed him. "I have been," he said, "in Argyle's prison. I have seen him within an hour of eternity, sleeping as sweetly as ever man did. But as for me—"—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 523.

5210. SLEEP, Transient. Napoleon I. After spending several days and nights in preparation for a decisive conflict, he has been known repeatedly to fall asleep in the midst of the uproar and horror of the field of battle, and when the balls of the enemy were sweeping the eminence upon which he stood. "Nature has her rights," said he, "and will not be defrauded with impunity. I feel more cool to receive the reports which are brought to me when awaking in this manner from transient slumber."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLÉON B., vol. 1, ch. 5.

5211. SLEEP, Undisturbed. Washington. "How did you sleep, general?" asked [his guest] the Duke of Orleans [Louis Philippe] one morning of the master of the house. "I always sleep well," replied General Washington, "for I never wrote a word in my life which I had afterward cause to regret."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 508.

5212. SLEEPERS, The Seven. Legend. When the Emperor Decius persecuted the Christians, seven noble youths of Ephesus concealed themselves in a spacious cavern in the side of an adjacent mountain, where they were doomed to perish by the tyrant, who gave orders that the entrance should be firmly secured with a pile of huge stones. They immediately fell into a deep slumber, which was miraculously prolonged, without injuring the powers of life, during a period of one hundred and eighty-seven years. At the end of that time, the slaves of Adolius, to whom the inheritance of the mountain had descended, removed the stones to supply materials for some rustic edifice; the light of the sun darted into the cavern, and the Seven Sleepers were permitted to awake. After a slumber, as they thought, of a few hours, they were pressed by the calls of hunger, and resolved that Jamblichus, one of their number, should secretly return to the city to purchase bread for the use of his companions. The youth (if we may still employ that appellation) could no longer recognize the once familiar aspect of his native country; and his surprise was increased by the appearance of a large cross, triumphantly erected over the principal gate of Ephesus. His singular dress and obsolete language confounded the baker, to whom he offered an ancient medal of Decius as the current coin of the empire; and Jamblichus, on the suspicion of a secret treasure, was dragged before the judge. Their mutual inquiries produced the amazing discovery that two centuries were almost elapsed since Jamblichus and his friends had escaped from the rage of a pagan tyrant. The bishop of Ephesus, the clergy, the magistrates, the people, and, it is said, the Emperor Theodosius himself, hastened to visit the cavern of the Seven Sleepers, who bestowed their benediction, related their story, and at the same moment peaceably expired.—GIBBON, ch. 3, p. 383.

5213. SLEEPERS in the Temple. Ino. On the road between Octylus and Thalamia . . . is the temple of Ino. It is the custom of those who consult her to sleep in the temple, and what they want to know is revealed to them in a dream.—PAUSANIAS.

5214. SMILE resented. A. Timour the Tartar. In his camp before Delhi Timour massacred 100,000 Indian prisoners, who had smiled when the army of their countrymen appeared in sight. . . . The people of Ispahan supplied 70,000 human skulls for the structure of several lofty towers. . . . A similar tax was levied on the revolt of Bagdad, . . . and the exact account . . . is stated . . . at 90,000 heads.—NOTE IN GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 34, p. 398.

5215. SMOKER, A female. General Jackson's Wife. A more exemplary woman in all the relations of life—wife, friend, neighbor, relation, mistress of slaves—never lived, and never presented a more quiet, cheerful, and admirable management of her household. She had the general's own warm heart, frank manners, and admirable temper; and no two persons could have been better suited to each other, lived more happily together, or made a house more attractive to visitors. No bashful youth or plain old man, whose modesty sat them down at the lower end of the table, could escape her cordial attention, any more than the titled gentleman at her right and left. Young persons were her delight, and she always had her house filled with them, all calling her affectionately "Aunt Rachel." In the homely fashion of the time, she used to join her husband and guests in smoking a pipe after dinner and in the evening. There are now living many persons who well remember seeing her smoking by her fireside a long reed pipe.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 536.

5216. SMUGGLING fined. England. In the session of 1698 the Parliament proceeded against some dozen of opulent merchants with foreign names, by impeaching them for high crimes and misdemeanors, for fraudulently importing foreign alamodes and lustrings, and for illegally exporting native wool. One was fined £10,000; one, £3000; two, £1500 each; three, £1000 each; and one, £500. These sums were applied to the building of Greenwich Hospital.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 14, p. 212.

5217. SOCIALISM illustrated. Samuel Johnson. Sir, there is one Mrs. Macaulay in this town, a great republican. One day when I was at her house, I put on a very grave countenance, and said to her, "Madam, I am now become a convert to your way of thinking. I am convinced that all mankind are upon an equal footing; and to give you an unquestionable proof, madam, that I am in earnest, here is a very sensible, civil, well-behaved fellow-citizen, your footman; I desire that he may be allowed to sit down and dine with us." I thus, sir, showed her the absurdity of the levelling doctrine. She has never liked me since. Sir, your levellers wish to level down as far as themselves ; but they cannot bear levelling up to themselves. They would all have some people under them ; why not, then, have some people above them ?—BOSWELL'S JOHN-SON, p. 124.

5218. SOCIALISM, Political. Caius Gracchus. [The Roman tribune.] He brought forward, and carried through, with enthusiastic clapping of every pair of hands in Rome that were hardened with labor, a proposal that there should be public granaries in the city, maintained and filled at the cost of the State, and that corn should be sold at a rate artificially cheap to the poor free citizens. Such a law was purely socialistic. The privilege was confined to Rome, because in Rome the elections were held, and the Roman constituency was the one depository of power. The effect was to gather into the city a mob of needy, unemployed voters, living on the charity of the State, to crowd the circus, and to clamor at the elections, available no doubt immediately to strengthen the hands of the popular tribune, but certain in the long run to sell themselves to those who could bid highest for their voices.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 3.

5219. SOCIETY, Bond of. Egyptians. Perjury was also punished with death, because that crime attacks both the gods, whose majesty is trampled upon by invoking their name to a false oath ; and men, by breaking the strongest tie of human society—viz., sincerity and veracity.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 1, Part 2, ch. 1.

5220. SOCIETY degraded. Cowper's Times. Drunkenness reigned in palace and cottage alike. Gambling, cock-fighting, and bull-fighting were the amusements of the people. Political life, which, if it had been pure and vigorous, might have made up for the absence of spiritual influences, was corrupt from the top of the scale to the bottom ; its effect on national character is portrayed in Hogarth's "Election." That property had its duties as well as its rights, nobody had yet ventured to say or think. The duty of a gentleman toward his own class was to pay his debts of honor and to fight a duel whenever he was challenged by one of his own order ; toward the lower class his duty was none. Though the forms of government were elective—and Cowper gives us a description of the candidate at election-time obsequiously soliciting votes—society was intensely aristocratic, and each rank was divided from that below it by a sharp line which precluded brotherhood or sympathy.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 1.

5221. SOCIETY, Deliverers of. Reformers. [See No. 5220.] That the slave-trade was iniquitous hardly any one suspected ; even men who deemed themselves religious took part in it without scruple. But a change was at hand, and a still mightier change was in prospect. At the time of Cowper's death John Wesley was twenty-eight, and Whitefield was seventeen. With them the revival of religion was at hand. Johnson, the moral reformer, was twenty-two. Howard was born, and in less than a generation Wilberforce was to come.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 1.

5222. SOCIETY, An effective. Knights of St. John. But the firmest bulwark of Jerusalem was founded on the knights of the Hospital of St. John, and of the temple of Solomon ; on the strange association of a monastic and military life, which fanaticism might suggest, but which policy must approve. The flower of the nobility of Europe aspired to wear the cross and to profess the vows of these respectable orders ; their spirit and discipline were immortal ; and the speedy donation of twenty-eight thousand farms, or manors, enabled them to support a regular force of cavalry and infantry for the defence of Palestine.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58, p. 598.

5223. SOCIETY, Opposition to. Poet Shelley. "Laon and Cythna" was . . . representative of its author. All his previous experiences and all his aspirations—his passionate belief in friendship, his principle of the equality of women with men, his demand for bloodless revolution, his confidence in eloquence and reason to move nations, his doctrine of free love, his vegetarianism, his hatred of religious intolerance and tyranny—are blent together and concentrated in the glowing cantos of this wonderful romance. The hero, Laon, is himself idealized, the self which he imagined when he undertook his Irish campaign. The heroine, Cythna, is the helpmate he had always dreamed, the woman exquisitely feminine, yet capable of being fired with male enthusiasm. . . . In the first edition of the poem he made Laon and Cythna brother and sister, not because he believed in the desirability of incest, but because he wished to throw a glove down to society, and to attack the intolerance of custom in its stronghold.—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 5.

5224. SOCIETY, Orderly. Plymouth Colony. House-breaking and highway robbery were offences unknown in their courts, and too little apprehended to be made subjects of severe legislation.—BANCROFT'S U. S., ch. 8.

5225. SOCIETY, Reaction of. Rome. [Time of Nero.] At the summit of the whole decaying system—necessary, yet detested—elevated indefinitely above the very highest, yet living in dread of the very lowest, oppressing a population which he terrified, and terrified by the population he oppressed, was an emperor raised to the divinest pinnacle of autocracy, yet conscious that his life hung upon a thread ; an emperor who, in the terrible phrase of Gibbon, was at once a priest, an atheist, and a god.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 1, p. 4.

5226. SOCIETY, Reformation of. Impartiality. In 1698 . . . societies for the reformation of manners were for some time been in activity. Their business was to lay informations before the magistrates of swearers, drunkards, Sabbath-breakers, and other offenders, and to appropriate that portion of the fines which were earned by common informers to purposes of charity. The objection which ever was and ever will be against the most honest exertions of such societies is, that they are not impartial in their visitations. Defoe said : "Till the nobility, gentry, justices of the peace, and clergy will be pleased to reform their own manners, or find out some method and power impartially to punish themselves when guilty, we humbly crave leave to object to setting any poor man in the stocks, or sending him to the House of Correction for immoralities, as the most unjust and unequal way of proceeding in the world."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 13, p. 205.

5227. SOCIETY, Unbound. "War of the Roses." The individual sense of personal duty, the political consciousness of each citizen that national order and national welfare are essential to his own well-being, had not yet come. The bonds which had held the world together through so many ages loosened and broke, only to leave man face to face with his own selfishness. The motives that sway and ennoble the common conduct of men were powerless over the ruling classes. Pope and king, bishop and noble, vied with each other in greed, in self-seeking, in lust, in faithlessness, in a pitiless cruelty. It is this moral degradation that flings so dark a shade over the wars of the Roses. From no period in our annals do we turn with such weariness and disgust. Their savage battles, their ruthless executions, their shameless treasons, seem all the more terrible from the pure selfishness of the ends for which men fought, for the utter want of all nobleness and chivalry in the contest itself, of all great result in its close.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 466.

5228. SOLDIER, Christian. "Stonewall" Jackson. At the siege of Vera Cruz Jackson commanded a battery, . . . and was promoted first-lieutenant. For his conduct at Cerro Gordo he was brevetted captain. He was in all Scott's battles to the city of Mexico, and behaved so well that he was brevetted major for his services. To his merits as a commander he added the virtues of an active, humble, consistent Christian, restraining profanity in his camp, welcoming army colporteurs, distributing tracts, and anxious that every regiment, . . . should be supplied with chaplains. He was vulgarly sneered at as a fatalist; his habits of soliloquy were derided as superstitious conversations with a familiar spirit; . . . but . . . he believed he had a distinct mission of duty, in which he should be spared for the ends of Providence.—POLLARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 9, p. 221.

5229. SOLDIER, Cruelty and Courtesy of. Black Prince. [In 1370 the Black Prince met the French in Gascony. His last warlike act associates his name with the infamous system of cruelty that makes the individual bravery, endurance, and courtesy of the later feudal times look like hollow mockery—a miserable imposture of self-glorification, trampling upon the higher principle that unites strength with mercy. Three thousand men, women, and children were butchered in cold blood when Limoges was taken. A few knights, who resolved to battle to the last, placed their backs against a wall, and long fought against superior numbers. These Prince Edward ordered to be received to ransom. This was chivalry.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 31.]

5230. SOLDIER, Ignorant. Reign of James II. In June, 1686, Tyrconnel came. His commission authorized him only to command the troops; but he brought with him royal instructions touching all parts of the administration, and at once took the real government of the island into his own hands. On the day after his arrival, he explicitly said that commissions must be largely given to Roman Catholic officers, and that room must be made for them by dismissing more Protestants. He pushed on the remodelling of the army eagerly and indefatigably. It was, indeed, the only part of the functions of a commander-in-chief which he was competent to perform; for, though courageous in brawls and duels, he knew nothing of military duty. At the very first review which he held, it was evident to all who were near to him that he did not know how to draw up a regiment. To turn Englishmen out and to put Irishmen in was, in his view, the beginning and the end of the administration of war.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 132.

5231. SOLDIER, A natural. Cromwell. Bred to peaceful occupations, he had, at more than forty years of age, accepted a commission in the Parliamentary army. No sooner had he become a soldier, than he discerned, with the keen glance of genius, what Essex and men like Essex, with all their experience, were unable to perceive. He saw precisely where the strength of the Royalists lay, and by what means alone that strength could be overpowered. He saw that it was necessary to reconstruct the army of the Parliament. He saw, also, that there were abundant and excellent materials for the purpose—materials less showy, indeed, but more solid than those of which the gallant squadrons of the king were composed. It was necessary to look for recruits who were not mere mercenaries; for recruits of decent station and grave character, fearing God and zealous for public liberty. With such men he filled his own regiment, and while he subjected them to a discipline more rigid than had ever before been known in England, he administered to their intellectual and moral nature stimulants of fearful potency.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 109.

5232. SOLDIER, A remarkable. General Lee. General Lee is, almost without exception, the handsomest man of his age I ever saw. He is fifty-six years old, tall, broad-shouldered, very well made, well set up—a thorough soldier in appearance; and his manners are most courteous and full of dignity. He is a perfect gentleman in every respect. I imagine no one has so few enemies, or is so universally esteemed. Throughout the South all agree in pronouncing him as near perfection as a man can be. He has none of the small vices, such as smoking, drinking, chewing, or swearing, and his bitterest enemy never accused him of the greater ones. . . . General Lee is a religious man.—[English officer's diary, quoted in] POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, p. 342.

5233. SOLDIER, Spirited. Puritan. [At the battle of Dunbar.] It appears there were then only two houses and farmsteads. On this Monday there had been some slight skirmishing. Leslie's horse dashed across those little huts occupied by Lambert's or Pride's foot and horse, and seized three prisoners, one a musketeer, a spirited fellow, with a wooden arm. On being brought before Leslie, he was asked, "Do the enemy intend to fight?" The man replied, "What do you think we come here for? We come for nothing else." "Soldier," said Leslie, "how will you fight, when you have shipped half your men and all your great guns?" The answer was, "Sir, if you please to draw down your men, you shall find both men and great guns too." To one of the officers who asked him how he dared reply so saucily to the general, he said, "I only answer the question put to me." Leslie sent him across, free again, by a trumpet; and making his way to Cromwell, he reported what had passed, adding, "I for one have lost twenty shillings by the business, plundered from me in this skirmish." Thereupon the lord-general gave him two pieces, which are forty shillings, and sent him away rejoicing.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 11, p. 51.

5234. SOLDIER, A wonderful. Hannibal. On the first intelligence of the march of the Carthaginians Publius Scipio, the consul, had taken the field with a large army, and hoped by rapid marches to arrest him in the first part of his progress, and to make the country of the Transalpine Gauls the theatre of the war; but Hannibal had got the start of him, and had already passed the Rhone in the face of an opposing army. He took his way along the eastern banks of that river to Lyons, and thence to one of the chief passes of the Alps—not improbably that which is now known by the name of the Great St. Bernard. On proceeding to ascend the mountains, he found the country in some parts buried in snow, and at every defile defended by large troops of mountaineers. He overcame, by astonishing perseverance, every difficulty, and, at length, in the space of fifteen days, penetrated into that country which he had promised to his troops as the end and the reward of their labors. The time occupied in the whole of this march was five months and a half. His army, on leaving Carthage, amounted to 50,000 foot and 20,000 horse; but of these, on arriving in Italy, there remained only 20,000 foot and 6000 horse. This expedition is deservedly reckoned one of the most remarkable exploits of antiquity.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9, p. 373.

5235. SOLDIER, Choice. Riflemen. The men [from the frontiers], painted in the guise of savages, were strong and of great endurance, many of them more than six feet high; they wore leggings and moccasins and an ash-colored shirt with a double cape; each one carried a rifle, a hatchet, a small axe, and a hunter's knife. They could subsist on a little parched corn and game, killed as they went along; at night, wrapped in their blankets, they willingly made a tree their canopy, the earth their bed. The rifle in their hands sent its ball, with unerring precision, a distance of two or three hundred yards. Their motto was, "Liberty or Death." They were the first troops raised under the authority of the Continental Congress, and . . . the best corps in the camp. . . . They taught the observing Frederick to introduce into his service light bodies of sharpshooters, and their example has modified the tactics of European armies.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 8, ch. 44.

5236. SOLDIER, Colonial. English against French. On the banks of Lake George [in 1758] 9024 provincials . . . assembled. There were the 600 New England rangers, dressed like woodsmen, armed with a firelock and hatchet; under their right arm a powder-horn; a leather bag for bullets at their waist; and to each officer a pocket compass as a guide in the forests.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 13.

5237. SOLDIERS, Dauntless. Franks. "The Franks," says the Emperor Constantine, "are bold and valiant to the verge of temerity; and their dauntless spirit is supported by the contempt of danger and death. In the field and in close onset they press to the front and rush headlong against the enemy, without deigning to compute either his numbers or their own. Their ranks are formed by the firm connections of consanguinity and friendship; and their martial deeds are prompted by the desire of saving or revenging their dearest companions. In their eyes a retreat is a shameful flight; and flight is indelible infamy.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53, p. 373.

5238. SOLDIERS, Defensive. Greek Empire. Neither authority nor art could frame the most important machine, the soldier himself; and if the ceremonies of Constantine always suppose the safe and triumphal return of the emperor, his tactics seldom soar above the means of escaping a defeat, and procrastinating the war. Notwithstanding some transient success, the Greeks were sunk in their own esteem and that of their neighbors. A cold hand and a loquacious tongue was the vulgar description of the nation; the author of the tactics was besieged in his capital; and the last of the Barbarians, who trembled at the name of the Saracens, or Franks, could proudly exhibit the medals of gold and silver which they had extorted from the feeble sovereign of Constantinople.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 53, p. 369.

5239. SOLDIERS, Disobedient. James II. The heads of the corporation, though men selected for office on account of their known Toryism, protested against this illegal proceeding. The lord-mayor was ordered to appear before the Privy Council. "Take heed what you do," said the king. "Obey me; and do not trouble yourself either about gentlemen of the long robe or gentlemen of the short robe." . . . The chapel was opened. All the neighborhood was soon in commotion. Great crowds assembled in Cheapside to attack the new mass house. The priests were insulted. A crucifix was taken out of the building and set up on the parish pump. The lord-mayor came to quell the tumult, but was received with cries of "No wooden gods." The train-bands were ordered to disperse the crowd; but they shared in the popular feeling, and murmurs were heard from the ranks, "We cannot in conscience fight for popery."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 93.

5240. SOLDIERS fearful. Romans. Such was the horror for the profession of a soldier, which had affected the minds of the degenerate Romans, that many of the youth of Italy and the provinces chose to cut off the fingers of their right hand, to escape from being pressed into the service; and this strange expedient was so commonly practised, as to deserve the severe animadversion of the laws, and a peculiar name in the Latin language. They were called Murci, denoting a lazy and cowardly person.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17, p. 130.

5241. SOLDIERS, Graves of. Decorated. The first year of the war of Peloponnesus being now elapsed, the Athenians, during the winter, solemnized public funerals, according to ancient custom, . . . in honor of those who had lost their lives in that campaign, a ceremony which they constantly observed during the whole course of that war. For this purpose they set up, three days before, a tent, in which the bones of the deceased citizens were exposed, and every person strewed flowers, incense, perfumes, and other things of the same kind upon those remains. They afterward were put on carriages, in coffins made of cypress wood, every tribe having its particular coffin and carriage; but in one of the latter a large empty coffin was carried, in honor of those whose bodies had not been found. The procession marched with a grave, majestic, and religious pomp; a great number of the inhabitants, both citizens and foreigners, assisted at this mournful solemnity. [The most renowned orators spoke at their graves.]—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 7, ch. 3.

5242. SOLDIERS, Invulnerable. Asiatics. [In 1823 the British army in Bengal felt the necessity of fortifying against the probable attack of the enemy.] An enormous pagoda, more than three hundred feet high, became a citadel, garrisoned by a battalion of British troops. . . . On the night when the astrologers had decided that an attack upon this sacred place would free the country from the impious strangers, a body of troops, called Invulnerables, advanced to the northern gateway. A terrible cannonade was opened upon these dense masses, and they fled at once to the neighboring jungle.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 12, p. 219.

5243. SOLDIERS maimed. Supported. [Solon established a law] that "persons maimed in the wars should be maintained at the public charge."—PLUTARCH.

5244. SOLDIERS marked. Hand—Face. The armies both of Sparta and Athens were composed of four sorts of troops: citizens, allies, mercenaries, and slaves. The soldiers were sometimes marked in the hand, to distinguish them from the slaves, who had that character impressed upon their forehead. Interpreters believe that it is in allusion to this double manner of marking that it is said in the Revelation that all were obliged "to receive the mark of the beast in the right hand, or in their foreheads;" and that St. Paul says of himself: "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 10, ch. 2, § 3.

5245. SOLDIERS misnamed. Reign of James II. When his [General Kirke's] soldiers displeased him, he flogged them with merciless severity; but he indemnified them by permitting them to sleep on watch, to reel drunk about the streets, to rob, beat, and insult the merchants and the laborers. When Tangier was abandoned, Kirke returned to England. He still continued to command his old soldiers, who were designated sometimes as the First Tangier Regiment and sometimes as Queen Catharine's Regiment. As they had been levied for the purpose of waging war on an infidel nation, they bore on their flag a Christian emblem, the Paschal Lamb. In allusion to this device, and with a bitterly ironical meaning, these men, the rudest and most ferocious in the English army, were called Kirke's lambs.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 586.

5246. SOLDIERS, Model. Cromwell's. These persons, sober, moral, diligent, and accustomed to reflect, had been induced to take up arms, not by the pressure of want, not by the love of novelty and license, not by the arts of recruiting officers, but by religious and political zeal, mingled with the desire of distinction and promotion. The boast of the soldiers, as we find it recorded in their solemn resolutions, was, that they had not been forced into the service, nor had enlisted chiefly for the sake of lucre; that they were no janizaries, but freeborn Englishmen, who had, of their own accord, put their lives in jeopardy, for the liberties and religion of England, and whose right and duty it was to watch over the welfare of the nation which they had saved.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 113.

5247. SOLDIERS, Nation of. Gauls. The chief was either hereditary or elected, or won his command by the sword. The mass of the people were serfs. The best fighters were self-made nobles, under the chief's authority. Every man in the tribe was the chief's absolute subject; the chief, in turn, was bound to protect the meanest of them against injury from without. War, on a large scale or a small, had been the occupation of their lives. The son was not admitted into his father's presence till he was old enough to be a soldier. When the call to arms went out, every man of the required age was expected at the muster, and the last comer was tortured to death in the presence of his comrades as a lesson against backwardness.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 14.

5248. SOLDIERS, Notorious. Wilson's Zouaves. [Colonel] Billy Wilson . . . boasted that when his regiment was moved off [from New York], it would be found that not a thief, highwayman, or pickpocket would be left in the city.—POLLARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 3, p. 72.

5249. SOLDIERS, Odd. Cromwell's. The Puritan soldiers of Cromwell are armed with all kinds of weapons, clothed in all colors, and sometimes in rags. Pikes, halberds, and long straight swords are ranged side by side with pistols and muskets. Often he causes his troops to halt that he may preach to them, and frequently they sing psalms while performing their exercise. The captains are heard to cry, "Present, fire! in the name of the Lord!" After calling over the muster-roll, the officers read a portion of the New or Old Testament. Their colors are covered with symbolical paintings and verses from the Scriptures. They march to the Psalms of David, while the Royalists advance singing loose bacchanalian songs. The license of the nobility and cavaliers composing the king's regular troops could not prevail, notwithstanding their bravery, against these martyrs for their faith. The warriors who believed themselves the soldiers of God must sooner or later gain the victory over those who are only the servants of man. Cromwell was the first to feel this conviction.—LAMARTINE'S CROMWELL, p. 31.

5250. SOLDIERS, Piety of. Cromwell's. Cromwell had foreseen the destinies of the contest, and from among the freeholders and their sons in his own neighborhood he formed his immortal troop of Ironsides, those men who, in many a well-fought field, turned the tide of conflict, men who "jeopardized their lives on the high places of the field." These men were peculiarly moulded; their training was even more religious than military; they were men of position and character. Oliver preached to them, prayed with them, directed their vision to all the desperate and difficult embroilments of the times. These men were Puritans all; Independents; men who, however painful it may be to our more Christian notions, used their Bible as a matchlock, and relieved their guard by revolving texts of Holy Writ, and refreshed their courage by draughts from God's Book.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 6, p. 95.

5251. ——. Cromwell's. But that which chiefly distinguished the army of Cromwell from other armies was the austere morality and the fear of God which pervaded all ranks. It is acknowledged by the most zealous Royalists that, in that singular camp, no oath was heard, no drunkenness or gambling was seen, and that during the long dominion of the soldiery the property of the peaceable citizen and the honor of woman were held sacred. If outrages were committed, they were outrages of a very different kind from those of which a victorious army is generally guilty. No servant-girl complained of the rough gallantry of the red-coats; not an ounce of plate was taken from the shops of the goldsmiths; but a Pelagian sermon, or a window on which the Virgin and Child were painted, produced in the Puritan ranks an excitement which it required the utmost exertions of the officers to quell.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 114.

5252. SOLDIERS described, Poor. Cato. "I do not like," he said once, "a soldier who moves his hands when he marches and his feet when he fights, and who snores louder in bed than he shouts in battle."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 422.

5253. SOLDIERS, Professional. Lacedæmonian. The allies of Sparta likewise complained of Agesilaus, that it was not in any public quarrel, but from an obstinate spirit of private resentment, that he sought to destroy the Thebans. For their part, they said, they were wearing themselves out, without any occasion, by going in such numbers upon this or that expedition every year, at the will of a handful of Lacedæmonians. Hereupon Agesilaus, desirous to show them that the number of their warriors was not so great, ordered all the allies to sit down promiscuously on one side and all the Lacedæmonians on the other. This done, the crier summoned the trades to stand up one after another, the potters first, and then the braziers, the carpenters, the masons—in short, all the mechanics. Almost all the allies rose up to answer in one branch of business or other, but not one of the Lacedæmonians; for they were forbidden to learn or exercise any manual art. Then Agesilaus smiled and said, "You see, my friends, we send more warriors into the field than you."—PLUTARCH'S AGESILAUS.

5254. SOLDIERS, Quality of. Cromwell's. "At his first entrance into the wars," observes the Reliquiæ Baxterianæ, "being but captain of horse, he had especial care to get religious men into his troops; these men were of greater understanding than common soldiers, and therefore were more apprehensive of the importance and consequences of the war. By this means, indeed, he sped better than he expected. Hereupon he got a commission to take some care of the associated counties, where he brought his troop into a double regiment of fourteen full troops, and all these as full of religious men as he could get; these, having more than ordinary wit and resolution, had more than ordinary success.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 6, p. 100.

5255. SOLDIERS, Terrible. Janizaries. [Under Amurath I., the Turk.] Vigilant officers were stationed at Gallipoli, to watch the passage and to select for his use the stoutest and most beautiful of the Christian youth. . . . Many thousands of the European captives were educated in religion and arms, and the new militia was consecrated and named by a celebrated dervis. Standing in the front of their ranks, he stretched the sleeve of his gown over the head of the foremost soldier, and his blessing was delivered in these words: "Let them be called Janizaries (Yengi cheri, or new soldiers); may their countenance be ever bright! their hand victorious! their sword keen! may their spear always hang over the heads of their enemies! and wheresoever they go, may they return with a white face!" Such was the origin of these haughty troops, the terror of the nations, and sometimes of the sultans themselves.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 64, p. 235.

5256. SOLDIERS, Unqualified. Reign of Charles I. In a country which had not, within the memory of the oldest person living, made war on a great scale by land, generals of tried skill and valor were not to be found. It was necessary, therefore, in the first instance, to trust untried men, and the preference was naturally given to men distinguished either by their station, or by the abilities which they had displayed in Parliament. In scarcely a single instance, however, was the selection fortunate. Neither the grandes nor the orators proved good soldiers. The Earl of Stamford, one of the greatest nobles of England, was routed by the Royalists at Stratton. Nathaniel Fiennes, inferior to none of his contemporaries in talents for civil business, disgraced himself by the pusillanimous surrender of Bristol. Indeed, of all the statesmen who at this juncture accepted high military commands, Hampden alone appears to have carried into the camp the capacity and strength of mind which had made him eminent in politics.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 108.

5257. SOLITUDE, Delight in. Daniel Boone. Occupying the first cottage in Kentucky, in the spring of 1770 . . . [his] brother returned to the settlements for horses and supplies of ammunition, leaving the renowned hunter "by himself, without bread, or salt, or sugar, or even a horse or dog." . . . He was no more alone than a bee among the flowers, but communed familiarly with the whole universe of life. . . . For him the rocks and fountains, the leaf and the blade of grass, had life; . . . the trees stood up, . . . myriads of companions. . . . The perpetual howling of the wolves by night round his cottage, or his bivouac in the brake, was his diversion. . . . He returned to his wife and children fixed in his purpose, at the risk of life and fortune, to bring them as soon as possible to live in Kentucky, which he esteemed a second Paradise.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 41.

5258. SOLITUDE, Moroseness by. Chrysostom. He maintained, from some considerations of health or abstinence, his . . . habits of taking his repasts alone; and this inhospitable custom, which his enemies imputed to pride, contributed, at least, to nourish the infirmity of a morose and unsocial humor.—GIBBON, ch. 3, p. 342.

5259. SON, A devoted. Confucius. Just as he was about to be promoted to the highest dignities of the empire, his mother, in the flower of her age, suddenly died. Immediately, in accordance with the ancient traditions, he resigned his office, and resolved to pay all the honors to his mother's memory which the most rigorous of the old customs demanded. After conveying the body to the summit of a mountain, where the ashes of his father reposed, he secluded himself from society, and passed three whole years in mourning the irreparable loss which he had sustained, his only relief being the study of philosophy.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 409.

5260. SON like Mother. Emperor Nero. Claudius, by the advice of his faithful councillors, his freedmen, married his niece Agrippina, the daughter of Germanicus, a woman equally vicious as Messalina, and more daring in her crimes. Her favorite object was to secure the empire for her son Domitius Ænobarbus [Nero]; and, to gain the freedmen to her interest, she made no scruple to prostitute herself to them. In the prosecution of her scheme she employed banishment, poison, murder—every different engine of vice and inhumanity. She obliged Octavia, the emperor's daughter, to marry Domitius, whom she now made Claudius adopt, to the prejudice of his son Britannicus; and Domitius was hailed Cæsar, with the titles of Nero Claudius Cæsar Drusus Germanicus. . . Agrippina, having by these complicated crimes paved the way for the succession of her son to the throne, now thought proper to make way for him by poisoning her husband; and Claudius, after a reign of fourteen years, was thus carried off at the age of sixty-three.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 486.

5261. SON, Reconciling. Themistocles. Admetus, king of the Molossians, . . . had made a request to the Athenians, which being rejected with scorn by Themistocles in the time of his prosperity and influence in the State, the king entertained a deep resentment against him, and made no secret of his intention to revenge himself, if ever the Athenian should fall into his power. However, while he was thus flying from place to place, he was more afraid of the recent envy of his countrymen than of the consequences of an old quarrel with the king; and therefore he went and put himself in his hands, appearing before him as a supplicant in a particular and extraordinary manner. He took the king's son, who was yet a child, in his arms, and kneeled down before the household gods. This manner of offering a petition the Molossians look upon as the most effectual, and the only one that can hardly be rejected.—PLUTARCH'S THEMISTOCLES.

5262. SONG, Enamored by. Josiah Quincy. [While visiting his aunt in Boston he met a young lady who made no impression on his mind till] she began to sing one of the songs of Burns with a clearness of voice and with a degree of taste and feeling which charmed and excited him beyond anything he had ever experienced. He immediately threw down the law papers which he had been examining, and returned to the company. Miss Morton sang several other songs, to the great delight of all who heard her, and to the unbounded rapture of this particular young gentleman. When the singing was over, he entered into conversation with her, and discovered her to be an intelligent, well-informed, unaffected, and kind-hearted girl. In short, he fell in love with her upon the spot, and when the young lady left Boston a week after, he was engaged to her. Some time elapsed, however, before they were married. She was a young lady of highly respectable connections and considerable fortune. The marriage was suitable in all respects, and they lived together fifty-three happy years. This most fortunate union was, no doubt, one of the main causes of the singular peace and uninterrupted happiness of his life.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 751.

5263. SONG, Political. Reign of James II. [Irish Roman Catholic troops were brought into England to aid the king in supplanting the Protestant religion.] Thomas Wharton had written a satirical ballad on the administration of Tyrconnel [lord-lieutenant of Ireland]. In this little poem an Irishman congratulates a brother Irishman, in a barbarous jargon, on the approaching triumph of popery and of the Milesian race. The Protestant heir will be excluded. The Protestant officers will be broken. The Great Charter and the praters who appeal to it will be hanged in one rope. The good Talbot will shower commissions on his countrymen, and will cut the throats of the English. These verses, which were in no respect above the ordinary standard of street poetry, had for burden some gibberish which was said to have been used as a watchword by the insurgents of Ulster in 1641. The verses and the tune caught the fancy of the nation. From one end of England to the other all classes were constantly singing this idle rhyme. . . . One of the characteristics of the good old soldier is his trick of whistling Lillibullero. Wharton afterward boasted that he had sung a king out of three kingdoms. But, in truth, the success of Lillibullero was the effect, and not the cause, of that excited state of public feeling which produced the Revolution.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 397.

5264. SORCERY condemned. England. A.D. 1440. [In 1440] the Witch of Eye was burned in Smithfield for having, in former days, given medicines to Eleanor Cobham to make the Duke of Gloucester love her and wed her. [The duke's wife was brought before an ecclesiastical commission by the political enemies of her husband, and] condemned by the bishops to all the humiliations of penance in the streets of London, on three several days. . . . She was confined at Calais and the Isle of Man for the remainder of her life. [Her offence was only this: she had consulted an astrologer] to know what should fall of her, and to what estate she should come.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 6, p. 94.

5265. SORCERY, Fear of. By Joan of Arc. The only question was whether these beings were good or evil angels; whether she brought with her "airs from heaven or blasts from hell." This question seemed to her countrymen to be decisively settled in her favor by the austere sanctity of her life, by the holiness of her conversation, but still more by her exemplary attention to all the services and rites of the Church. The dauphin at first feared the injury that might be done to his cause if he laid himself open to the charge of having leagued himself with a sorceress. Every imaginable test, therefore, was resorted to in order to set Joan's orthodoxy and purity beyond suspicion. At last Charles and his advisers felt safe in accepting her services as those of a true and virtuous Christian daughter of the Holy Church.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 375.

5266. SORCERY punished. Henry VI. [He married his mistress, Eleanor Cobham; she was charged with compassing the king's death by sorcery.] Her judges found that she had made a waxen image of the king and slowly melted it at a fire, a process which was held to account for Henry's growing weakness both of body and mind. The duchess was doomed to penance for her crime; she was led bareheaded and barefooted in a white penance-sheet through the streets of London, and then thrown into prison for life.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 436.

5267. SORROW, A living. Mother of Wesley. Susanna Wesley, . . . in a letter to her brother, writes, with the anguish which only a mother can know, for the saddest sorrow of a child: "O sir! O brother! happy, thrice happy are you; happy is my sister that buried your children in infancy, secure from temptation, secure from guilt, secure from want and shame, secure from the loss of friends. Believe me, it is better to mourn ten children dead than one living, and I have buried many."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 59.

5268. SORROW, Sentimental. Xerxes. [The Persians invaded Greece.] He left Sardis, and directed his march toward the Hellespont. Being arrived there, he wished to have the pleasure of seeing a naval engagement. A throne was erected for him upon an eminence; and in that situation, seeing all the sea crowded with his vessels, and the land covered with his troops, he at first felt a secret joy diffuse itself through his soul, in surveying with his own eyes the vast extent of his power, and considering himself as the most happy of mortals; but reflecting soon afterward, that of so many thousands in a hundred years' time there would not be one living soul remaining, his joy was turned into grief, and he could not forbear weeping at the uncertainty and instability of human things. He might have found another subject of reflection, which would have more justly merited his tears and affliction, had he turned his thoughts upon himself, and considered the reproaches he deserved for being the instrument of shortening that fatal term to millions of people, whom his cruel ambition was going to sacrifice in an unjust and unnecessary war. [He had 1,800,000 men.]—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 2, § 2.

5269. SOUL, Divinity of the. Pythagoras. Pythagoras regarded the human soul as consisting of two parts—the one a sensitive, which is common to man and the inferior animals; the other a rational and divine, which is common to man with the Deity, and is indeed a part of the divine nature. The first perishes with the body, of which it is an inseparable adjunct; the other survives and is immortal; but after the death of one body it enters into another, and so passes through an endless series of transmigrations. It is punished by degradation into the body of an inferior animal.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 263.

5270. SOUL, Immortality of the. Socrates. Socrates passed the rest of the day [his last day] with his friends, and conversed with them with his usual . . . tranquillity. The subject of conversation was most important, and well suited to his present condition—that is to say, the immortality of the soul. What gave occasion to this discourse was a question introduced in a manner by chance, Whether a true philosopher ought not to desire and take pains to die? This proposition, taken too literally, implied an opinion that a philosopher might kill himself. Socrates shows that nothing is more unjust than this notion; and that man, appertaining to God, who formed and placed him with His own hand in the post he possesses, cannot abandon it without His permission, nor quit life without His order. What is it, then, that can induce a philosopher to entertain this love for death? It can be only the hope of that happiness which he expects in another life, and that hope can be founded only upon the opinion of the soul's immortality.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 9, ch. 4, § 7.

5271. SOUL, Mystery of the. Mahomet. [Mahomet's wisdom was tested by the rabbins, who asked an answer to this question, "What is the soul?" Mahomet demanded] three days to reflect. He then replied to the questions to the satisfaction of the rabbins. As to the definition of the soul, which does not fall under the senses, and which cannot be defined by words all borrowed from material properties: "The soul," said he, "is a mystery, of which God has reserved to Himself alone the knowledge. Man can know only what God vouchsafes to teach him."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 87.

5272. SOUL, Nobility of. Darius. Polystratus having gone aside to a fountain to quench his thirst, saw hard by a mean wagon, in which lay a wounded man, to appearance in the agonies of death. There was no attendant near. On approaching, he perceived that it was the king of the Persians, who lay stretched upon a skin, covered with wounds. When Polystratus came near, he opened his eyes, and feebly asked of him a draught of water, which when he had received, "Whoever thou art," said he, "who hast done me this office of humanity, it is the last of my misfortunes that I can offer thee no return. But Alexander will requite thee for it; and may the gods reward him for that generous compassion which, though an enemy, he has shown to me and to my unfortunate kindred. Take," said he, "this hand as the pledge of my gratitude." So saying, he grasped the hand of Polystratus, and immediately expired. Such was the end of Darius Codomannus. . . . Of this prince it may be truly said that he merited a better fate. The tender and humane affections formed a strong ingredient in his nature. When we consider him stripped of his dominions, his crown and life sacrificed to the insatiable ambition of an unprovoked invader—to forgive was much; but an emotion of gratitude to that enemy, expressed with his latest breath, indi-
